PICTURES FROM AIX-LES-BAINS.

BY H.R.H. PRINCESS BEATRICE

WITH NOTES BY THE EDITOR.

AIX-LES-BAINS, a town of 10,000 inhabitants, is a rival of Evian, and is situated on the eastern shore of Lake Geneva. On account of the mineral springs, it is a famous spa, and the power of the water is said to be more potent than in the district of Evian. The town is situated on a hill, and of the numerous hotels and residences, a few of the most elegant and comfortable ones are situated in such positions, that even the greater suffering patients could ever induce any but the most delicate to the lesser inclination which is the result of the depressing monotony imposed. They are trying enough places for the patients who have to bobble or crawl day by day, early and late, to the fountain to swallow the prescribed tumbler of clear mineral water, putting all the teeth ledge, or to gulp down with dry face a boiled-egg concoction of nature's blood, which is supposed to be so excellent for indigestions. But such patients have no compensations. There is a certain satisfaction in the consciousness of duty carefully fulfilled. They may even enjoy the rout of bathing and drinking. They have to wot their own cure, and that work gives them some relief from the oppressive stupidity of their surroundings. When along with the rest of fellow-sufferers they march in the mass the morning and evening promenades round the Kiosk, under which the town musicians regularly perform, they perchance find certain tone of happy, or even triumphant greeting in the thump of the drum and in the of the fiddle. Polka and waltz are impossible for them in a literal sense, but yet a strain of congratulation. The sharp tone of the merry notes so stimulates their activity that they can step out wonderfully with the rheumatic or gouty limb and even delude themselves into the pleasing belief that there is a graceful measure in their movements, and that it is the earnest of approaching suppleness.

But it is otherwise with the relative or friend of the patient, who has out of affection its interest in the sufferer to accept the role of valetudinarian without the excitement of any known complaint to while away the time.
With all patience must such in one pass the weary hour in the Park or hang about the shop window every of which he has long been lured by heart until the bitter emancipates from the mysterious rites of the "Etablissement des Bains." Wearily has he to mince his gut to the march of the invalids there is not a feature of the countenances not a twirl of the moustaches of these musicians that does not become impressed upon his memory. He could in his sleep reproduce the movements of that legion and conduct the oft repeated programme. The one-clock table d'hôte, especially if the Spa happens to be one of those small German villages whose Brunnen is its solitary attraction, leaves him helpless for the rest of the day. The afternoon excursion becomes impossible after a repast on fowls, which by some subtle process have been deprived of all the sap and nutriment usually discovered elsewhere in animals mainly franc. But which in the present instance have been so evaporated that nothing consistency of stewed Arminian curd. It on leaf which has been wrung till all its juices have been squeezed into the soup then carefully dried and finally heated on a

But what if there is no excursion worth taking?
Then dulness grows till the monotony becomes that of the courtyard of a prison. There are no mountains to lift the thoughts and to feed the soul with the prospect of distant but ever changing glories. There are no valleys rich in wild flowers and where nature forms her own marvellous groupings of form and colour. The monotony of straight roads and straight lines of poplars, and the featureless lands chequered with patches representing proprietary rights, or covered with dust be-ginned vines, is in exasperating harmony with the small formalisms and horrible regularity of the routine which dwells in slumber-ous, or rather nightmare persistency over the scene of nature's healing ministry.

waters goes back to the time of Julius Cæsar. After the subjugation of the Allobroges a Proconsul discovered the value of these fountains, and to the present day the remains of temples and baths attest the importance attached to the "Aqua Allobrogum" by the ancient world. What looks like a triumphal arch, but was really the Columbarium (or receptacles for the funeral urns) of a great Roman family, stands in front of the modern bath-house, and the foundations of not a few buildings display marks of Roman handiwork. ■ seems incongruous to associate such prosaic complaint as gout or rheumatism with the soldiers of the mighty Cæsar, but in all probability these springs have in their day, soothed the twinges and supplied the joints of more than one great champion. It is comparatively of recent date, however, that the great value of these waters has been recognised. A century ago there were no proper baths at Aix and the poor people who collected there in twos and threes had to plunge into the natural fountains without any protecting roof. The true revival of the importance of Aix dates from the days of

THE GREAT FOUNTAIN

Victor Emmanuel under whose reign much was done for it. When Savoy was ceded to Prince Napoleon III, with characteristic astuteness, saw the importance of filling its attractions and large sums were voted out of the Imperial treasury for increasing the comforts and beauty of the town. He thus pleased as well as enriched his new subjects.

The mineral waters are various in kind, for the neighbourhood of Aix les Bains abounds in medicinal springs. Besides the two famous sources at Aix which supply waters useful for difficult cases of rheumatism, there are within easy access the scarcely less renowned waters of Maloz, the Eau de Challes the Eau de Moniers, the Eau de Ceyras and the Eau de la Caille—each of which has some virtue peculiarly its own. ■ we are to believe guide books the ailments which can be ameliorated or cured by these various sources are almost as numerous as are the ills which flesh is heir to. The method of treatment ■ in some of its aspects curious. There is a large staff of licensed porters, bathers and shampooers, under the charge of some of whom the patient is placed, and when the hour of treatment arrives he is carried in a kind of sedan chair from his bedroom to the bath, and after having been put through a number of operations in which the douche and shampooing form

A principal part he is borne once more back to his bed, and left to slumber under the influence of the sweet reaction.

Aix-les-Bains is situated in a delightful valley, surrounded by well wooded hills, beyond which rise mountains which may almost be classified as belonging to the Higher Alps. The range of Revins, on whose lower slopes the town is built, the heights of Tresserve, Moury, and Saint Innocent rise in the nearer foreground, while the towering summits of Dent de Nivolle and Mont du Chat stand like sentinels to the east and west—ceaseless watchers of the rising and the setting sun. For these mountains are so situated that they catch alternately the glory of morning and evening, and alternately cast their long shadows across woodland and lake. The Lake of Bourget, which the muse of Lamartine has made classical, is not actually visible from Aix, but a short walk from the town leads to points of view which command the long sheet of sea, reflecting the villages, castles, convents, and church towers that are scattered along its shores. The climate is delicious. Figs and almonds, vines and pomegranates abound in the meadows and gardens, and chestnut and oak clothe the hills. This luxuriant vegetation, be it remembered, is at an elevation of 850 feet above the sea, and amply attests the ameliorating influence of the wall of mountains which protect the valley from the cold winds of the north and east.

Among the great charms of Aix are the numerous and exquisite excursions which can be made from it. There are many short walks, and of these perhaps the most interesting is to "L'Imprimerie Saint," on the top of an eminence between the town and the Lake of Bourget. Three trees mark the spot, where we can contemplate the view which inspired some of the loveliest lines of the poet. Lamartine has indeed immortalised the district. His semi-autobiographical romance, Raphael, written late in life, derives much of its colouring from the scenery around Aix, and his earliest poem—"Les Méditations"—contains various passages descriptive of the view from his favourite seat—

Sur un rocher isolé, d'un air solitaire,
Un air solitaire, d'un air solitaire,
Un air solitaire, d'un air solitaire,
Un air solitaire, d'un air solitaire.

Le regard se perd dans l'immensité,
Le regard se perd dans l'immensité,
Le regard se perd dans l'immensité,
Le regard se perd dans l'immensité.

Le regard se perd dans l'immensité,
Le regard se perd dans l'immensité,
Le regard se perd dans l'immensité,
Le regard se perd dans l'immensité.

It was when he was a refugee from France during the Hundred Days, that he first came to Savoy, and there fell in love. When he returned once more to Aix, after the Battle of Waterloo, he had lost the object of his affections, and it was under the influence of consequent sadness that he gazed upon scenes which were associated with her presence.

The tone of melancholy which breathes through his "Meditations" is the more touching when we remember the circumstances under which they were written

The longer excursions embrace the Lake of Bourget, visiting the Abbey of Haut-Combe, or such delightful places as Chambéry, or Annecy with its sweet lake and the "Gorges du Fier," Grenoble and the famous convent of the Grande Chartreuse, or even the Alps of Dauphiné and the Waldensian valleys across the frontier. There are few finer drives than from Grenoble ■■ Susa by Briançon and Mont Genève. The glaciers on the higher Alps are numerous and quite visible in all their grandeur from the road. The only drawback used to be—for we speak of a time some twenty-six years ago—the rapacity of the innkeepers. Although the district is as much out of the beaten track of tourists as the most remote valley in the Tyrol, yet the changes, even in the most wretched hamlets, are beyond belief. I return to the present day a lively recollection of a passage of arms with an hotel-keeper at Bourg d'Oisans, which lasted the best part of a forenoon, and ended in an appeal to the Juge de Paix, who proved as great a rascal as mine host. ■■ Was it foolish attempt on my part to resist robbery, but having taken a stand, I was obstinate enough to fight it out.

The views which have been so graciously furnished by Her Royal Highness Princess Beatrice, embrace some of the most characteristic scenery around Aix-les-Bains.

CHAPTER I.—AT THE BLACK SWAN

*'Tis earth and one thing, one how fair !
One place that grew to its full on earth
Smiles might be seen on its cheeks as it grew
And her was not want till a garden's path,
But she had her great gold hair !*

ROBERT PROCTOR

"HAS this seen yon woman, Isaiah?"

"Whya no. Ah'll nut saav'at Ah've clearly seen her, Peter, but Ah've heerd tell on her."

"What, already?"

"Ay, already. They were talkin' on her doon ■■ Reuben's, as Ah com' by. Folks seem puzzled like."

"At that Ah don't wonder, Isaiah. Things is puzzlin'."

"Soa twould seem. She's despart grand-lookin'—hes a twin of the head like a princess, they say. An 'twas added 'at the man was old, an seemed of a commoner sort, an' carried hisself ■■ a humbler manner."

"Ay, so he does, but he's no common man. Anyways, I'm mista'en if he is."

"You seed 'em, then?"

"Ay, but 'twere nobbut a flash like, as they went along t' passage. There's naught but Leah i' t' hoose. Ah reckon odd I like ll be rether 'stounded when he comes hame."

So ran conversation in the kitchen of the Black Swan, the principal inn at Ryngon-gill, one October evening not many years ago.

As Peter Crosswold had intimated, it was early times for gossip about the strangers to be passing from lip ■■ lip. It was not yet half an hour since the train had stopped at the little way-side station to set down the two passengers whose arrival was creating so much stir.

There were very few people on the platform. The place was dimly lighted, the luggage—there was an immense quantity of it—had been extricated slowly and with difficulty. Then the two strangers had passed up the dark, steep, little street to the inn, not asking for directions as to the way.

"Seems as if they knew summat about it please," said Bellman Dykes, who had assisted in housing the heavier luggage at the station, and had been handsomely rewarded.

"Ay, an' I hev a fancy myself 'at Ah've seen the gentleman afore," said Reuben Folds, the blacksmith. He had caught a glimpse of the strangers as they passed the blazing light of the forge, he had heard a soft sweet voice asking, "Are you tired? are you very tired?" and his big bare arm had hung down in a listless way more than once for a minute or two as he tried to recall the little he had seen and heard. It was tantalising to have so bare an account to give. The Black Swan knew little of him as a rule, but this evening was exceptional. It was not long before Reuben Folds and Bellman Dykes were joining in the speculative conversation that was being carried on in the smoky atmosphere of the inn kitchen.

As Peter Crosswood had said, there was no one but Leah in the house, and the willing handmaiden was well nigh distracted between the half-comprehended requirements of the company up stairs, and the increasingly urgent demands of the company in the kitchen. It was a self-evident fact that the girl had no time for conversation; yet she had been somewhat bitingly reproached for her reticence concerning the strangers. Reproach was met with retort, and high words were beginning to be heard above the jangle of glasses, the scraping of feet on the sanded floor, and the sharp yapping of "Lurk," Isaiah Scott's lean sheep dog.

"Thoo can talk fast anutt when there's nua' cawson," said Isaiah, as Leah put down his third glass of ale with a bang that sent part of its contents flying across the table.

"Then Ah'd better keep my talk till cawson comes," retorted the girl, darting in and out amongst the group for the empty glasses that she should have refilled ten minutes ago. The confusion was increasing rapidly.

"Thoo forgit 'at mah sixpence is as good as any fine lady's supence 'at iver was comed," said one who had waited thirstingly.

"Tell us what they call her, Leah?" said another. "An' Ah'll bring tha a fairn' fra Birkan Brigg."

Suddenly—very suddenly—there was an instant silence, an instant cessation of other things than sound. Every head was turned in one direction, pipes were removed from the smoker's lips, and glasses were replaced noiselessly on the table. A singular unanimity of expression, both in countenance and attitude, came over the little assemblage, seemed more than mere surprise, mere admiration.

The cause of all this was only a girl who stood there in the doorway of the inn kitchen, shrinking a little from the general gaze, a tall, white, graceful figure holding a lamp a little above her head, so that the light fell full upon her face.

No one there had ever dreamed that such a face could be. It was very pale, very pure, faultless in outline as a cameo. The richly curved mouth smiled a little, as if some word had been overheard. The eyes smiled, too—they were large dark eyes, keen, observant, yet liquid, lovely, and intent with human lovingness. They were deeply set, and looked deeper for the overshadowing of the heavy, shining, pale gold hair, hair of the kind that looks richer for any confusion it may be in. Altogether there was about her that rare look of superior organization which we name distinction. Her dress was consistent, and the air of picturesque carelessness with which it was worn took nothing from its inherent becomingness. Her wide brimmed velvet hat with its creamy feathers was pushed away from her forehead, her long palmetot of rich white fur was open at the throat. Apparently the girl had had no time to take off her travelling attire.

"It is only this letter," she said, speaking to Leah, who had hurried to the doorway. "Can you send it to the post at once, please? My father will be obliged if you can. It is important."

More than one volunteer stepped forward, winning gracious thanks, and smiles that were found to be bewildering, even in remembrance. The white figure disappeared with her lamp. The amazed group sat in silence a little while, and when conversation began again it was carried on in a curiously subdued manner. The stranger's wonderful beauty, her grace, her exquisitely musical voice and accent, had left a unity of impression that was at least conducive to social harmony.

The up-stairs parlour to which the young lady returned was undoubtedly the best inn's best room; yet it was a little dingy, a little tawdry. But the lamplight did not emphasize its tawdriness; and there was even an air of comfort about the fireside. A big coal fire blazed in the old-fashioned grate, the tea-table was drawn near it, the ancient three cornered arm chairs looked very hospitable.

One of the chairs was occupied. A gentleman sat there who was apparently either sad or very weary, it might be that he was both.

His clasped hands drooped listlessly from the arm of his chair, his eyes were fixed dreamily on the fire, and an air of unconscious abstraction hung about him, seeming as if it were the outcome of his natural and permanent tone of mind rather than of any passing mood.

■ may be said at once that he was a man of note among such as understood, and noticeable in his way, but people were seldom impressed at first sight of him. Some openly confessed to disappointment, and the damaging epithet, "commonplace," was uttered with a finality of tone from which there seemed no appeal. All the same the epithet was misleading.

Confessing by negatives he was not handsome, nor was he tall, nor had he any commanding personality that could be discerned without occasion. Yet the man's thought furrowed face, his broad firm brow, his expression of a keen if somewhat visionary intellectuality, were things not to be passed over if you wished to read his character from such outward and visible signs as it had impressed upon him.

It has been said that he was a noted man, this must be qualified, and it can only be qualified by a paradox.

Noel Irving Bartholomew was known through the length and breadth of the art world of England—nay, beyond this limit—as an artist who was comparatively unknown, that is to say, comparing his public recognition with his recognised genius. He had made his mark distinctively at thirty years of age. He was now nearly fifty, and the outer world was waiting yet for the masterpiece that was ■ place him, not amongst the immortals, there were those who judged him placed there already, but amongst the fortunate few who art, even ■ their own day, honoured alike of the critic, the connoisseur, and the utterly uncultivated.

It was some provoking perversity in the man, so it was said, that prevented him doing full justice to his own genius, some lack of the force that springs of ambition, or some incomprehensible indifference to his rightful place in the world's estimate.

All this was known to Noel Bartholomew, something more than this was understood of him.

One day a lady who had seen him ■ his own studio ■ Kensington, was speaking of him to a younger and more fashionable artist. The lady praised the older man—praised him for the noble work he had done, for the unassuming way in which he spoke of it, for the beautiful absence of self-assertion observable in the man himself.

"Ah, yes!" said the young man, speaking out of his store of rapidly assimilated modern ideas. "Yes, that is entirely true. It is his want of self-assertion that has left him in the shade. No man comes to the front without it in these days. If one cannot assert one's self, one must at least have friends to do the asserting. The latter is the more dignified way; but it is slower, and considerably less certain."

So far as Noel Bartholomew was concerned, this was only a small part of the truth. Other causes than lack of the power of self-assertion had tended to keep him from the forefront of the time. The world that talked so much of the man, and assumed such intimate knowledge of him, of his life, and of his work, would, if the truth could have been laid bare, have been surprised to find that after all it had known nothing; that it had interested and amused itself solely by conjecture.

The first thing experience of life had really taught him, was the value of silence concerning the greater facts of his life. He had acquired the gift, he had found that it cost him friends, and he had also found that it was a cause of misunderstanding. Nevertheless he had proved its wholeheartedness.

"There are artists with half his talent who are making money ■ fast as if they were counting it," said a gentleman who was admiring one of Bartholomew's pictures, it hung on the wall of one of the finest studios in London.

The owner of the studio paused a moment.

"Are you sure that Bartholomew has any talent at all?" he asked.

The visitor understood.

"You mean that he has genius? Granted, but why then does he turn ■ to so little practical use?"

"Is pure genius, sans talent, of practical use to anybody?" asked the artist, knowing the thing he spoke of. "Is ■ not rather a tyrannous thing, oft enough blind in its tyranny, cruel in its imperiousness? A man who is blessed with it, if blessing it be, can do no other than obey it. He must obey, do the thing he is moved to do, or he must do nothing. It is talent that can do as it will that can foresee, calculate, make certain that every step is a step onward. Now Bartholomew is a fool in the estimation of men of talent.

There were times, and they occurred often when he was a fool in his own estimation.

It was only natural that as he sat there in the dingy parlour of the Yorkshire inn some grave thoughts should visit him. His daughter who sat at his feet with her fur shining head resting up on his knee, refrained from trying to distract his thoughts.

Let him think, let him grieve, he would turn to her for comfort when he wanted it.

There was no one else to comfort him now. Three years ago, just when the world had begun to see some possibility of better things for him, his wife had died. She had come from him suddenly in the fullness of her life, and he had overpowered him with the knowledge that she had been his life. He had no more to do but to wait for her return. It was the first time that he was about to try what change of scene would do.

This was not the change they had desired.

Bartholomew's View of the Sea from the Cliff.

for him, but here he had in a quiet, deliberate way expressed his wish to decide for himself. He would go back to the Yorkshire village where he had just met his wife. He might not go there, it would be useless going elsewhere.

It was night now, and only that morning, he had, with painful unwillingness, snapped the first thread that bound him to the life he had lived and loved so many years, for so long as his wife lived he had enjoyed existence in his own way, not in the world's way. His undeserved obscurity if such it could be called, had not been undervalued, and his comparatively small gains had never been so small as to narrow his soul's life, to compel him to live with the degrading grasp of anxiety. He had been the proprietor of all necessary things, and some luxuries, ones for his little household but he had given no thought to the future. He had lived in the present, he had lived in the past. To-night the past was more vividly with him than ever.

Was it possible that twenty years had come and gone since he sat there before twenty years of labour, of aspiration, of success of failure?

There had been a great gain at the beginning, an expansion of his own life in the quiet sunshine that another life had made. Then there had been a long peace, a long satisfaction. Had it been quite good for him, that great unbroken calm?

He could never be quite sure it had been beautiful, he had been grateful, it was over. That was the sum of the years.

He was grateful still. It was as much gratitude as affection that was moving in him now as he laid his hand gently on his daughter's head.

"What a patient child you are, Genevieve!" he said tenderly.

"Am I, father?" she replied, lifting a wailing face. "But it is so easy to be patient when one is happy."

"Then you are really happy? You do not feel lonely?"

The girl hesitated a moment.

"One has regrets," she said. "It is not easy to leave a place one loves, and friends who have been always kind. But it has not been so hard as I thought it would be."

"You did dread it then?"

"I dreaded some things, breaking up the home most of all. But it was soon over, and now I am glad, for the best is yet to be."

"Wait till after to-morrow before you say that."

"To-morrow! You are thinking of the journey over the moor? Ah! I shall love the moor as I love the sea. I am impatient for to-morrow."

Noel Bartholomew smiled, and caught back a short, quick sigh as he did so. Genevieve had inherited her temperamental crankiness, with other things, from her mother. He was thankful for it always, and he had never been more thankful than during the past few weeks of confusion, pain, perplexity, and confusion.

Now and then his gratitude was mingled not a little with fear, with self-reproach. Was the child really as light-hearted as she seemed? Had she no life of her own that she should thus with such plaint gracefulness of spirit lend herself to the needs of another life? Were there no sky-larks, no unkindnesses, no personal dislikes? Had her existence no aim in it as yet? Was it in truth the utterly impersonal thing it seemed to be?

He was glad that she should try so much as this. "You have it gets, it has not been easy." It seemed to reassure him. If there been effort or tension underneath she would not have gone so near the cause of it. The small confession was valuable to him.

No, the uprooting had not been easy, the last wrench had been harder far than Noel Bartholomew would ever dream.

An hour later Genevieve stood alone in the small, oddly arranged bedroom that she was to occupy. She took note of it, that she might describe its oddities for her father's amusement. There was the heavy four post bedstead—Leah had drawn the great crimson moccasin curtains all round it, the looking-glass was placed on the top of a tall chest of drawers which stood opposite to the window, the toilet-service was ranged ornamentally—most of the things upside down—on a carved oak buckwain in the corner. Over the mantel-shelf there was an engraving—a 'Daughters of Jephthah,' with wistful eyes that seemed to look down into the dim, unrelieft, wondrous, comprehending, ordering sympathy.

Genetive stood looking into the pulsing eyes of Lule, thinking of the beautiful dream that came across the ages to the poet, of the words that the daughter of Gilgul sang to him in his dream.

I am in the clo garden below,
I am in the press of my bridal hour
In walks of love, speak all times that I love
In me with the child of love

"The light which shone on me over my An n
We will be in a few days
The new the (the) will be a new, one type Ch, from the dark and I am,

"Saw God divide the night with lightning fire,
and thunder on the everlasting hills
I heard him, too lie up his sword and bow,
A solemn sign of life."

The words passed through Genevieve's brain as music might have passed, only the last had not remained, singing itself, so to speak, over and over to her as she moved about the sombre little room. It seemed to be growing less sombre near the window. There was a pale light struggling to get in, and when Genevieve drew the curtain aside, she discovered a little rude stone balcony overlooking a wide garden.

There were some great white flowers growing down there in the misty moonlight. What were they? she wondered, as she stepped out through the window. She could not tell, but she remained standing there, looking over the old town, that seemed all composed of turreted castles, minarets, tall campaniles, standing straight and vague and still in the silvery haze. There was no sound, only from the dim room behind a refrain came that was like a chant.

“He spoke and great became A nation more or less.”

Have we not all of us, somewhere in the dim recesses ■ which we seldom penetrate, an impression that we never touch the highest chords that even the lowest of life's ills can yield?

Save for the one great bereavement Gene viewed had known but little of any of life's sternest sorrows. Her eighteen years of life had been years of such self-sufficing good that until lately no idea of any grave change had presented themselves. Nothing had been wanting. Love had been there and friendship, the finer sort of intellectual people had come and gone across her path. Out of every kind had sought her the emotions of love and music had stolen in upon the days with sweetness, and swept across the nights with power to soothe to uplift. Yet is it strange to say that in all this there had been no full satisfaction? Is it not apprehensible to whom that while 'tis full it was passing, it had not seemed to be the ideal life for which the soul of the girl was yearning?

It could not be said that she was dissatisfied, yet she was conscious of activities that she could neither deny nor suppress, conscious of a want, of a loss, of a human individuality narrowed. Others, looking on, seeing only the external had judged that a life so manifestly unselfish must needs be ideal enough for any real woman, but the self-sacrificing, unselfish the self-conscious at any rate so far as the matter is concerned

'Did this ever so kindly bid you wish I her white turn on feathers red in a corner?
Was it not?

'I can't say 'at over Ah did. But what were they to do? If it had not been for the little fur there'd have been no down try to get. As it is not only cool but in for neither love nor money.

This was quite true. Noel's children were thin, long, of his daughter, had delicate and fine nice sweeter and charming, yet there, but the re-vices had become abundant, and the first World could be made light if they were to be tipped with exquisite vehicles? It could be everything, whether ever, then, it off to thrives of a quite new experience.

It was all picked now seats were prepared, rays hym, ready the two hours were up, hurried there was no last minute of advice, of comment. I was there in the middle of all the excitement, watching for a opportunity. She had a tiny but best in her hand an ancient foreign thing, with a cord of thick blue silk.

'It's no bad a little cheese cake or two, miss, if you has can to eat on a moral, m' thers two or three on the moral, y' say and looked at by on the L. W. W. blushing, she looked very young but she was old, that ship when General C. was the big lot with a sweet surprise since I was griefful I think. The small in the eye of the world over and over in L. W. W. and everywhere in the empty upper air, she seemed to see the kind beautiful eyes, eyes had more all in once looked into hers was something that was than to fly.

There was just a few tall, thin, smiles, surprise, good-wishes, then came wave and her father went up the street, off Luke shouting, loudly that he would soon overtake them. They passed the church, the old-fashioned rectory, the few cottages that straggled along the lane. There were some debts and half-heals dripping in the mud, faces looked out from cottages, windows, eyes watched the two stragglers along swiftly away into the mystery beyond.

Will they come back again, mother?

asked a speculative Yorkshireman. He was looking out between the divided trunk of a gnarled apple tree.

"That's mur nor Ah can tell thir, honey," said the woman, feeling somehow as if the child's question was of the nature of a foreboding. She stood some time straining her eyes in the effort to peer into the silver haze that was upon the hills. It showed no signs of lifting yet. It seemed to move on and on, unshrouding little by little a forest, a group of pensile cattle, a clump of fir trees, a dark hill top, then veiling them again briefly in white mist, in still silence.

"It is as if one had to be silent to be in keeping with things," said Mr. Bartholomew in his quiet, emphatic way. He was awaking to the fact of his own rectitude.

"But you do not doubt it, father? It is not depressing?"

"Depressing? no, except in the sense that most beautiful things are depressing. You remember Keats—

"A thing of beauty is a joy for us,
A moment like that which we can use"

Genevieve paused awhile—a long while it seemed as they walked on side by side.

"It is strange!" the girl said at last, "how the two things—sadness and loveliness, appear twined together, so to speak, and there is such a weight of testimony that it is so. You quoted Keats just now. I thought of Shakespeare making Jessica say, 'I am never merry when I hear sweet music,' of Shelley's beautiful line 'Our sweetest music are those that tell of saddest thought,' of Milton's Penseroso. I suppose if we had been at home amongst the books we could have found a hundred such endorsements."

"Yes, that reminds me again to be glad that we brought so many books. I thought of them in the night, and I was glad for your sake. Every volume seemed a manifestation of my cruelty."

"Of your cruelty to me, but what of old Luke's horses?"

"I think I hear them behind us."

"Pausing along under Homer and Plato, Shakespeare and Milton, Shelley and Keats, Ruskin and Carlyle, under poets, historians, essayists, under novels from Scott's first to Miss Oliphant's last, under all these books and countless others, and my father is afraid that he will see his daughter fading away from the face of the earth for very weariness, for very disgust of a life unoccupied, unencouraged, unsolaced."

"Your father fears nothing of the kind, and his daughter knows it."

"But he does fear?"

"Which is only natural."

"Seeing that he is not an unnatural father. But, oh! he is tiresome at times."

Conversation was becoming difficult. Old

Luke Acomb was gazing upon them with the lumbering wagon, and the pair of stont well-fed horses. As he came up he stopped.

"Noo. Y'all be gittin' in a bit? I' young lady steps out brisckly, but she'll be tired by noo, Ah reckon. Were three miles frae t' Black Swan."

"And we have nearly twenty to travel yet," said Mr. Bartholomew. "What do you say, Genevieve? Will you get in? I know you are impatient for the new experience."

"So I am," admitted the girl, "and it looks enchanting inside the wagon. But not yet, not yet," she said, with a smile at the little wave of her hand to old Luke, who had turned away. "The expense of rest is in no proportion to the intensity of weariness. I wish to be weary."

"Your wish is likely to be gratified," said Mr. Bartholomew.

"Before we reach Mark Marsham? Yes, I suppose so. That thought alone will prevent me from dissipating my resources to the point of exhaustion. I have no wish to arrive at the Home in a defenceless condition."

"Defenceless?"

"That was the word I used. I meant a state of not being able to defend myself."

"From whom?" asked Mr. Bartholomew.

"From Miss Craven."

"You are going to be afraid of her?"

"I think so. I may even say that I have presentiment that it will be so."

"And that presentiment arises out of no sensations given by me?"

"Entirely out of your typical descriptions." "Tell me what you see in that curious imagination of yours?" said Mr. Bartholomew, after a brief wondering pause.

"I will. To begin with, I see a Yorkshire woman."

"You will find that that epithet is less descriptive than it may seem."

"But there is such a thing as a typical Yorkshire woman?"

"Yes, a thing that is to be found more frequently on the stage and in third-rate novels than in any of the three Ridings of Yorkshire."

"Still it exists? For me it is to be personified by Miss Craven. I see her clearly. She is a middle-aged woman, tall, large, ungainly. Her hair, which you describe as being black twenty years ago, is iron grey now, very smooth and straight, and her dark eyes look hard, in fact, her whole expression is one of hardness, keenness, and shrewdness, and the corners of her mouth are not quite free from the suggestion of sarcasm."

She carries herself well for a woman who has done the greater part of the work of a farm house for about thirty years, and there is a certain dignity about her as something not to be trifled with. She will speak the bluest, and her speech will be as curt as her manner.

Again I say that I wish to arrive at Mark Marshes not too much exhausted to be able to hold my own."

Bartholomew smiled—his smile looked graver than it was, his mouth being concealed by a somewhat heavy and indignant moustache.

"That is not all done dear," he said. "Keep it in mind, you will have both time and opportunity for comparison of the real with the ideal. Meanwhile, you observe that the mist is rising."

The scene was changing with rapidity. They had reached the top of the long winding line that led down into the lower level. The broad valley was then filled with soft bright haze, which a light breeze was sweeping upward and onward, confusing mingling all things. Now and then, by moments at a time, the sun streaked through, throwing silvery lanes across the vast disclosing vague colours, indefinite forms. Here and there points of the tall dark upland stood out, first on one side, then on the other, now near at hand and now far away in the great blue white distance. The transitions were rapid, bewildering. You could not overtake a complete picture.

Noel Bartholomew and his daughter stood awhile on the brow of the hill. There were a few houses scattered about, bright-eyed children came running up the road, a tinnymann stood by the wayside among the crimson and orange blackberry leaves. When old Luke came up his horses stopped quite naturally—they stopped quite naturally many times that day, but they were not taken out of the wagon till they got to Thornerfield, which was twelve long miles from the Black Swan at Ripponden.

Passing through Thomendrie, (Czechowice) at last made practical acquaintance with the interior of a carners wagon. It was less enchanting than I had presumed to be. She was slow to confess her dry pointment, but confession had to be made. The jolting was terrible, the strange stuffiness more terrible still. It was not endurable for more than a quarter of an hour at a time, not unless she sat on the edge of the wagon beside old Luke, where the breeze could blow upon her face. This she preferred to enjoy with catharticism.

Beyond doubt it was an enjoyable thing to pass through I homedale on a perfect autumn day. As the morning wore the sun began to pour down brilliantly, glittering on village steeples, lighting up busy farmsteads, gilding the refined gold of beech and maple, painting the flowers that grew in the cottage gardens, sparkling in the tiny little beads that ran rippling and foaming along Blar! birds flew clucking across the pathway, thrushes sang their autumn songs among the leaves that were fluttering down. It was, simply stimulating. Genesis did not fail to notice the keen living light that had come into her father's eyes. The comprehension of the present moment was in them, and an intense that was like a promise for the future.

So far it had not been a silent journey. Old Luke seemed to be explaining or telling something all through the drive. At village inns, the garden gates by sunnyard walls, he had himself to explain his presence there, the intentions of his fellow travellers, so far as he knew them. Hurly a wayfaring man pressed by un questioned, uninformed. The old man did not appear to be noting how fast the day was going.

CHAPTER IV—TANBUSH AND THE SECOND PART OF AN OVERVIEW

This is a letter to A. I was one day at the time. I was at the time. I was at the time.
 I was at the time. I was at the time.
 I was at the time. I was at the time.

After an hour of rest and refreshment at Thorne's Hotel, it was observable that old Duke was less communicative, it might be that there was less to be communicated. The breed, perhaps, was not suggestive of a full or personal narrative.

Conceive and her father were walking up the hill over a stony pathway with tall grass broken and dark when on either hill. There was only the hill top before them, above the hill top with its outline of giant fern bushes against the sky. They lingered a little to let the wagon pass well in front, then they turned and looked backward down the dale.

"The overture is in two parts," said Noel Bartholomew. "The first part is ended, the second has begun."

"As a rule I enjoy overtures, and I enjoyed these. "I have enjoyed this so far. It was beautiful, it was new, and despite its being a bit that highest of all excellences, unity of effect. I shall not forget Thornhill."

A little in wait, it that you will not forget I = Zang, h. M. 1.

"Probably not, since I have never seen a red moon."

"You do not expect to see the heather in bloom?"

"No, the bloom is past, I know. I shall be watching duly for its appearance about the beginning of next August."

"You can contemplate that?"

"As one contemplates dawn after sleepless nights."

"I did not know that you had been so restless!"

"Restless! no, but London is never quiet. How should it be with its three or four million of unquiet souls? To live in the midst of them, or but just outside of them, is to think, in words, to be anxious to run the risk of being faithless. Here between the purple heather and one's self there will be nothing—nothing, but God's part in it."

"But you are anxious, I see, to get free from anxiety, deliver me from the pressure of modern life?"

"There is really. Not the slightest of the lotus eaters' escape more easily for 'the unlovely' than I do now."

"The evening came on as you passed through Thorntideale?"

"Almost midway through the dale."

"It was born of the sunburnt, the losing of cattle the punctures, the purple hills, the crisp ripples, the downward streams over which the long leaved flowers droop and weep?"

"Certainly Iennyson is wonderful."

All this while the two were walking up ward. The sun had gone suddenly behind a bank of mullen grey. There was a chill in the air. The fuzzy hill top looked black against the mullen sky.

"What is there when one turns at the top of this hill?" asked Genevieve, after walking upward for half an hour in silence.

"Another hill-top."

"And after that?"

"Another."

The bank of grey cloud was drifting rapidly all over the sky now, the withered blacken, amber, and lilac, crimson and ivory white, vivid green and warm russet brown was beginning to bend quivering to the breeze that swept with increasing force across the moor. The great stretches of dead heather shuddered in masses, the long yellow leaves flew sadly away from the alderhorns, the black-faced moorland sheep were moving restlessly from hillock to hillock, and showed a tendency to congregations. It was fully evident that bad weather was approaching.

"It is only a question of time," said Mr. Bartholomew, looking at his daughter with apprehension. "We shall find old Luke at the next inn. He will probably know something of what we have to expect."

The small stone hut known as the Moor of Lye Inn, and which Genevieve did not care to enter, stood on the top of the last rise in the ascent of the slope of Lingbarugh Moor. The great wild waste itself lay beyond. There was nothing to burst upon the sight. Slowly, and with a sense of oppressiveness, you became aware that you stood looking out over an apparently boundless desolation. The purple black heathenness stretched like a gloomy sea from the one horizon to the other. The great flying, dead camel as it touched the dark distance. A few weather-blanch'd boulders rested here and there among the dead, brown masses of ling and turf, the rock stretched away, white and winding till it was lost in the muffled curves. A flight of crows passed with sinuous movement and hoarse, derisive, mocking notes.

"Noo, this don't look very promising," said old Luke, coming out from the warm turf fire with evident reluctance. "Yall had better inside o' t' wainin' Ah reckon."

"You think we are going to have a storm?" asked Mr. Bartholomew. Genevieve detected a loss of buoyancy in his tone as he spoke.

"Why we shall hev a sup o' rain an' a bit o' wind, but there'll be nowt to hurt ony body."

This ought to have been reassuring, but it had become quite evident by this time that the journey would not be accomplished by daylight. To be out on Lingbarugh Moor on a dark stormy night was something Noel Bartholomew had not prepared for. It was not that he had any fears for himself, or even for his daughter, she could be sheltered, and he was capable of physical endurance if the need came. A certain amount of real hardship, of real danger would probably have awakened within him the qualities necessary for meeting such adventures. But the present eve it all smelt of adventure. It was simply despairing, depressing. Genevieve saw the mood coming over him. He had said nothing, but she knew the meaning of the patient compressed setting of the muscles about his mouth, the significance of the composed tranquil weariness that was coming into his eyes. It was not of the present moment he was thinking as they stood there, waiting for the old man to complete his preparations for the worst. A wild gust of wind was sweeping up the moor the canvas cover of the wagon was cracking and slipping. Presently Genevieve's hat went flying into the air and of a pent stick.

"Ah this is terrible!" said Mr. Bartholomew with concern. "This is terrible. You will certainly take cold; you will certainly be ill. I think I must have been mad to bring you such a journey in such a manner as this."

Genevieve had rescued her hat, and was sitting it on a tin. She was smiling; her face was flushed under the veil of golden hair that the wind was tossing into such beautiful disorder. When its rebelliousness was lulled a little she laid her hand on her father's arm, drawing him into the shelter of the cottage.

"Is it of me that you have been thinking while you were so silent?" she asked with a tender earnestness.

"Yes, partly. Until with the first hour I think I have never seen my careless plans in all their utter senselessness. If going back were possible at this moment I think I would go back, I should at least spare myself the misery of knowing that having wasted my own life I must now be a waste to others."

"You have wasted your life!" said Mr. Irving Bartholomew. "That would be new to the admirers of the 'Flight of Saint Birin' of the 'Jerome Bible,' of the 'Liberation of Jerusalem,' of a dozen other noted pictures that I could name in a breath. Wasted your life! You have its best yet to live, so far as the world and your work goes."

With love about his eyes, he said: "I shall tell you."

If you never paint another picture, no man can say that yours was a wasted life. But you will paint. All day I have felt it, all day I have been glad of every mile, because it was another mile between you and the carping, doubting, ignorant dilettanti who were enough to paralyze a Michael Angelo. You know it was so, you know that for ten years past you have craved for seclusion, for something as near to solitude as you might have. And now it is here, a vast and splendid solitude, instinct with possibilities. . . . Say you are glad, my father."

More than once a strange quick light had quivered under the man's eyelids as an old thought, in old pride, an old hope struck him with fresh force as it came from the young girl's lips.

"I am glad, my child, if for nothing else then, I am glad that you are my child, my inspiration."

"No, not that, but I can stay with you when the inspiration does not. Then her voice changed and she said lightly, "But you are aware that I have impulses of my own sometimes, and I just now I am impelled to suggest that we should arrange ourselves around the sides in front of the wagon. Come! We have in this little basket to unpack a little here are the cups of hot tea."

They were soon off again, out on the top of the hill. The wind swept waste like an army of iron horses. Of itself it had awakened it to the fact that the day was really done, and that a rough night was at hand. The conversation was possible in the lumbering wagon, but it was a wearying conversation. The talk was about the old stories of the moon and the stars. It was a darker and darker talk, the wind was stronger and colder. At times the stars were visible in the flying blue lines of the heavens, disappearing off the black light. That was all they saw of the sunset, the rest was darkness, with its weeping, a sense of a vast desolation, stark world.

When the sun came down it came with full light in its own right on the canvas cover of the wagon, driving in streams over the hill to the top of the hill. Who strove to see on this hill with all the energy that was left to him. He had tried a long horn lantern and it swung from the top of the wagon throwing a full glow of light over the hill and there upon the wet horses, upon the dripping rocks upon the old hills which he looked at with a new interest to time. Outside in the vast darkness it seemed as if stars were falling, now a twinkling fire, now a stream of silent dream like city.

So the hours went by. One by one the miles were overpassed. The rain came, began again the wind went on with a new wildness, sobbing, roaring, plunging over the barren moor that was so indistinctly its own domain.

At last the wagon made a sharp turn.

There the old man shouted, "We are down to Kevengate now. We'll be at it in half an hour by nine o'clock."

"Is it not all the way?" asked Genevieve, lifting her tired head, and trying to speak so that she should not seem tired at all.

Yes, dear, Hungry Haggis is the last house we come to when the edge of the moor is passed.

The child's head did not droop again. "At that house there will be rest," she said to herself, "and there will be light and warmth, shelter, and refuge from the storm. . . . So ends the overture."

* Withering, an expression I took from the sound of the wind on the heights.

CHAPTER V.—MISS CRAVEN

*'Good my love,
I am not prone to weeping as our sex
Commonly are the want of wit is in them, Perchance, shill dry your piteous but I have
That honour it in grief in her of heart what it burns
Worse than tears do show'*

The Merchant of Venice

"DEFENCE, not defiance," whispered Genevieve, as her father lifted her down from the shaft of the waggon.

"You are equal to defence?"

"Perfectly."

The rain was pouring in torrents, old Luke was shouting to the man who had come out from the fumyul to help him, the two sheep dogs were barking, a candle was coming along the passage to the open door.

"Come in!" said a voice in tones that were hard and untroubled. "We've been expectin' y'r this five hours."

It was Miss Craven, and as Genevieve had anticipated, she spoke the direct, and she spoke it curtly, but the form of it was modified so that no impression of coarseness or ignorance was given.

Mr. Bartholomew had some directions to give to the two men, and Genevieve followed Miss Craven along a narrow dim passage with several turnings and windings in it. There was a cheery fire of peat and pine-wood burning in the parlour. The table was spread, not bountifully perhaps, but with a tempting perfection of neatness and niceness.

"I am sorry we are so late," said Genevieve, as Miss Craven turned to light the lamp without further welcome or greeting. "We have been longer on the journey than we expected to be."

"If you'd known as much as Luke Ascomb as I know you might mebbe ha' thought 'at you'd done well to get here at all," rejoined Miss Craven, carefully adjusting the chimney of the lamp as she spoke. This done, she lifted her keen dark eyes to Genevieve's face for the first time. Her look was quite inscrutable. It was impossible to say what impression she was receiving. After an unflinching moment or two, Genevieve's eyelids drooped a little, and a pink flush came over her face, increasing its extreme loveliness. "So you're Noel Bartholomew's daughter?" said Miss Craven, in tones that were as little as he understood by a young man as was the expression of her countenance.

"Yes," Genevieve said with a smile. "I dare say I am a surprise to you. You would not expect to see me so—so much grown up?"

"Miss Craven shall tell you how much surprised she feels to-morrow, dear," said Mr. Bartholomew, coming into the room and offering his hand to Miss Craven's unresponsive touch. "How are you?" he asked, "and your father and mother, how are they?"

"They're much as usual."

"And you think it is not worth while to answer my inquiry about yourself? That is true. And I have so many inquiries to make. But we will have some tea first, please Genevieve, this used to be my favourite arm-chair. Let me see how you look in it?" The girl sank into the chair with unmistakable weariness. Miss Craven disappeared to fetch the tea. "Let me take your hat off, dear," said her father, raising her head gently, then he unfastened her cloak. She had a pale red dress underneath, a soft warm-coloured clinging cashmere, with creamy lace about the throat and wrists.

"I feel too stupid to care for a little disorder to-night," she said, giving a tired glance at herself.

"But disorder is the order of the day. You are not going to forget London ways so soon?"

"No, I am going to forget nothing. I am going to add to my store of memories. By the way, I like this room. I wish we were going to stay here."

Fortunately for Genevieve this last remark was overheard by Miss Craven, who was entering the room with tea, toast, warm cake, ham and eggs. She was proud of the old parlour. There were samplers hanging on the painted panels, rosaries of satin ribbon, white and green and blue, each with a ticket to it, framed and glazed and hanging over the fireplace. These, Genevieve learnt later, were evidences that once upon a time prize cattle had been reared at Hunsparth Haggis. Poor old Craven had been as proud of them as a soldier of his Victoria Cross, or a curate of his silver tea pot. Not the best picture that ever was painted could have given half the satisfaction that these scraps of satin ribbon had given.

A few of Mr. Bartholomew's sketches of twenty years ago hung on either side; but the general opinion of the neighbourhood had gone so decidedly against them that even Mr. Craven hardly tried to have them hanging there. They were water-colours, little ethereal impressions of mist, light, colour, and unusual effects of dawn or sunset such efforts as blot out all details and even actual form. Miss Craven had had her own ideas concerning these, and her ideas had been confirmed by her neighbours, so that she was hardly to be wondered at that she should have no very exalted views of Mr Bartholomew's powers as an artist. Indeed it may be doubted whether she had exalted views of any artist or of any art, and she had long ago given it as her opinion that "of all easy ways o' gettin' a livin' paintin' pictures was about the laziest."

"And now," said Mr Bartholomew, the edge of his appetite being dulled a little, "and now tell me, Miss Craven, what important changes have taken place in the neighbourhood of Murk-Marshes during all these years? I know nothing, and I am impatient to know."

Somewhat to Genevieve's surprise, Dorothy had placed herself at the head of the table without invitation. Miss Craven's idea of having "lodgers" differed materially from Miss Bartholomew's views on the same subject. Genevieve was by no means sorry, she liked it on the whole, and Miss Craven was attentive, if not urbane. Moreover she looked in keeping with the room, with the general atmosphere of things, as she sat there. She wore no cap, her dark hair was still dark, Genevieve's prediction notwithstanding, and she had a fine open air colour on her cheek. She seemed to typify the northern autumn in the bright keen austerity of her appearance and manner.

Miss Craven did not reply at once to Mr. Bartholomew's request for information. She seemed to be considering the matter.

"It's over twenty years since you left Murk-Marshes, isn't it?" she inquired, handing him another cup of tea.

"Yes, a month or two over."

"And you asked what important changes there'd been?"

"I think I did."

"Well, then, so far as I can recollect there hasn't a single thing happened important enough to mention."

"Happy place!"

"I've said myself 'at it were like a better place, for there's neither murrin' nor givin' i' marriage, an' the folks don't die."

"What should you say to staying here altogether, Genevieve, dear?" asked Mr Bartholomew, turning to his daughter.

"I say that it sounds temptin'."

"I should like to hear you say the truth about it six months after this," said Dorothy, giving Miss Bartholomew one of her sharp, half scornful glances.

"I will promise if you like," replied Genevieve, "my father will answer for my unreserve."

"So I will, dear, at the same time recommending caution. For real passionate caring for one's own little puce à terre commend me to a Yorkshire man or woman. But really, Miss Craven, has the world about Murk-Marshes stood as still as you seem to think it has? What of your neighbours, the Broughs of Hawklands?"

"They are the Hawklands yet."

"And the Lan-thwanes of Lowmoor Crows?"

"Are at Lowmoor Crows still."

"Are you disposed to admit that any of these people are older?"

"Yes, they are all twenty years older. Some of them look it, and some of them don't. For the most part you will find they don't."

"That I can readily believe," said Mr Bartholomew, knowing that he need not trouble himself to make the compliment too obvious.

There was a pause, and it seemed to Miss Craven that the next inquiry was made with effort. Perhaps she looked for some.

"And the Richmonds of Yarell Croft, of course they are at Yarell Croft still? I thought I think I remember hearing a few years ago that Miss Richmond was married."

"I don't reckon Yarell Croft to be i' the Murk-Marshes township," said Miss Dorothy with an extra touch of asperity, which might perhaps be accounted for by the fact that the Hunsgarth Hags Farm belonged to the Richmonds. "Yarell Croft lies across the beck, an' there's been changes anoth' there, but that change wasn't one o' them. Miss Richmond's Mrs Richmond yet, an' likely to be i' all be true 'at folks say 'er temper."

"But the other changes you spoke of?" said Mr Bartholomew, not apparently wishing to discuss Miss Richmond's feelings.

I meant old Mr Richmond's death, said Miss Craven, watching her interlocutor more cautiously than before. "He died three or four years back quite sudden, an' his wife only lived a fortnight after."

Then is there no one but Miss Richmond at Yarell now?"

"Miss Richmond an' her brother, Mr Cecil. There was a little boy, you remember?"

"Ah, yes, I do remember now. He was a shy, delicate, fretful little fellow. I used to think that he wouldn't live."

"He has lived, it's about three years since he came of age."

"And he and his sister live alone at Yarrall Croft? It must be a little dull for him, I should say. How does he spend his time?"

"Shootin' sparrows with a saloon pistol," said Miss Craven with one of her most satirical smiles.

"I never thought to hear that said of a Yorkshire gentleman," interposed Genevieve, whose interest in the conversation was not to be measured by the number of her interjections.

"You'll not hear it twice in your lifetime," replied Miss Craven.

"And what of Ussell Hill?" asked Mr. Bartholomew presently. "I forget the owner's name. I believe he was a mere boy. He was on the Continent till the time I was down here."

"Mr. Kirkowald? He's mostly on the Continent. It was him that was engaged to Miss Richmond. Nobody even knew exactly how it happened that the engagement came to nothing, but it did come to nothing. An' he went abroad agin an' he's been abroad ever since. Once or twice he's come home unexpectedly, an' stopped a week or so, but it seems as if he couldn't settle. He's allus off again directly."

"And Mr. Crudas?" I must not forget him," said Mr. Bartholomew, occupying him self intently with the pattern of his teacup.

The slow hot flush that swept over Miss Craven's face, mounting to the very roots of her hair, was evidently a flush of pain.

"I know nothing of Ishmael Crudas," she said curtly, "an' I don't want to know. I reckon you'd find him at Swarthcliff Top if you wanted him."

"I forget there is any one else," Mr. Bartholomew went on musingly, as if he were merely speaking. He gave Miss Craven time to recover herself. "Canon Gabriel is living still, I am thankful to say. I had a letter from him only last week. I think I have some dread of meeting him. He looked so worn, so frail twenty years ago."

"You needn't have much dread," said Miss Craven with less asperity of tone. "I saw him when I was over at Thirkeld Abbas last week, an' he looked exactly as he's looked ever since he came into this neighbourhood. He's got a new curate lately, a Mr. Severne. He's not much of a preacher. They were saying doom at t' Marshes o' Sunday 'at this was his first place, an' t' Canon had got him cheap."

Mr. Bartholomew glanced at his daughter, and the quiet amusement in his glance met with a response, but it was such a very sleepy response that Miss Craven was requested to show her to her room without further delay. Miss Craven was not sorry to do so. "I'm allus i' bed two hours alone this time," she said, leading the way to a long low room hung with blue and white linen in large staring checks. There was a mingled odour of apples and clean linen, the yellow walls were decorated with framed funeral cards, the tiny mantel-shelf, the top of the drawers, the one little table, were covered with exquisite old china. Weary as Genevieve was she could not help expressing her admiration of the dainty egg-shell cups and saucers, the odd shaped tea-pots on stands to match, the curious dishes, the various punch-bowls. "I shall fancy myself among the art treasures at South Kensington when I awake in the morning," the girl said delightedly.

Dorothy lingered a little, mollified, but undecided, then uttering an abrupt "Good night" she went away. For days past she had been nourishing something that was half an aversion, half a dream, of the London fine lady who was to enter her house, live in her rooms, be waited upon by her own hands,—for Miss Craven had kept no woman servant for years past. She was fighting a braver battle than the world knew, fighting with bad harvests, poor land, exhausted capital, abounding game, and a hard, indifferent landlord. Her father's advice was of no use to her now. Ten years before, the loss of a splendid flock of moorland sheep—over two hundred of them—in a heavy snowstorm, had unstrung the old man's brain for ever. And now his wife's memory was fast failing, so that in addition to all other labours and sorrows Dorothy had two helpless old people to tend and care for, and ceaselessly watch, and the service was not offered by measure, nor untenderly.

Of these and other troubles Genevieve knew nothing as yet. She only saw that there was something about Miss Craven not to be understood all at once, and she had already a strong impression that it was something she ought to desire to understand. "I think she is enduring some trial—enduring secretly," the girl said to herself, as she lay listening in the dark to the rain that was on the roof, and the fitful wuthering of the night wind. All else about the farm was hushed and still.

CHAPTER VI.—LAST YEAR'S SNOW.

"O let me not be shaid, not me! I need no hauger!
 Aye, p' me, my hamper! I would not be shaid!"

King Lear

THE fold-yard being at the back of the house, Genevieve slept on past cock crow, past milking time, past the noisy feeding-time of calves and fowls, past the shouting and confusion of old Luke Acorn's departure. When she awoke the sun was shining, gleaming brightly over field and farm, over hill and dale, and ah!—was it possible?—over a distance of wide, cloudless, dark blue sea!

"This, then, was one of your surprises, my father!" she exclaimed, gliding down the little garden path to the gate where Mr. Bartholomew stood. The scent of southernwood and mint and pennyroyal was in the air, gossamer-threads all hung with diamonds stretched across the one rose-bush and the fuchsia-tree, a last pansy held up its head over the creeping stonecrop.

"You forgive me, then?"

"For keeping the secret? Yes, indeed. I thought we were miles and miles from the sea. Think of it—of having both sea and moor, and nothing but these green hills and hollows dropping downward between!"

"What distance should you say these hills and hollows represent?" asked Mr. Bartholomew, speaking in the slow, impressive tones which he used even when there was nothing to be impressed.

"Two miles?" ventured Genevieve.

"Probably three, as the crow flies, and certainly four or five by the high road."

"So much? But I see, there is more between us and the edge of the cliff than one takes in at a glance. There is a village to the left."

"This one, almost at our feet? It is Munk-Marishes—the hamlet of Munk-Marishes—the parish seems to extend indefinitely on this side. A mile or two beyond—over that sedgy flat—you see a large village, that is Thirfield Abbas. They speak of it as 'the town.' You will have to do your shopping there."

"Delightful! We will go and buy something to-day—something that will be useful for the cottage . . . Can we see the cottage from here?"

Mr. Bartholomew turned to the northward "I can see the chimneys and the top of the thatched gable," he said. "They are there, on the slope of the hill, about half-way between here and Munk-Marishes. That tree hides the cottage. It used to be rather a picturesque little place. We will go and see it as soon after breakfast as you like."

Miss Craven did not preclude the breakfast-table. "She had had her breakfast four hours ago," she said with a smile that was not altogether one of amusement. "Besides, it is charming day," she added, as if to account for her broad white apron, and her lilac print bonnet. She had taken in at a glance Genevieve's soft creamy grey dress, with its details of finish and style. "To think o' coming down-stairs in a gown like that first thing of a morning!" she said to herself as she went back to the dairy. "She does look a helpless, useless sort o' thing, with her yellow hair, an' her finery, an' her white hands, she's fit for nothing but a wax work show! I wonder how many pictures he'll ha' to print to keep her 'clothes for a twelve-month?"

Dorothy Craven was not musing idly, the churn was flying round at the rate of fifty turns a minute, and she was listening carefully, all the while to the sound it made. The butter was beginning to come, the butter-milk had to be let off every few minutes now; it was always passed carefully through a hair sieve, and the crumbly of butter returned to the churn. Dorothy was proud of her butter, proud, too, of the cool, sweet dairy, with its shining pans and its white, scoured wood-work. Consequently she felt no annoyance when she saw Genevieve standing somewhat timidly near the door.

"May I come in, Miss Craven?" she asked in her gentlest tone. "I have never seen a dairy. And my father wishes to know if you will be too busy to go with us to Netherbank to see the cottage to-day."

"You can go with yourselves," answered Dorothy without looking up, she was replacing the peg in the churn.

"We can, but we should like it better if you will come with us. You can explain things, and advise us. I am hoping that you will be kind enough to tell me and teach me a great deal."

Dorothy ignored the hope, she was thinking of her own reasons for wishing to go down to the cottage, wondering how she could manage it.

"I couldn't go till I have got the butter made up," she said. "An' then there's other things."

"Can I help you in any way? . . . Let me try," said Genevieve, a little roused by Miss Craven's glance and smile. "At least, I can remove our breakfast things, if you will let me go into the kitchen."

"You can go anywhere you like," said

GOOD WORDS

Dorothy, half disdainfully, as she began churning again ■ least as vigorously as before. When she stopped again she could hear voices in the kitchen. Her father was talking, Genevieve was answering, old Mrs Craven was dropping murmurs of confirmation, she had got up to make a little curtsey when Genevieve went in, and her husband had touched his thin white locks, smiling, wondering, apparently half amazed.

"Eh, but it's a bonny feace!" he said in tones of childish delight. "An' it's bonny gold hair, an' a bonny goon! . . . Isn't it a bonny feace, Barbara?" Then, suddenly his tone changed, and his face seemed to change too. "You mustn't go out o' doors wi' that goon on, honey, nut it day. It's goin' to snaw. It allus snaws on Langbarugh Moor. Don't go out o' doors to day, honey."

"You'll frighten t' young lady, Joseph," said poor Mrs Craven in meek tones. She was knitting a grey stocking, she had sat there in the wide chimney corner knitting grey stockings for years past now. It was a cosy and quiet nook for the two old people. A turf fire smouldered on the large hearthstone, a kettle swung from the crook, there was an old oak dresser opposite, on which were ranged the shining brass and copper pans, the pewter dishes, the old willow patterned plates. These things seemed to speak, to tell of prosperous days, of substance, of success. Other things whispered contradiction. Were the whispers growing louder as the days went by?

Genevieve went in and out, little by little old Craven told his piteous tale of the sudden snow storm, the loss of the ewes, and the uncleaned lambs. It was not the money loss he spoke of now—that had passed out of his mind—it was the suffering of the dumb surprised creatures, the cruelty of the driving snow, the treacherousness of the hollows of Langbarugh Moor.

"Ya'll nut goa oot, honey—ya'll nut goa on te t' moor to day," he went on pleading. "It's sure to snaw afore neet. T' snaws allus driftin' ower Langbarugh Moor."

It was almost noon when Genevieve, Miss Craven, and Mr Bartholomew set out to inspect the cottage. Dorothy had given Genevieve a moment's surprise when she came down stairs dressed for the little expedition. Her silver grey alpaca dress—she called it a lustre, her black silk mantle, her small grey straw bonnet relieved with pink ribbons had wrought quite a transformation. If Genevieve had dared, she would have said, "How young you look! and how pretty!"

It was evident that Miss Craven knew not only what to wear, but how to wear the things she had. None of these were of yesterday. Many a summer Sunday evening had seen them carefully folded away, but to the last they would have the virtues of fitness and conscientiousness.

Old Joseph came out ■ the door as they were starting.

"You're goin' out o' doors then, honey?" he said to Genevieve, who stopped to listen with a sad smile. "You're bent o' goin' then, but be quick back again. It's goin' to snaw. Night an' day t' snaws driftin' ower Langbarugh Moor."

Dorothy was moving away, but not impatiently. She was a little anxious this morning. She was to be Mr Bartholomew's landlady, if he decided to take the cottage. It had been let on lease with the farm for generations. Lately, since it had stood empty so much, Miss Craven had tried to get rid of it, but Miss Richmond would not hear of change. It was always Miss Richmond's name that the agent, Mr Damer, used, never Mr Richmond's, so that the people of the neighbourhood had no clear idea of the real ownership of the various portions of the Yarell Croft estate.

Mr Bartholomew remembered that a doctor's widow had lived in the cottage twenty years ago. After that a cartwright had taken it, who had built himself a workshop in the orchard, and after his departure it had stood empty so long that Miss Craven, half-despairing of letting it in any other way, had furnished it to suit an eccentric old man, who had offered to pay a somewhat liberal rent for a furnished cottage, providing ■ was a mile away from any other human dwelling.

The cottage at Netherbank was barely half a mile from Hungarth Hags, and but very little farther from Mark Marishes. Still, it stood alone, and was quiet enough to please even the eccentric stranger. Unfortunately, however, for Miss Craven, he did not remain more than a couple of years—not long enough to cover the outlay he had caused her to make, and the idea of any one else ever requiring a furnished cottage at Netherbank had been considered rather in the light ■ a joke in the neighbourhood of Mark Marishes. Dorothy knew well that the coming of the Bartholomews was an unexpectedly favourable turn of fortune's wheel.

It was ■ steep and rugged road that led down and from the Hags. There were low rude stone walls on either hand, patches of golden rignwort grew by the wayside, dense bramble-brakes were spreading everywhere, the amber and vermilion leaves throwing into relief the great clusters of ripe purple-black fruit. Now and then a spray flung itself aloft, waving in the sunshine against the far distance of dark blue sea and sky.

"I wish I could bring a hundred little gutter children from the London slums to this hillside to-day," Genevieve said, as they came to a sharp turn in the road—the ripe brambles seemed to cluster more thickly than ever in the sheltered corner by the wall. "It seems such a pity," she continued, "that the blackberries should wither here ungathered when there are so many little fingers that have never gathered one, so many little lips that have never been stained by one . . . Wait! my ship comes into port. There shall be a feast day!"

A minute later her eye rested on the thatched cottage that was to be her home. No cloud shadow was upon it, there was no sudden chill in the air. A flight of white pigeons were just settling upon the roof.

CHAPTER VII.—A SCENE OF PROBATION.

"I foretold and I could foretell
Thy future portion, sure and well—
If in thine passionate eyes I could trace
And let them say what thine end shall be."
—Shakespeare, The Taming of the Shrew

"A COTTAGE in a corn-field and a picturesque stile where the gate should be!" exclaimed Genevieve in pleased surprise.

"I shouldn't ha' thought 'at you'd ha' known 'at stubble meant corn," said Miss Craven with the touch of disdain that she seemed to have adopted for special use when she spoke to Genevieve. "As for the stile, it's the awkwardest stile in the district. I've asked Mr. Darnley to put a gate up till I'm tired o' askin' him."

Certainly the stile was an awkward one, and the path through the field was narrow, midway it turned at a sharp angle in the direction of the cottage. Just at the turn, a great covey of partridges started outwards with a sudden burst, and went whirring and fluttering up the stubble to the wide furry pasture that skirted the moor.

"Will one be liable to that kind of thing?" asked Genevieve, with a little pretence of being startled.

"Exceedingly liable," said Mr. Bartholomew. "If you think it will be a drawback to residence at Netherbank you must speak before it is too late."

"I will resign myself to the partridges," replied Genevieve, coming to a standstill in front of the cottage. Certainly it was as rude and quaint a little place as you could see. The heavy ling thatch hung low over window and wall, the broad chimney of undressed stone was built outside, and stood like a tall buttress picturesquely designed for the thatch to lean against and the winding ivy cling to, the purple brown boughs of the fading ash tree dropped upon the roof, creepers hung fading and yellowing about the deep recesses of the windows. The garden, a tiny unfenced patch of ground between the cottage and the stubble field, displayed a fine crop of the crimson spikes of the dock sorrel, sweet herbs crept about in tangled masses, a solitary pale pink hollyhock grew at the foot of the rough stone steps that led up to the cottage door.

"What do you think so far?" asked Mr. Bartholomew a little anxiously, all the morning he had been more or less anxious.

"So far I think it is charming," Genevieve answered with enthusiasm. "Perhaps it is even too charming, since it is not in the nature of things to be consistent."

"Well, that's just what I'm frightened of," said Miss Craven, unlocking the door. It opened straight into the kitchen. There was the usual broad grates hearthstone, elevated some inches above the flagged floor, the usual wide chimney, the usual "rackon-crook" of the district. A dresser with a half-filled plate-rack stood opposite to the window, a white scoured table, with a few rush-bottomed chairs, completed the furniture of this characteristic apartment.

A door on the left opened into the one sitting-room, which Miss Craven had done her best to make as attractive as might be. And the mid-day sun, slanting through the diamond panes, certainly fell upon some touching evidences of Dorothy's desire and power to make the best of things.

Her finest geraniums—one and all—stood in the two deep window-sills. Among them were fuchsias still in bloom, a thriving lemon-plum, a little dark leaved rose-tree. The mantel-shelf held some of the same exquisite old china that Genevieve had admired at the Higgs; round the room were ranged some four or five old oak chairs; and, wonderful to say, the deep recesses were filled with empty book shelves.

"Mr. Quale put 'em up at his own expense," said Dorothy. "Simon Frost put 'em up for him, an' he made him this thing, a cabinet, he called it, to put his lumps o' stone an' bits o' broken pot into. Folks about here reckoned he was gettin' childish, but when you came to talk to him you soon found out that there was a meanin' in his childishness. Why, he'd bits o' queer pottery 'at he'd picked up i' this very field, 'at he swi' had been hid there ever since the Romans camped up yonder on Langharugh Moor."

Genevieve was taking rapid notes of the capabilities of the little place, it could soon be made home like and comfortable. She raised no doubt, even where doubts might have been raised, and Dorothy was almost moved to gratitude by the reasonable silences and lightsome little speeches, which perhaps she only half understood. She had not thought that this fine princess would have accepted so readily an exile that included such conditions as sleeping rooms under the bare sloping thatch, and a diamond paned window under her dressing table instead of over it. Dorothy was not unused to the idea of self-sacrifice, nevertheless she began to suspect its existence in Genevieve Bartholomew with surprise.

The orchard was at the back of the cottage. There was a door opening out of the kitchen, a little flight of grass-grown steps with a hand rail, and underneath the gnarled boughs of the apple trees there was an old draw well, with its moss-grown bucket, its worn handle and its red rusty chain.

"Here!" said Genevieve, "I have always said that some day there would come to me a sudden longing to be an artist. The moment has come. The draw-well is my fate. Let me sit on the steps and contemplate that green bucket and my future existence."

"I will have no rival under my own roof, besides, I am sure the studio will not accommodate two artists," said Mr. Bartholomew, walking down the orchard path to the joiner's workshop, which stood beyond the fruit-laden trees.

"I should say it was quite as good a place as the barn that Landseer made into a studio at John's Wood," said Genevieve, following Miss Craven into the big, bare looking workshop, and, truth to say, it did not promise ill. There was space enough, light enough, and it appeared to be at least weather-proof.

Some business matters between Miss Craven and Mr. Bartholomew were settled then and there, while Genevieve wandered about ankle-deep amongst the tall grasses that were quivering and whitening under the bending boughs. A robin was chirping out his bright autumn notes overhead, apples came tumbling down unexpectedly, some mild-eyed cattle were looking over the hedge.

"I shall design a frieze for the studio from this," said Mr. Bartholomew, coming back up the path. "It shall be an interweaving of red checked apples on lichen-covered boughs, and golden-haired maidens by moss-covered wells."

Genevieve made answer in lively phrase, she hardly knew what it was that she was saying. She was wondering how long it was since she had heard her father speak of any artistic thing he meant to do in such tones as these. True, it was but a small thing—the straw to show which way the current was setting, and the current was setting rightly, so much at least was evident.

How quickly it had all been done! A short walk in the October sunshine, a saunter round a cottage, through an apple orchard, and the future was determined. Here was a home, a place to live so much life in, work so much work, suffer so much, hope so much, grow so much. Everything looked fair, the fairest looked possible. The outer and apparent narrowness and staidness of things held no threat of a corresponding strictness of soul, rather was it otherwise. Here, if anywhere, was room for a soul to expand to its own full growth, unbruised by contact with souls whose growth means hardening. The very air had promise in it, and the sunshine stirred the veins of life till the mere prospect of living was a bountiful god.

"And now, dear, I have been recollecting myself," said Mr. Bartholomew when they were once more in the lane. "I have remembered the fagging day you had yesterday, and have decided that you shall go back with Miss Craven, and rest till dinner-time. I am going over to Thirkeld Abbas to see Canon Gabriel."

"And I am not to go with you?"

Mr. Bartholomew understood the tone, appreciated the effort that graceful obedience required. But apart from the reason he had given, he had enough motive for his decision. He had a natural desire to be alone as he passed through Murk Marshes. The place was full of associations. Memory would meet him in the village street, "holding the folded annals of his youth." Regret would seal his lip with her silent finger.

"You'll Uselby Hall," said Dorothy as she and Genevieve went upward by a shorter path through the fields. Miss Craven was indicating a dark purple point, a mere jagged edge of the moorland, so far as Genevieve could see. The point was the farthest point of Uselby Crag, and the house stood just below among the almost leafless trees, but being at least two miles distant there was little to be seen of it from Netherbank.

"It seems a bleak place for any one to live in," said Genevieve, not much interested in what she was saying.

"So it is," replied Miss Craven, "only nobody does live in it, except old Ben Charlock and Jacl. I don't suppose Mr Kirkoswald will ever come there again to live—not for any length of time. When he was younger he seemed quite fond o' this country. He wrote a book—a poetry book—'Northern Wood Notes,' ■ called it, an' you'd ha' thought 'at he cared more for Usselby Crags an' Langharugh Moor than for all the foreign countries i' the world put together. I've heard say 'at he's shamed o' some o' them poems now. He was only a lad, just fresh from Oxford, when he wrote them. He's written another book since—not poetry, it's something about philosophy—'The Philosophy of Culture,' I think it's called. I saw it once in a bookseller's shop over at Market Studley. But I could make nothing of it, it was over far-learn't for me. It's curus 'at he never puts no name to his books—nothing but his initials, 'G. K.', for I've heard Canon Gabriel say 'at he was a first rate scholar, an' might do anything he likes so far as book-learnin' went."

So Miss Craven ran on, much to Genevieve's satisfaction, since it appeared to be an evidence of conciliatory intention. And Genevieve had the rare merit of being a good listener. Many a time—as now, for instance—she listened for sympathy's sake until she found herself listening for her own pleasure and interest, for after all it was something to know that any fine morning might bring them a neighbour whom it might be good to meet in the intellectual sparseness of Murk-Marishes.

CHAPTER VII.—SIRKISGILL GILL.

"'Tis half I seemed to recognise some track
Of mischief happened to me. God knows who it is—
Is a bad dream perhaps?"
ROBERT BROWNING.

MEANWHILE Noel Bartholomew was going on his way, suffering a quieter sadness than he had prepared himself to suffer. No agitations beset him as he passed through the "long unlovely street" of the low-lying hamlet. There was the door where his heart was used to beat; it was the door of a small dark house under some trees. It was empty now, and falling fast into ruin. This was well.

That past history of his was not romantic, as people count romance in these days. It all passed through his brain in a few moments as he stood there by the little gate that was dropping to the ground for very age.

He had been lodging at Hunsghar Hagg, painting, studying, dreaming, for two long summers, when his first met Clarice Brooke.

It only seemed like yesterday that he had sat there by the hedgeway sketching rapidly, eagerly, not noting the storm that was coming over the moor. Suddenly it burst upon him. The nearest shelter was the house under the trees, and before he could enter the porch the door was opened for him by a tall, slight girl dressed in deep mourning, who had evidently been weeping. The tears were wet on her eyelids, even as she smiled her welcome; and, perhaps, she would hardly have cared to smile at all if she had not seen that the stranger was almost as shy as herself. . . . That was the beginning—tears, sympathy, a sweet smile, a sudden compassion.

Clarice Brooke was the daughter of an architect, who had gone to his grave worn out with failure, and the sorrow and shame of failure, leaving his only child to the untender mercies of an elderly cousin of her mother's, her sole relative so far as she knew. When Miss Peters died, her annuity dying with her, Noel Bartholomew was thankful to the core of him that he was able to offer a home, a name, and a life's deep love to the woman whose love had been his from the day that her eyes first fell upon him. It came in the end to be such love as he had half despaired of winning, and he knew well that in winning ■ he had won life's best and greatest prize. Till the day of her death he had held no other view than this, and the difference death had made was the difference of love's increase rather than of love's change or ending.

After standing there a while, thinking, yearning, fighting with the strong, silent despair that had never left him for one waking hour, he passed on, turning away by the road that led through the red, y marsh to Thurlkeld Abbas. The little town looked exactly as it had always looked. Canon Gabriel's house was there by the church, the old clock in the tower was chiming the quarters as sweetly as ever. A young clergyman was coming out by the vestry door. He blushed with surprise at the sight of a stranger in the streets of Thurlkeld Abbas.

"Mr. Severne, I believe? May I introduce myself? My name is Bartholomew," said the stranger courteously, hoping to overcome the young curate's deepening confusion; but it was not to ■ lightly overcome.

"Oh, I say!" exclaimed the young man, with another and a deeper blush, and a smile that was, perhaps, more than adequate to the occasion, "Canon Gabriel will be sorry—he'll be awfully sorry. He's gone ■ Market-Stradly ■ a Ruri decanal meeting. But won't you come in? Won't you have some luncheon or—or something?"

"I thank you not to day," said Mr. Bartholomew. "I shall be over to-morrow most likely, or the next day, when I hope to have the pleasure of seeing the Canon, and of meeting you again. I expect that we shall be very dependent upon our neighbours—my daughter and I."

"Shall you?—shall you really?" exclaimed the young man, opening his blue eyes in surprise. "I say, that is good news!" He was blushing still, or blushing again, it is difficult to know exactly which to say. The last impression Mr. Bartholomew had of him was an impression of a deep crimson blush, a smile that was almost a laugh from very nervousness, and an intensely clerical low-crowned hat.

"Nevertheless there is a charm about the boy," Noel Bartholomew said to himself as he went onward through the street. He would not ■ back the same way again. There were ways enough to choose from.

It was afternoon now, but the sun went on shining brightly, warmly. It was like a mild April day with touches of September wisdom in it. To a man who had been in London all the summer the feeling of emancipation came with a freshness and a fulness hardly to be comprehended except by experience. The blue air, the soft wind, the silence, the solitude were as so many enchantments, leading him on and on, by field and road and marsh and farm till his senses were lulled to a kind of dreamful, placid acceptance of all things that were, or had been, or should be. Why make any moan in such a world?

Presently he perceived that he had gone farther than he had intended. It was no matter. There was the path up through Larkrigg Gill to the moor, and he could soon skirt the edge of the moor and drop downward to the Haags. . . . Was the time seeming long to Genevieve?

So he went on under the yellow leaves, down into the bottom of the Gill, where the beck ran swiftly toward the sea, gurgling round and under the great green boulders, over the many-tinted stones. Glossy fronds of hart's tongue fern curved gracefully by the water's edge, the scarlet berries of the cuckoo-pint made rich contrast among the various greenery of the undergrowth, the primrose leaves were fading among the dead pine-needles that strewed the ground, rich russet-tinted fir-cones were dropping noiselessly into the soft carpet. The light breeze was hushed down there, all was silent save the soothing murmur of the little stream.

Was it a dream? Was ■ a poem? A minute more, a sudden turn in the path, and he stood in the presence of a living picture.

A good picture flashes itself upon your senses in all its entirety at a single glance, in one moment your conception is made. Important details may remain to be considered, but they do not affect that first forceful impression. So forceful was it in this case that Noel Bartholomew stood still, arrested by a figure as strikingly picturesque as any he had ever placed on canvas in his life. ■ was the figure of a lady attired in a sweeping drapery of pale pink serge. She was below the road, sitting on one of the large stones by the side of the stream. Her hat was lying among the ferns behind her; an Indian shawl of glowing colour fell from her shoulders, her white arm, only half-concealed by the soft lace that edged her sleeve, was thrown outwards, so that her hand touched lightly a spray of not-yet leafless honeysuckle. The dark head, resting on the other hand, was turned a little upward, so that the face, with all its beauty of olive tint, of full rich curve, of vivid expression, was seen to the utmost advantage. It was a beauty that was startling, there was something strange in it, something perplexing.

In that moment of surprise Noel Bartholomew was not conscious of any admiration, perplexing or other. As was usual with him, he could not throw off the dreamful mood he had been in all at once. There was always an interval between absence and presence of mind. It might be that the interval was longer than usual this time. As ■ has been said, he stood still a few seconds while a confused sense of recognition was stealing over him. Then he simply raised his hat, as much by way of apology for intrusion as by way of salutation, and passed on, saying to himself, "It is Miss Richmond, certainly, it is Miss Richmond!"

Once he fancied that a little sound came after him through the trees, a sound as of a musical, mocking, audible something that might ■ a spoken word, or might be a mere echo of a word, or even a mere memory of one reverberating across the unforgotten years. Vague as it was it haunted him all along the edge of Langbarough Moor.

HELLEN'S TOWER, here I stand,
 Dominant over sea and land.
 Son's love built me, and I hold Mother's love engraved in gold.
 Love is in and out of time,
 I am mortal stone and lime
 Would my gran'te girth were strong
 As either love, to last as long,
 I should wear my crown entire
 To and thro' the Doomsday fire,
 And be found of angel eyes
 In earth's recurring Paradise.

A. LENNYSON.

HALFWAY up Belfast Lough, on the high ground to the left, you may see a remarkable landmark. This is Helen's Tower, built by the present Earl of Dufferin as a tribute of filial affection to his mother, the late Countess of Gifford, and formally named after her on attaining his majority.

Looking across from the grey old walls of Carrickteigun, it may be seen crowning the highest hill on the Claudeboye estate. Clear cut against the sky, there it stands, lashed by the winds or touched by the sun, ever firm and enduring—a fitting memorial of one of the best and noblest of women.

Lady Gifford was a Shendean, one to whom wit and beauty came as natural gifts, yet one who dipped deeply into the font of human knowledge, and by pure sympathy with all that was good and beautiful in life, exerted a lasting influence on all those whose privilege it was to know her.

A short drive from Bangor, or, still better, a pleasant two mile stretch across the turf from Claudeboye House, will bring you to the foot of the hill. Here, glimmering amid ferns, sedges, birches, and firs, very calm and peaceful on a golden autumn day, with Helen's Tower reflected on its face, is a quiet lake. Then a smart climb through a fir wood, and the Tower—a veritable Scotch tower, with "corbel stairs and jutting turrets all complete—is before you

At the basement live the old keeper with his wife, and here after inscribing your name in the visitors book you follow him up the stone steps

The sleeping chamber first A cosy little room remarkable for the fine specimen of French embroidery which decorates the bedstead with the quaint inscription on the tester—

*I slightly tick my nose my tent
A dry's mark is never home*

From here you are taken to the top

Looking east on a clear day the view is superb From the rudeboy woods and lakes, Belfast Lough and the Antrim hills on the left the eye sweeps round to Cantire and the Scotch coast, till distance is lost in the dim range of Cumberland hills

Descending again, we enter the principal chamber—octagonal oak panelled, with gilded pointed ceiling and stained glass windows On these are numerous quaint designs, intermixed with the signs of the zodiac, showing the pursuits of mankind during the progress of the seasons—from the sturdy sower of spring, to the shrivelled old man warming his toes by the winter fire Over the fireplace is a niche for a silver lamp and flanking the west window are two poetical inscriptions—that on the left, printed in gold and having reference to the lamp is by Lord Dufferin's mother, and that on the right printed in bold black type is by the poet laureate

On reading Lady Clifford's graceful verses we are pathetically reminded that she was not spared to see her son's brilliant career I give them here and the laureate's sonorous lines stand at the head of this paper

CHARLES BLAKEWICK

TO

MY DEAR SON ON HIS 21ST BIRTHDAY

With a Silver Lamp

I AM LATE

How shall I bless thee? Human I love

■ all too poor in passion to words!

The heart aches with a sense above

All language that the lip affords!

Therefore, a symbol shall express

My love,—a thing not rare nor strange

But yet—eternal—measureless—

Knowing no shadow and no change!

I fight! which of all the lovely shows

To our poor world of shadows given,

The fervent Prophet voices chose

Alone—is attribute of Heaven!

At a most solemn pause we stand!

From this dry forth, for evermore,

The weak but loving human hand

Must cease to guide thee as of yore!

Then is through life thy footsteps stay

And earthly beacons dimly shine,

' Let there be Light upon thy way,

And holier guidance far than mine

Let there be Light in thy clear soul,

When I vision tempts or doubts assail,

When Grief's dark tempests o'er thee roll

' Let there be Light that shall not fail!

So—angel guarded—may'st thou tread

The narrow path, which few may find,

And at the end look back nor dread

To count the vanished years behind!

And pray, that she whose hand doth trace

This heart's own prayer, when life is past,

May see and know thy blessed face

In God's own glorious Light at last!

GEOLOGY AND THE DELUGE.

The Substance of a Lecture delivered in Glasgow

By HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF ARGYLL

THE question I propose to answer is this—

Is there any scientific evidence that such an event as a Deluge occurred? By that term Deluge I mean that there has been over some considerable area of the globe although not over the whole of it, a great submergence of the land under the sea. That is the first condition which geology requires. The second is that this submergence has been essentially of a temporary character. The third is that there is evidence that it has been accompanied with the destruction of animal life. The fourth is that this event has happened since the birth, or as some would rather call it, the development of Man upon the globe. It is not necessary to discuss here what may have been the causes of this Deluge. At the best, such a discussion must be purely theoretical. I only ask have we, as a matter of fact, evidence that there ever was a Deluge?

Now there is one question which I think of immense importance—namely, what does Man himself say, as a race, upon the subject? I do not refer merely to the account given in the Mosiac writings by the great prophet and lawgiver of the Jews, on whose narrative we generally found our conception of the Deluge. I am speaking of Man as a race. Does the race say anything upon this subject? It is a wonderful thing how absolute is the silence of our race on their own early history. Putting aside, of course, the Scripture narrative, which is of much later date, no whisper comes to us out of the depths of time from Man himself to tell us of his own origin, or of his own early history. Some people say this is natural enough, because Man was at first a savage. But I must frankly confess that I do not believe that theory. There is another way of accounting for it—on the supposition that Man in the childhood of the race was as we were in our individual childhood, and was possessed of that blessed unconsciousness of self which is the charm of all childhood. It does not occur to a child to write a diary of his own existence. But let no one tell me that Man was a savage when I know that the inventions of early Man were infinitely more important than those of later days, of which we are so proud. The man who drew the first spark of fire was a far greater inventor than the man who struck the first spark of electricity. Look, again, at the invention, which must have been the result of many processes, by which certain natural juices were gradually made to produce those crops upon which we all depend—those cereals which are the staple of human consumption all over the globe. We must get some other explanation of the silence of Man than that he was a savage. It must, however, be acknowledged that he has been silent concerning his own origin so far as books and writing are concerned. But it is not true that Man has been silent upon this question of a Deluge. Deeply rooted in the memories of mankind, and transmitted no doubt by early tradition from generation to generation, there is hardly a single race of a civilized character on the globe which has not some tradition respecting a Deluge. M. Lenormant, whose name is familiar in literary circles in France as that of a man of great scholarship, and of very considerable authority on the early history of nations, and who, I apprehend, like most Frenchmen of the present day, has proceeded the subject not with any view of supporting the biblical narrative, but entirely in the direction of what is called freethought thus expressed himself at the conclusion of an article which he contributed to the Contemporary Review in November, 1879—

"The result, then, of this long review authorizes us to affirm the story of the Deluge to be a universal tradition among all branches of the human race with the one exception, however, of the Irish. Now, recollection thus precise and concordant cannot be a myth voluntarily invented. No religious or cosmogonic myth presents this character of universality. It must arise from the remembrance of a real and terrible event so powerfully impressing the imagination of the first ancestors of our race, as never to have been forgotten by their descendants. This cataclysm must have occurred near the first cradle of mankind and before the dispersion of the families from which the principal races were to spring, for it would be most unprobable and unmetrical to admit that it is as many different points of the globe as we should have to assume in order to explain the wide spread of these traditions. For if phenomena so exactly alike should have occurred their memory having assumed an identical form, and preventing circumstances that need not necessarily have occurred to the mind in which they

He concludes with these words—

"But as the case now stands, we do not hesitate to declare that, far from being a myth, the Biblical Deluge is a real and historic fact, having, to say the least, left its impress on the memory of the Persians, Assyrians or Indo-European, Semites or Aryan, Arabians, Chaldeans or Kushites—that is to say, on the three great civilized races of the ancient world, those which constitute the history of humanity—before the inventors of those races had as yet separated, and in the part which they together inhabited."

It is quite possible that some persons may say, "Oh but an ancient tradition is no proof of an historical event." I do not say it is proof but it is a strong indication when it is so universal as this. And, I think, this may be said with regard to this particular tradition, that it is one very unlikely to have arisen from the imagination of mankind, because there is nothing that impresses itself so strongly upon our human experience as the stability of the land and the solidity of the ground on which we stand. I do not think it at all likely that the early races would have invented a tradition of the ocean suddenly coming up over the mountains of the globe, and so covering it, to the destruction of all life. I think the argument a very strong one, that there must have been an actual event on which such tradition rested, when we have a tradition so universal as M. Lenormant has proved it to be. That is the first fact which I bring before you. It is not a physical fact, but it is a mental fact in the history and in the memory of the human race whatever value you may attach to it. It is a fact of which you are bound to take account.

I will come now to physical facts, and I will begin by a little bit of reasoning. If the Deluge has taken place it must have been the latest event in the physical history of our globe. That is clear. Now, ■ follows as a consequence from this, that we are not to ascribe to the Deluge anything very old or very permanent in the structure of the globe, or in the formations which we see around us. We are to look for the facts of the Deluge in superficial facts—essentially superficial and transitory. And it is from an error in regard to this that I think scientific men have approached this subject hitherto with great prejudice. When geology first began to be studied—about a hundred years ago—and when ■ was first noticed that shells were to be found in solid rocks, men said that they could not believe them to be real shells, and for some time a theory prevailed that they were “sports of nature”—that they were jokes of the Creator for the purpose of deceiving Man, or for exercising his ingenuity—at all events, that they did not really represent things which had been shells, but that they were the appearances of shells, and nothing more. I am not sure that that theory lasted very long, but sure it was so manifestly absurd. Then the theory came that these shells were due to the Deluge. That was quite as absurd a theory as the other, as we see when we recollect what these shells were. In many cases they were shells which formed part of the solid stone, and were very often found on the tops of the highest mountains. We have not ■ our country many examples ■ that, because most of our mountains are made up of what are called the primitive rocks, in which there are no fossils, or a very few fossils, and these of a kind very difficult to decipher. But in many parts of Europe the mountains from the top to the bottom—higher mountains than we have here—are one successive series of strata of limestone more or less full of fossils. I remember paying a visit some twenty years ago to the Bivann Tzol. Lord Lorne and another of my sons ascended one of the highest mountains, and on their return they gave me a piece of rock broken off with a hammer, in which there was set a most beautiful and delicate shell converted into limestone, and which they had found on the summit of the Alp. It was one of the oldest shells in the world in pattern and shape; and it is a very remarkable thing that some of these shells should be alive at the present day—not the same in species but the same in generic form. It is quite possible that the early geologists would have said that that shell had been left by the Deluge, but when people came ■ look into this theory they found it untenable. Those shells were not superficial, and were not left as any Deluge would have left them. They were mineralised—imbedded into the stone in which they existed. Obviously that was the result of a very long process, and could have nothing whatever ■ do with what was called a Deluge. The result of such reasonings was that scientific men got a prejudice against the very word Deluge, they thought it ridiculous, and in scientific, as in other matters, the old theory holds true—“Give a dog a bad name and hang it.” The consequence was that no scientific man for a long time would even listen to any evidence in favour of a Deluge. Comparatively a short time ago—some twenty years ago—my own state of mind was one of entire suspense in regard to the Deluge, except as some local phenomenon which had affected the cradle of mankind, but not as an event which had ever affected any considerable area of the globe. Only within the last few years has it seemed to me that facts had been accumulating which proved there had been a great submergence of the land over a large portion of the globe, and one which really corresponded with the human traditions of the Deluge.

I must warn you against another mistake. You must not attribute to the Deluge the old sea lines which can be seen near Glasgow and in many other places. When you go down the Clyde you cannot help observing that there is an old line of cliffs on each side—sometimes rather low, and sometimes conspicuous. They are very conspicuous round the Clock Lighthouse, and they are very conspicuous near my own residence at Rosneath. It is quite obvious that the sea had for a long time been, all round the coast of Scotland, at a level 30 feet or 40 feet higher than it is now. But that had nothing to do with the Deluge. It is a good many years now since an old friend of mine—Mr. Smith of Jordanhill—discovered that the sea which washed that old sea cliff had existed under very cold conditions, and that ■ had left no end of shells. On the west side of the Island of Jura, again, there are a series of old sea-beaches which, from the fact ■ then being made of a very hard rock upon which vegetation has great difficulty in establishing itself, are as naked and as bare at this moment as if the sea left them only yesterday. I believe some of these old sea-beaches are no less than 160 feet above the level of the present sea, and it ■ therefore perfectly clear that the ocean at that time was 160 feet higher than it is now or I should rather say, that the land was 160 feet lower. You must not confound any of these phenomena with the question of the Deluge because, as I have said before, what we mean by a Deluge is not a permanent occupation by the sea making sea beaches of that land and rolling stones till they become perfectly round or perfectly oval. What we mean by a Deluge is so sudden a submergence that the sea would not have time to leave those marks and would pass off again in a comparatively short period.

I come now to another fact of importance which is immediately connected with the Deluge, and that is the submergence of the land during what is called the Glacial Period. I think I could take anyone however unacquainted he might be to geological observation or to geological reasoning, to a place within a few miles of Inverary and point out a number of facts which would convince him that the whole of our mountains, the whole of Scotland, had been lying deeper in the sea than it does now to a depth of at least 2,000 feet. The proofs are innumerable, but the most prominent proof is this: that there are constantly found on the tops of knolls and hills and generally on the tops of mountains numbers of immense boulders which are what is called 'perched.' These are generally placed on the very edge of precipices or knolls and do not belong to the rocks on which they sit. These stones were carried as they are being carried at present in Smith's Sound in the Arctic regions upon icebergs or ice floes. As the ice melted the stones were left on the knolls, and there they are to this day. One might stand on the top of these rocks and knolls and look down upon the scattered boulders just as one might look upon a rock in the sea on which some great ship had been wrecked and her cargo scattered on its surface. In the case of a ship we should probably have the timbers to testify to the catastrophe, but the timbers which carried those old rocks were not timbers of wood, but timbers of ice. They melted long ago, and all the evidence we have now is the cargo which they carried. The question immediately arises—

Was this great submergence of the land to the depth of at least 2,000 feet coincident with the traditional Deluge? I cannot answer that question categorically. I should be a great impostor if I attempted to do so, but my own opinion is that it was more or less coincident with the catastrophe which men remembered as the Deluge. I believe that the submergence of the land towards the close of what is called the Glacial Period was a considerable extent a sudden submergence, probably more sudden to the south of this country than it was here, and that the Deluge was closely connected with that submergence.

I come now to a fact upon which I place immense reliance. But first of all I wish to ask what you think would be the effect of a Deluge. Supposing the ocean in the course of the next year were to rise 1,300, 1,500, or 2,000 feet, what would you expect to find? The first effect of a water overflowing the land is the distribution of gravel. It washes away the finer earth and leaves all the stone and loose materials, and these are scattered over the land. I saw such an effect on a very considerable scale not many years ago when a dam connected with the Canning Canal broke. The powerful effect of that very small piece of water was really incredible. Large boulder stones were rolled down the torrent, immense quantities of earth were carried away, and sheets of gravel were spread over the whole lower ground to which the water had any access. It is well known that the effect of an inundation is to leave in one place gravel and in another mud deposits. Well if there has been a Deluge we ought to have proof of it in a similar distribution of gravels and mud or clay. I sometimes have been wicked enough to think that there are important texts in the Bible that ministers never preach upon, because they do not quite fit into any theological system. So in like manner in science. I think there are now and then a few facts which scientific men always give the go by to. They mention them because in conscience they cannot help it, but they do not dwell upon them and they do not follow them out to their conclusions. Now there is one such fact which I would ask you to follow with me to its consequences. There is a mountain in North Wales called Moutfryn, which is part of the Snowdon range, and upon which there is a very valuable slate quarry at a height of 1,390 feet above the present level of the sea. In opening that quarry in 1860 a bed of gravel was found upon the top. Perhaps I may be asked whether it is marine gravel, but I ask in return what other agent but the sea could have brought gravel there? This gravel could not have been formed by water disintegration of the soil, because it is full of sea shells as perfect as they can be found on the shore, dead shells, that is, not shells which apparently ever lived there, but shells both of the shore and the deep sea, which had been drifted there in the middle of the gravel. These shells are heaped pell-mell on the gravel on the top of this mountain, and I believe that every geologist admits that this is marine gravel. I take it that it is quite a sound conclusion that the sea had been up to the top of that mountain in very recent times, or that the mountain had been down to the level of the sea. This is not theory; it is a fact, and human reason itself would be confounded if we could not draw our conclusions from such facts as these. I draw a second conclusion from this fact. That sea was not a permanent sea. It was not the case that the mountain formed the bottom of the ocean for many years, because we should then have had deposits with shells, living and dying, as in the case of the sea terraces described by Mr. Smith of Jordan-hill. The sea had been essentially transitory in its operation. The second of the conditions of the Deluge is in this way fulfilled. Thirdly, it was tumultuous. It has no marks of quiet bedding. When the sea is tranquil it carries down sediment from the rivers and lays it in regular beds, as is to be seen in all sedimentary rocks. When it is tumultuous, and the action is violent and sudden, it has not time to form regularly, and the gravel is thrown down in thick heaps. These being the facts, what are the conclusions that follow? Is it probable that the mountains of Wales alone were 1,400 feet lower than they are now? There might be very local, very partial submergence of volcanic mountains under the sea. But what I have described happened not in a volcanic district, and Moel Tryfan is not a volcanic mountain. It is a mountain of solid rock, one of the old primitive Cambrian rocks, and it is in the highest degree improbable that when Moel Tryfan was 1,400 feet below what it is now, the rest of the country in these British Islands was as high as it is now. It is at least probable, if not almost certain, that the submergence which reached in North Wales 1,400 feet extended over the whole of the British Islands. But we are not left altogether to presumptive evidence upon this subject. We have similar gravels all over the counties of Lancashire, Cheshire, Staffordshire, and Worcestershire. In Cheshire they are found near the town of Macclesfield at 1,500 above the level of the sea, and very much under the same conditions. That is near the watershed of England, where the water when it came to that height would pour over to the eastern coast. We know further, from evidence of similar gravel in other places, that there was submergence all over England. With regard to Scotland, I understand there is a particular valley near Killecrankie, which you will find mentioned in Lyell, where stratified gravels are found at a height of 1,000 feet, or about 100 feet higher than the Welsh mountain; and I could not help noticing while coming from Inverary, in passing Tyndrum, that there is manifest evidence of stratified gravels underneath the loose rubbish which has come down from the steep mountains above. I think, therefore, that there is fair evidence that the submergence of the land, which in North Wales amounted to about 1,400 feet, extended over the whole of the British Islands. There is another very important lesson to be learned from these beds of gravel. Running water holds a good deal of carbonic acid, and the consequence is that when shells are embedded for a long period in loose gravel through which the water passes they are rapidly dissolved and disappear. We may, therefore, safely conclude that where dead shells are found in loose gravel they have not been there an incalculable time. Geologically speaking they are of yesterday. We are, therefore, brought face to face with the conclusion that in our own human period—because these shells now existing are not shells of old patterns—that in our own day, as regards fauna, the whole of the British Islands has been at least 1,400 or 1,500 feet under the sea, and that these shells have been carried simultaneously along with gravels, and congregated on high mountains all over the three kingdoms.

That is a very important fact; but it is a fact you may ask, why do we not find these shells more frequently? Well, if there has been submergence of the land to the depth of 1,500 feet in such recent times, there has also been re-emergence of the land since that time, and I ask you to observe what would be the effect of that. In the process of rising out of the sea again a great part of the gravels would unquestionably be washed away into a new form. You must remember also another thing, that however recent the Deluge may have been in geological time, it occurred a very long time ago—it may have been 50,000 or 20,000 years ago, and we have had all the rains and snows and floods, and perhaps glaciers, working on the mountains since that time. We cannot, therefore, expect to find the gravels exactly where they were left by the Deluge. Many of

then would undoubtedly be washed away by the heavy rains during the long centuries that have elapsed. I believe those on Moel Tryfan have been preserved for us by the mere accident that they were covered by the remains of glacier ice, which protected them from the weather; and from what we find in that particular place we may be certain regarding what occurred in other places. Look for a moment at what the effect of a submergence of 1,300 or 1,400 feet would be on the existing map of Europe. It would be a complete Deluge; it would submerge every capital in Europe—except Munich and Madrid—hundreds of fathoms deep; and reduce the present map to an archipelago of small islands. Fifteen hundred feet, which I believe is the minimum limit to that submergence, is higher than any inhabited village in Great Britain, except one in Cumberland or Westmoreland. All the most fertile parts of Europe—everywhere where there is any great accumulation of mankind and of animals—would be submerged; and that submergence completely answers all that we have been taught to believe as to the character of the Deluge. With regard to Munich, which is 1,500 feet above the sea level, I may say that when passing through it about three years ago, and going to see the famous colossal statue of Bavaria, I was amazed to see the enormous gravel-pits that are collected around the city, I do not know how many feet deep of solid compacted gravel, that had evidently been swept down from the ranges of the Alps. Therefore, although Munich would be above the 1,400 feet line, yet the whole plain of Munich must certainly have been under the sea which carried that gravel from the Alps. Practically, therefore, the whole of Europe was submerged by the submergence of which we have certain proof on Moel Tryfan.

Let us now look at the distribution of mud, or what we call in this country brick earth,—remembering that it is the mud of the ocean, or the mud of rivers when left dry and hardened, that becomes what we call clay or brick earth. The valley of the Clyde is very rich in brick earth. Have we, then, any evidence with regard to mud of that kind which would indicate a great submergence of the land? That is the question which I must now refer. There is all over the centre of Europe a prodigious formation which has been a great puzzle to geologists. You will find an elaborate account of it in Sir Charles Lyell's work. It is called in German the Loess. It occupies the whole valley of the Rhine from Basle down to Belgium, while in height it reaches 1,600 feet, answering closely to the measurement of Moel Tryfan, the difference of a hundred or two hundred feet being nothing in such a question. If you have proof that the submergence of the land has been 1,400 feet to 1,500 feet in Scotland and Wales, it is quite natural that you should find it extending to 1,600 feet in the centre of Europe. The hills of the Rhine valley are sometimes entirely covered with that mud. Geologists have been immensely puzzled with that mud. They do not know what to make of it. There have been fifty different theories about it. Sir Charles Lyell called it, and that was very remarkable, the "inundation mud." He had no doubt whatever that it was the result of water. The only question was—what kind of water? Was it the river Rhine, which ran at a higher level and immensely more powerful than it is now, or was it some great lake, or was it the sea? Here again scientific men with persistent obstinacy refused to recognise the sea. They said it was the Rhine or some great lake. But there is an indication as to the character of the water which geologists admit. There are shells in the mud, as in all great deposits of water. And what are the shells found in this mud? They are not lacustrine shells; they are not shells that lived in lakes or in rivers; they are simply shells which lived in forests that grew on the surface of the earth. Even in this country there are a great number of land shells in our grasses, in our heaths, and in our mosses, though not in such abundance as abroad. I do not need to tell you that if the sea went over the land very far from its original shore it might not bring sea shells with it. Wales is close to the sea, and there an inundation of the sea would certainly carry shells with it; but if the ocean spread over a great part of central Europe the water might have left all the shells behind before it reached that distance. That is at least negative proof. But my belief is that the centre of Europe was then occupied by the sea, which submerged the whole area, and that in the deeper part of that sea mud was accumulated which had been washed away from the other parts of the Continent. At all events that is a theory quite as consistent as any other.

I come now to the most interesting part of the question, viz. that connected with the destruction of animal life. I do not know whether it is familiar to all of you that at a very recent period in the history of the globe this country and all Europe was inhabited by a fauna of large animals, of which there are now no examples. There were the Mammoth, the Woolly Rhinoceros, which is only now seen represented in the Zoological Gardens, there were the Horse, the Bison, the Urus, which is preserved alive still as the wild Ox in the Cadzow Forest, the Boar, the Wolf, the Hyena, and the Irish Elk—a prodigious animal, which was taller than the Horse, and which had antlers spreading out eleven or twelve feet, and then there was also the Beaver. Now the bodies of these animals are found in thousands in the gravels of England and in the brick earth. Sometimes the whole body of a Rhinoceros is found, or the whole skeleton of a Mammoth. Not infrequently the whole skeleton of one or two of these animals, which would not naturally have conformed, are found together—the skeleton of a Mammoth or a Rhinoceros along with the skeleton of an Elk—showing very plainly that the animals must have been drowned, and that they had been deposited at the same time as the brick earth in which they are found. One of the most remarkable cases of an immense assemblage of these beasts being destroyed and overwhelmed is seen at what is called the Dogger Bank—which affords one of the best supplies of cod fish for the London market, and is midway between the coasts of England and Holland—at a depth of about eight fathoms. The trawlers, when trawling for cod or other fish, have been for many years perpetually bringing up the bones of these wild animals. They are counted by thousands—the teeth of the Mammoth, the horns of the Elk, and the bones of the Rhinoceros—and it is admitted by geologists that the Dogger Bank was a shoal on which enormous numbers of these animals were collected together. Their flesh decayed, and the bones now remain mixed up with the sand and silt. Now, it is universally admitted that no agency but water could bring all these beasts together into one place. What was this water? Geologists say it was a great river which occupied the whole channel between England and Germany—some prolongation of the Rhine in ancient times—and that these animals were drowned in great quantities in the eddies of the river and jucked up together in the sand and silt. But I pass on to a most extraordinary fact with regard to these great animals, and it is this, that in Siberia they are preserved sometimes, not in their bones, but in their flesh. The enormous stretch of country which lies between Russia and Behring's Straits is very little known, and almost uninhabited. It is frozen to within a very few feet of the surface all the year round. In that frozen mud the Mammoth has been preserved untouched. There have been numerous carcasses found with the flesh, the skin, the hair, and the eyes complete. For two or three thousand miles along the coast of that frozen sea it is not too much to say that there are places of large extent where the soil is composed of the remains of those beasts. A great deal of the ivory of commerce is derived from the teeth of the fossil Mammoth. It has been a rich trade to the inhabitants of Russia for many years. Concessions have been given by the Emperor to particular persons to dig for fossil ivory in that part of the world, and it has been a rich mine of wealth to the inhabitants. There are some islands called New Siberia opposite that coast and they are literally composed of large Mammoths and animals such as I have described, together with the torn trunks and stems of trees, all heaped together in a mass of confusion—mixed and preserved by frozen earth. It has puzzled the geologists for years to know how these enormous numbers of animals got thence. This subject has been admirably dealt with within the last few years by a Manchester geologist of the name of Howorth. I have long had my attention drawn to the subject, and I am convinced that no theory of the geologist has hitherto accounted for the fact I have alluded to, and it was therefore with great delight that I saw the evidence on the subject marshalled and arranged by Mr. Howorth, a lawyer, who is accustomed to collect and to marshal facts together so as to convince the human intellect. His writer has brought together all the facts for the last 120 years with respect to the destruction of these animals, and his conclusion is that the destruction of them in those vast numbers, and the preservation of them, has been due to some great diurnal catastrophe. That is his conclusion, and it is a conclusion which is now challenging the attention of the scientific world.

There remains the last part of my subject, which, I need not say, is the most important of all. Has this great catastrophe of the submergence of the land—the depth of at least two or three thousand feet taken place since the birth of Man? In answer to this question I must refer to the fact now clearly ascertained, that man co-existed with the Mammoth, and that stone implements are found in numbers in the very gravels and brick earths which contain the bones of those great mammals. When this was first discovered both the scientific men and the religious world were up in arms. "Oh," they said, "this carries Man back to an enormously remote period. This is against the account of Moses." That was what the religious world said, and the scientific world was sceptical on other grounds, and said it carried Man too far back into the abyss of time. They forgot, however, that there were two conclusions possible. It might be that it carried Man very much further back, or it might be that it carried this cataclysm much further forward. The one conclusion is as satisfactory as regards the facts as the other. The deaths of these great beasts may have been comparatively in recent times, but certainly it has been since the birth of Man. The implements made by Man, rude stone implements, are being found now in thousands throughout the gravels, and very often in the same brick earths as those in which these fossilised creatures are found. Some people have doubted whether these implements were human. They might as well doubt that the watch was human. Man had undoubtedly existed with the Mammoth, and Man had undoubtedly seen the catastrophe, whatever it was, which destroyed the Mammoth in these latitudes. In a cave in the south of France, in the district of Perigord, there has been found a piece of ivory from the tusk of a Mammoth on which the living form of that wonderful beast is beautifully drawn and depicted by ancient Man. A more spirited drawing could not be seen. I do not say it is equal to a Landseer, but it is a very spirited drawing. With regard to the condition of Man in these early times, I wish to guard against a conclusion which is very much pressed upon us by scientific men, I think without sufficient reason. It is quite true that the implements which are found in the old gravels are generally extremely rude. But the implements that are found in the caves are very often not at all rude—they are of most beautiful manufacture. They are made of flint or obsidian, and in the north of Europe they are so beautifully polished that there is no artisan in this country who can approach their perfection. Scientific men, especially those who advocate what I call the savage theory of the origin of Man, are always telling us that the men who used rude implements must have been savages. There never was a greater mistake. This is my opinion, and I will give some evidence in support of it. I recently received from Lord Lorne a box of specimens of stone weapons which had been used by the ancient Indian inhabitants of America in the extraction of copper from those mines in Lake Superior, Lake Huron, and Lake Michigan, which had been known on the American continent for unknown ages of time. These stone implements had been sent to Lord Lorne by the manager of a mine in the Michigan country. There were hundreds of them of all sizes in the mine, and ruder weapons could not be conceived. The question arose, Who were the makers of these? The manager of the mine stated in a letter that the tradition of the country, which he believed to be true, was that these mines were worked by the ancient Mexicans no later than the conquest of Mexico by the Spaniards. Now it is known that the Mexican Empire, when it was overwhelmed by Cortes and his companions, was an empire of a very high civilisation, and yet these were the rude implements which they used in the extraction of the copper. I ask you, therefore, not to be deceived when scientific men tell you that the men who used such rude implements were savages. We can draw no conclusion regarding the primeval condition of Man from the rudeness of the hatchets which are found associated with these extinct animals.

In conclusion I would like to say a word or two as to the causes of the Deluge. And first, I wish to point out that we are apt to exaggerate the difficulty of the Deluge. We are such pigmy creatures that we imagine only a prodigious catastrophe could have sunk the earth 1,500 or 2,000 feet under the sea. Was it so, indeed? Only think of the size of the globe and of the height of the mountains compared with its circumference. Were a line drawn, to the scale of one-tenth of an inch to the mile, representing a very small section of the earth's circumference, and were we to mark in the same proportion the height of Mont Blanc, the spot so marked would be so minute as to be invisible to all except those in close proximity to the drawing, and yet that spot would represent a mountain more than 15,000 feet high. And would it be such a great and wonderful catastrophe were the surface of the globe to be so altered now that the level of the ocean should be brought up so as to cover that little spot? The difficulty in conceiving the possibility of a Deluge is a far greater height than 1,500, 2,000 or even 3,000 feet lies entirely in our forgetfulness of our own pigmy size. If the crust of this globe was a crust which was moving from internal forces—if, as we know, the crust of the earth has been upheaved and depressed, again and again throughout millions of ages while the earth was being prepared for the abode of Man—is it not conceivable, is it even difficult to understand that one of the last and latest of these movements has taken place since Man was born?

And now, I would express the hope that I have at least been able to show you some of the conditions of this great problem, and ■ lead you to look at it as one of immense interest and importance. It is a wonderful implement that we have in the human mind. When your facts are well gathered, when you apply the powers of your reason to these facts there ■ no knowing the conclusions regarding physical truth to which you may be led. I do not know that we shall ever come to learn through science some of the questions which it most interests us to know. I doubt—to try the truth I disbelieve—that we shall ever come to know by science anything more than we now know as to the origin of Man. I believe we shall always have substantially ■ rest in that magnificent and sublime account which has been given us by the great prophet and law-giver of the Jews. But this you may learn from what has been gone over, that there is not one of you who may not add an important argument for or against the most interesting conclusions by careful observation and faithfully recording even the most insignificant facts in nature, and by the cautious application of your reason to these facts. And if with regard to many questions which we deem most of all to solve we feel the incapacity of our own reason, and the limit of our own intelligence, after all we are but driven to this, that the great hope of all science and the great hope of all religion is that time and that place when “we shall know even as we are known.”

TRUE CONTROVERSY.

By the RIGHT REV. THE LORD BISHOP OF ROCHESTER.

SERMON BY HIM for the faith of the gospel.—PHILIPPAUS.

ON the threshold of the words you may pronounce them impossible, so far at least as our joint action is concerned. It must be confessed not without reason. We may, indeed, strive separately and personally for what we individually conceive to be the truth of God, but this truth, or faith, is so different in one man's eyes from what it is in another's and even those who are tolerably at one about its substance so soon and so widely differ about its right proportion, that in a sort of despair, impetuous thinkers seem compelled ■ be satisfied with a sort of guerilla warfare against a numerous, and compact, and well-armed foe, and so an army without a flag patrols without a pass, and troops with no one to lead them have to waste their strength, and break their hearts, and miss their triumph because religious egotism declines to efface itself for the common welfare, and self-will rejects the yoke of Jesus Christ. But two considerations on the other side of the question may soon satisfy us that this emphatic sentence is neither vague nor hollow, and that a just master lays upon ■ here a possible and therefore a rightful burden. One is the prayer of Christ, the other is the character of St. Paul.

When our Divine Lord, the night before He suffered, prayed ■ His Father for the unity of the people who should hereafter be baptized into His Name, did he know what He asked, and did He mean it? For is it possible to conceive that the oneness of His Church, so close to His re-appearing heart, so fervently pressed on His Holy Father, is but a beautiful and imperceptible dream?

Then who is he, that here in words that have such a cheerful ring of sincerity about them bids the Church strive together for the faith, who elsewhere writes to the Corinthians, not likely to encourage them in delusions on the subject, “all to speak the same thing, and to be perfectly joined together in the same mind and judgment,” and who, in his epistle to the Thessalonians, blessed God for “the good tidings of your faith and charity”? It is the apostle who, of all men in the world, loved truth, and gave up all he had to possess it, and suffered all a man could suffer in maintaining it, who passionately hated its counterfeiters, who would not yield for an hour to one of the twelve when he saw him to be in the wrong, who warned the Galatians against receiving another gospel even if an angel from heaven delivered it, yes, and who not only loved truth, but understood human nature, with a keen thoroughness, whom the incessant care of all the Churches was constantly and painfully instructing in the enormous difficulty of ever bringing men ■ be of one mind about anything. Yet, knowing what he means, and seeing what comes of it, he here urges on the Church of that time and the Church of all time the blessed duty of striving together for the faith of the gospel, and if the Apostle of the Gentiles felt it ought to be done, and thought that it could be done, who are we to say no? What is the faith of the gospel? The apostle uses two expressions about the gospel, one, "the hope of the Gospel," when writing to the Colossians, here, the faith of it. The hope is that which we expect from it, the faith is that which we learn in it. This faith or truth is the simple creed of three grand and comprehensive truths, centring round and springing from the Persons of the Eternal Trinity. They are the Fatherhood of God, or His relation and purpose towards mankind, the atonement of Christ, or God and man reconciled in the Incarnation, and all its ineffable results, the work of the Comforter, or what the Church knows as the doctrine of grace. That God loves us, and at first made us, that He might love us, when we fell, still loving us, and going on to redeem us, that He might be able better to bless us, and make us capable of His love, through the way of escape and perfection which He Himself provided, that His feeling towards us is one of holy compassion, that His purpose about us is that of a free salvation, that if we come to approach Him, it is because He Himself is approaching us, and that when we cry "Father," He has first whispered "Son"—this is the truth of truths underlying, explaining, uniting, and confirming all other truths, this is the Gospel of gospels, the casket in which sparkle as with light from the throne the glorious facts of the Incarnation and the Nativity, the Baptism and the Passion, the Resurrection and the Pentecost. "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

The next truth of the gospel is, that the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us full of grace and truth, and died for our sins according to the Scriptures, and having overcome death is set down at the right hand of God, Prince and Saviour. Our human nature is now more exalted than ever was, through its everlasting union with the Divine. Our debt of obedience is paid through the perfect righteousness of our head, Jesus. Our sins with all their consequences were, with His own consent, laid on Him by His holy Father, and He has perfectly expiated them, so that in the wonderful figure of Scripture God has cast them behind His back to be remembered no more. "Of Him," as St.

Paul says, "are we in Christ Jesus," who of God is made unto us wisdom and righteousness, and sanctification and redemption.

Once more, "I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Giver of life." It is He who takes of the things of Christ, and shows them unto us, who grafts us into the body of Christ, and builds us up into Him, who makes the sacraments potent with life, and the Scriptures vital with truth, who not only teaches us to pray, but Himself prays within us, who not only enables us to live like Christ, but in the wonderful illustration of St. Paul brings Christ into our hearts, Himself to dwell there, who being the promise of the Father, gives the soul its birth, and the saint his perfection, by whom preachers speak and the Church grows.

Within and around these truths are many others, but the farther they are removed from the centre, the less vital and momentous they become, also the more fertile source of unprofitable controversy, and the too frequent cause of separation among the children of God.

It is certain, so far as the apostolic records tell us, that these were the primal truths with which the apostles went forth to found the kingdom of God, and which God owned and blessed in enabling them to found it. The multiplying ages may have brought us deeper experience. The Church has developed her majestic order over the entire globe, the net of the gospel has cast its embrace, and men in every race and tongue bow in adoration before the prophet of Galilee. But there has been no new gospel discovered, for there has been no divine advent since Jesus went away. It stands now as then, as fresh now as then, as wonderful now as then is the old and yet new story of God in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them.

Now it is for this 'faith of the gospel' that the apostle bids us strive. His language must be studied with exactness, for every word has a force of its own, and our English version is not quite so happy as usual. "Striving" in the original indicates the intense and concentrated exertion of an athlete in the games straining every muscle for victory. "Together" is expressed in the compound word "striving together," whereby its force is pointed and augmented. 'For' the faith of the gospel, should, I think, be rendered with the faith of the gospel.

The apostle here as elsewhere recognises the truths and doctrines of the gospel as the one great force by which the world was to be subdued to God. Ideas are the mechanics of the spiritual world. Writing to the Romans, he was resolved not to be ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it was the power of God unto salvation to every man that believeth. David speaks of this word as a light to his feet, and a lamp to his path. St. Peter says that it is the incorruptible seed of which men are born through the spirit. And it is as working with and fellow helpers unto this divine force on souls, that the Church is summoned to labour. Noble consolation, for thus she is not fighting alone. The truth of the gospel is in one aspect her ally, in another her weapon, God behind and in front her sun and shield.

But you say, how are we to contend for it? The context indicates (I shall be content with naming them) these chief methods. Firmness, they were to "stand fast," "In one spirit" with clear perception of its leading ideas, with cheer and resolution "striving," with unity of purpose and with striving together, with a calm fearlessness, "in nothing terrified by your adversaries."

We must be firm, not tossed about with every wind of doctrine, nor at the mercy of the last clever speaker, whatever side he takes, not bitten by that poor affectation of candour which, thinking to do an adversary justice, does its own cause injustice, and to spare a foe disowns a friend, nor, again, in such a restless inquisitiveness for truth (ever reserved, and apt to hide itself from shallowness and babbling), that it will never be quiet long enough to generate that state of mind in which alone truth can be seen.

Also we must have a clear intellectual perception of the truth for which we are to fight, or may be we shall soon be firing into the ranks of our own supporters, and perhaps damaging the cause we never were at the pains to examine.

Bishop Warburton has said that the two greatest subjects that can occupy the human mind are Theology and Politics, and the history of the noblest part of mankind for three thousand years proves the saying to be true.

Then, and only then, shall we love it; love for what is done for us, and brought us, enabled us to pass on, and also to enjoy. For one great lack in the Christianity of the present day is depth. There is more superficial religion than ever there was—can we say as much for its solidity? Indeed, it is to be feared that the seed on the rock is only too exact an illustration of the slight hold the faith of Christ has got of the reason and heart of a great proportion of professing Christians, and were persecution or affliction to arise for the world's sake, faith might sorely fail, and the love of many wax cold.

To know the truth and love it, to love it because we know it, and to spread it because we love it, this is the confession of Christ.

And with energy is our striving to be done. The kingdoms of this world are not built up with languid hopes, and timid enterprises, and scant sacrifice, and base delays. Life, and blood, and treasure, and years of sleepless nights, and purposes that have been maturing in strong wills and hearts for a generation, and the clutched resolve of a nature that, when it once grips a purpose, never lets it go till it is done—these have carried stained and tattered flags to final victory, these have won and consolidated empires, have made tribes into nations, and soldiers into kings. So it is only by sacrifice, and devotion, and unflinching diligence, and the purpose of those that love not their lives unto the death, that the Church of God can grow. As those who strive for the mastery, and with all their might, who put the kingdom of heaven first before all other things in the world, and who care not what comes or goes so long as it advances—if thus we labour for the faith of the gospel, great may be our toil, but vast shall be our reward.

But it must be together, or it is simply hopeless, it must be with quiet courage for there are many adversaries.

What do I mean by "striving together"? I mean that the laity must work with the clergy, and that men must work as well as women, and that the poor must give their prayers as well as the rich their money, and that Christians, as far as possible, should work with Christians, not taking melancholy pains to find out how much they differ, but how far they can agree in the presence and for the sake of Him who died for us all, who loves us all, who needs us all, who calls us all, who teaches us all, who uses us all, who permits us to differ in some things that we may give and take as occasion serveth, that there may ever be discipline for humility, and opportunity for usefulness, that Barnabas may take reproof from Paul, when Paul, because he loves him, leaves him; so Christ and His Church be richer through it all. Then, and then only, we shall not be terrified by our adversaries. For these are adversaries; and while it is a very poor sort of courage that denies the fact of danger it is but a silly and even culpable strategy that throws away soldiers only to show how brave they are. We must know what we have to encounter, that we may take measures for protection and victory. To underrate an adversary's strength is almost more hazardous than to overrate our own.

As to these adversaries, I will name only three—a faith corrupted, a Church divided and a heart asleep. There are many corruptions of the 'faith once delivered to the saints.' Some adding to it spoil its simplicity; others taking from it neutralise its life (and clums such as Rome, which seem to possess everything except the right sort of evidence to substantiate them expiate some of us by the bravery of their sonorous words. On the other hand subtle doubts and questionings working their stealthy way into the seams and joinings of the spirit presently widen and criss into open fissures, and the anxious inquirer soon steps into the perilous contentment of one who feels that he must never expect to be satisfied. 'What think ye of Christ?' is no doubt, a question now more constantly put and more seriously listened to than ever it was. But Christ's other question 'When the Son of Man cometh shall He find faith on the earth?' seems to have but a dismal response in our own sceptical time.

Many adversaries. But we are not to be troubled by them like a gentle lamb watched by some bird of prey. We are to go on striving and working, and praying and teaching, and doing our very best for our brethren, and hoping the best about the world—then, leaving it with God. It is His world and, whatever man please, to the contrary, He is still ruling it, and our worst perils must not suffice us to forget for a single moment that His hand is on the helm while the ship of the Church tosses on its voyage over a white and angry sea.

Perhaps the Church divided is the saddest trial to bear. It seems so unnatural, so unreasonable, so unjust, so gratuitous in addition to our difficulties that within the very bosom of the Church, Jacob and Esau should vex each other's hearts, and that a scoffing world should make our unhappy divisions a plausible excuse for discrediting the kingdom of Christ. Here our duty must be to see that these divisions have no food, no holding ground, no progress, at least among ourselves. Let our way of controversy, and we must have controversy, be that of simply, lovingly faith fully proclaiming the positive objective truths of the gospel, leaving them to make their own way and to fight their own battles, as light chases the darkness when morning comes. The truth can take care of itself, often much better, when it is left to itself, and our kind attempts to help it with its work sometimes unanimously fail. If others part from us or quarrel with us, they must. But let not the cause nor the sin be ours.

Perhaps, however, the worst of all our adversaries is within. The lazy will the tepid heart, the thick conscience, the mind dull to truth the soulful spirit, which forgets who it is that gives us wealth, and what He gives it for, supposes it a grand cleverness to push sacrifices on our neighbours' shoulders, and shirk them for our own. Oh let us earnestly ask our God to come and visit us severely with His grace to help us better to see and know the amazing wealth of His undeserved mercy to stir these dull minds to look on and look up for the time when the roof of the world shall suddenly be lifted up and the King of Saints comes back. In conclusion, let us be full of hope, because Christ is King, let us also deserve to be hopeful, because we are steadily at work for Him. Let us be strong in faith, because if we only, each in our several way and opportunity, set forth His full, pure gospel, it can no more fail to do the work appointed for it, than tomorrow's sun fail to climb the sky. Let us be close in our honesty and generous brotherly kindness. Indeed, were there no other reason for it we cannot afford to do without each other. The common prayer, the kindly greeting, the brotherly sympathy, the mutual consolation knit heart to heart and tie man to man.

If you would do the best you can for your neighbour, through helping him into the light of God, do not force him, do not scold him, do not hurry him, do not set him against you, and so lose all chance of persuading or influencing him by hot, or vehement, or bitter words. Most of all, do not dare to rob him of his freedom or to prevent him from thinking out in his own manner his way to God. If you do the chief loss may be your own. Rather, if you really want to know how to love a man, that you may the better help him, at least pray for him, if you cannot pray with him. The prayer that helps him must bless you. Walking in the light as He is in the light, you will have fellowship one with another. God is love, and to strive for the gospel which declares that love, is to love as He loves, 'hoping for nothing again,' save to be loved in return.

By EDWARD WHYMPEL, AUTHOR OF "THE ASCENT OF THE MATTHEW," ETC.

FIRST PAPER.

IT will be within the recollection of most persons that Baron Nordenskiöld made a voyage to Greenland last year, having published just before his departure a programme or prospectus setting forth his aims, and that he put out in it, as a novelty, the idea that the interior of Greenland might be free from snow and ice. Said he—

"The interior of Greenland is even less known than the east coast, and here we encounter a purely scientific problem, whose great importance is apparent from the circumstance that the unestablished theory—that the interior of the island is one continuous mass of ice—forms one of the corner stones in glacial science. . . . The following reflections seem to demonstrate that it is a physical impossibility that the whole of the interior of this extensive continent can be covered with ice, under the climatic conditions which exist on the globe south of the 80th degree of latitude." And after various other remarks he continued, "In consequence of this circumstance, the snow falls in the interior of Greenland cannot be sufficient for maintaining a 'perpetual' inland ice." The programme concluded by saying that the ship would make for the west coast of Greenland, to the Aulutsvik Fjord (near Egedesminde), whence the journey into the interior would be commenced.

The appearance of these statements caused me both surprise and concern. They caused surprise because they now brought out as a novelty an idea that I entertained more than twenty years ago, and which coming to the knowledge of Sir Rodenick Murchison, had been mentioned somewhat prominently by him in his address to the Royal Geographical Society in 1866. The publication of this address, which was widely circulated and is accessible to all, renders it unnecessary for me to assert any claim to originality. But I should explain here that my views as presented by Sir

Rodenick Murchison were rather too highly coloured, that the well-grassed valleys and recesses to which he adverted were not to have been verdant and luxurious oases "richly covered with forests," and that my expectations, in the event of discovering that the interior of Greenland was not a continuous mass, would have been limited to finding such sparse vegetation as is commonly seen near the sea in Arctic lands, which affords sufficient, though scanty, sustenance to the wild reindeer.

It seemed not impossible that the interior of Greenland (which at that time was almost entirely unknown) might be found to be broken up into detached masses, or archipelagoes such as are found throughout the Arctic circle, the distance from the east to the west coast of the continent was sufficiently considerable to admit of the existence of large unknown fiords and arms of the sea, while the appearance and disappearance from time to time of great herds of reindeer on the west coast (who went no one could tell where) seemed to favour the conjecture that the interior was not entirely covered with snow and ice. These were some of the considerations which I offered to Sir Rodenick Murchison, and at the present time, though the area to be investigated has been lessened, there still remain large tracts both in the north and in the south of the interior of the continent where it is possible, though it becomes increasingly improbable, that grassy recesses may be found, or that fiords may penetrate far inland, breaking up the general mass.

It follows, therefore, that I see no reason to differ from any one who may state that there yet remains much to be done in exploring the interior of Greenland, or who may affirm that it is still uncertain whether the whole of the interior is or is not enveloped by glacier. My surprise arose from Baron Nordenskiöld connecting such statements with the part of the country in which he announced it was his intention to travel, for I knew, from a journey which I made in 1867, and had often stated publicly, that the whole of the interior at that part was absolutely covered by glacier. In a paper communicated to the Alpine Journal in 1870, I

* "Mr. Whympel has conceived the bold project of penetrating along the surface of some of its glaciers into the interior of this snow-clad continent, being convinced from the number of deer which sometimes find their way to the coast, that there are, here and there, well-grassed valleys and recesses. I am happy to say that our traveller is determined to make a preliminary trip to Greenland next spring, and afterwards to endeavour to accomplish what no one before has ever thought of."—Anniversary Address to the Royal Geographical Society, delivered May 25, 1866

place of the craggy forms which were seen to the south

Six weeks elapsed since leaving Copenout of the ice fiord just ■ the south of the settlement, and had again blocked the entrance, so we stood on and off for a whole dry and finally ran in between two bergs, which we scraped as we passed, and got at last to our port on the evening of June 15. Settlements in Greenland are all after one pattern. There are three or perhaps four wooden houses huddled ■ hagen before we arrived at Egedesminde, a settlement on the south of Disco Bay, into which we were obliged to put until Jakobshavn harbour should be clear of ice—a dismal place at that time for every soul. Greenlanders Dines and all had a cough. Though it was now getting well into June, almost the whole island on which the settlement was placed was covered with snow, and a belt of sea-fritted ice was fixed all along the shore just above high water mark. Here I became familiarised with Greenland currency, and learned the values of the coins in circulation, which were mostly skilling and half skilling equal respectively to about English farthings and half farthings. Silver was rarely seen and gold never the higher values being represented by bank notes of various amounts, which were often in an indecipherable state of grease and dilapidation. On the next page is a fac simile of one of the values of six skilling or three half pence.

News came on the evening of the eighth day we stopped at Egedesminde that we could get into Jakobshavn harbour, and a twenty hours' run took us off it, but we found that a large number of bergs had come together rarely of more than one story, in appearance like the sheds erected to lodge railway notices: there is a tall flag staff with three small and very rusty guns below a wooden jetty a blubber boat, and a pile of casks with a score or two of mongrel dogs and equally mongrel children wandering about. It takes some time to discover where the natives live, but by and by it is discovered that that which at a distance looks like a heap of dirt is a house built up of clods of turf, intermixed with rounded stones and a number of such dwellings will ultimately be found spread over half a square mile or so, for the natives seldom put their houses close together. The wooden houses belong ■

the Danes. The head man of the place, whose proper title translated is "Colony director," lives in the largest, and the others are occupied by his "assistant" and a cooper. There are seldom more than three or four Danes at any one settlement, and Jakobshavn was exceptional in having a priest and a doctor.

Jakobshavn was especially exceptional, too, in possessing a church and a hospital—the latter being in annex of the former, and though intended for the service of the natives had never been used by them. By order of Mr. Orluk, we were permitted to occupy the hospital, and speedily took possession, stowing away our goods in the church-loft, which formed an excellent storeroom. The next thing was the purchase of a boat, and the Colony director sold me the only one which could be spared—an old and very rotten whale boat, a relic from some wrecked whaler. In this I started three days after our arrival, with half a dozen natives and an interpreter, to proceed along the coast to the north in search of a place where the inland ice approached the sea, for nothing could be seen of it from the settlement (although it was not far distant to the east), as the neighbouring hills, though scarcely more than 1,500 feet high, were sufficiently lofty to shut out all view of the interior.

At this time, in consequence of the prevalence of south-westerly winds, all the coast to the north of Jakobshavn was encumbered with ice the drift of bergs which had drifted out of the ice fiord and we had to push our way through it, bit by bit, often scarcely seeing the sea at all. It was more formidable in appearance than in reality, and the natives forced aside the ever thawing and revolving masses, laughing, joking and singing as if they were upon a mere frolic. About twenty miles to the north of the settlement we came to a fiord running towards the east, which branched out in several directions, and we took the most southern arm, entering it through a narrow passage where the glaciers in olden times had made a stand, and created a moraine, which had been subsequently cut through and now exists as an island, with a rampart on either side. The stream ran through these passages with great velocity, boiling and tumbling around submerged boulders in a manner very suggestive of ship wreck, but a kayaker who accompanied us went ahead and selected a channel, and we shot through after him on a current running about eight miles an hour.

The glacier-covered interior now appeared directly in front, distant ten or eleven miles, at the end of a broad and beautiful sheet of land locked sea, studded with islets, and bounded by cliffs, alive with gulls, ducks, and terns, cawing, screaming, and fluttering around their rocky breeding places. The water rapidly shallowed some miles before the end of the fiord, and turbidity was substituted for the exquisitely clear green of the deeper portions, for in this hord, as well as in all others subsequently visited, the mud-laden streams pouring from under the inland ice are silting up the arms of the sea with a sticky and most tenacious slime which is not easy to escape from when once a boat is well aground upon it. Our friend in the canoe again acted as pilot, sounding and indicating a sinuous channel, and after some hours of tiresome work we at length got to land and camped comfortably on a sand bank, not far from the margin of the inland ice.

feet high gave a good view of the nearest branch of the ice, which streamed down to the head of the main valley in two arms, and these alone, although insignificant as compared with the general mass, would have ranked as first-class glaciers in the Alps—the larger of the two resembling the Brenva glacier on Mount Blanc, rising in two steps, broken up into a maze of seracs, ■ the great reservoir behind. Though impracticable in front, it appeared that the upper surface might be reached by taking it in flank on either bank, and the left bank, or southern side, being the more accessible, I gave that the preference, and started for it at midnight (broad daylight in this latitude in the middle of June) with three natives and the interpreter, leaving the others in charge of the boats. After an hour's walking over turf and rather boggy ground, we arrived at a place where the glacier could be easily scaled, ■ a height of 550 feet above the sea.

Thus far we had not had any prospect over the inland ice, such glimpses as had been obtained having been in vistas closing the ends of valleys, or through occasional openings between a couple of peaks, and to gain a better general idea of its nature, before proceeding, I ascended an isolated hill on the western margin, which commanded a very extensive view. The morning was still, and the sky cloudless, and as I gradually rose above the level of the inland ice I saw that there were the usual banks of old snow from last winter extending all round the margin where it abutted upon the exterior land, and then came rounded, dome-like slopes of hard ice, such as are common at the termination of most glaciers, containing numerous crevasses. This hard ice extended only for a few hundred yards eastwards, and then became snow-covered. Beyond, there was scarcely a sign of a crevasse, and a mantle of pure unsullied snow stretched east, north, and south, far as the eye could see, covering everything completely. How far our sight extended none could say, for no one, however experienced with snow and ice, can judge distance with accuracy on a snow-field which has no marks upon it. To the north and south, the mountains around the margin of the inland ice showed that the prospect was immense, but they gave no clue as to the distance seen to the east.

The nature of this view was a most agreeable surprise, for I had never conjectured that the conditions would be so easy, or that it would be possible to meet with such an absolutely complete effacement (so to speak) of all the land-features of a continent, unlike anything known elsewhere. There were undulations, but no declivities, and there were alopes, but not a single peak, nor, excepting at the very margin (where there were small boulders from the contiguous rocks) was there even a stray rock upon the surface. The ice-sheet rose steadily towards the east, at a very slight angle, and obviously rose to a great height above our station. The summit or horizon-line in the far east ran north and south without a break, and without the slightest depression at any part. It appeared to be dead level over an immense distance.

We now hastened to make an excursion on the ice, and walked on to it, across the old snow-beds, without cutting a single step! The natives—who had constantly predicted that something dreadful would occur, and had ceaselessly talked of imaginary wild beasts which they suppose inhabit the interior—followed with alacrity, though they exhibited signs of alarm when we came to the end of the uncovered part of the ice, and I proceeded to tie them up in line, mountaineer fashion, some twenty feet apart. The post of honour fell, of course, to myself, and I led the party, sounding for crevasses in the usual manner: and it soon became apparent that there were plenty concealed, although so few were open. We had scarcely gone a mile before I went suddenly through the snow-crust, and found my legs kicking about in a crevasse full of water; and a little further on we discovered that there were many pools of water lying on the ice underneath the snow. Nevertheless we made good progress, and within a couple of hours had risen nearly 1,400 feet above the sea.

Long before this occurred, on looking back, we began to perceive the west the mountains of Disco Island rising above the hill we had ascended on the outskirts. They were at a known distance of sixty or seventy miles, as the crow flies, and the peaks we could see to the north and south were at least as far away. Hence we began to have some notion of the distance we could see to the east.

The farther we went the better we found the snow; and this was natural, for the higher the colder, and the harder the crust. At the end of a couple of hours there seemed no advantage in proceeding, and I halted to take the opinion of the natives whether it would become better or worse. "It is all alike," every one said; "we could drive sledges thirty-five or forty miles a day over it." So we turned back and raced down, getting to our camp about 5 A.M., and, after a long sleep, took to the boats and returned to Jakobahavn in high spirits. With perpetual day, a cloudless sky, perfect calm, a temperature of 36° Fahr., and snow so firm that one could move over it almost as readily as upon a high road, great success seemed within our grasp, for there appeared to be nothing to prevent a walk right across Greenland!

EDWARD IRVING.

THE publication of Carlyle's "Reminiscences" has revived an interest in Edward Irving which had lately been dying out. There are still, indeed, some who remember his preaching, and they cannot speak of it without wonder. There is, too, a religious community which had its beginning from him, but it was mainly shaped by other hands, and has now dropped the name of its founder. An effort was made some years ago to perpetuate his fame by the republication of his works, but the eloquence of speech can never be adequately expressed in print, and whatever circulation these books may have had, but little interest was felt in a character which, at one time, equally fascinated and puzzled men. Once more, however, Carlyle has recalled the imposing figure to our minds by one of the most vivid of his many portraits, and one, too, in which the colours are more lovingly touched than is at all usual with that rather cynical philosopher. Yet it may be doubted whether even he who had such means of knowing Irving, has, after all, rightly understood his friend. At any rate it may not be out of place, ere the subject pass away altogether, as the orator is apt to do, to try if we cannot form a more satisfactory estimate of Irving's character than either the pathetic laudation of Mrs. Oliphant or the pathetic lamentation of Carlyle.

Edward was the third son of Gavin Irving and Mary Lowther, and was born at Annan on August 15th, 1792. The Irvings, according to Carlyle, had been a race of small farmers who "did well for themselves" in those days, when "old Q," the last Duke of Queensberry, tried, by means of long leases and "grassoms," to leave his heir very little the better for his great inheritance. But Gavin Irving, a solid burgess and tanner in his native town, owed nothing to the wicked old Duke, or to anything but his own bread-wins and diligent fingers. His wife, a Lowther, was thought by some to be really a Luther, some tradition of descent from the Reformer having a kind of hold on the family. But most likely it was a myth to account for Irving's greatness when he was thought to be a new Luther come to reform the Reformation. How Irving grew up there is not very needful to inquire. Small Scottish burghs are all very much alike, dull and gossipy enough, but not without a good deal of individual character to brighten them. Unfortunately the minister, who is generally the most important figure in such places, was fonder of good cheer than was good for himself or his flock, who, in consequence, drifted largely away to Mr. Johnstone, burgher minister at Kilslechan. In the dearth of other influences of the higher order, nappily, the school, which was of chief moment to the young folk, was under the charge of Adam Hope, an honest and thorough teacher, who tolerated no sham work, and had, according to one of his pupils, quite a gift in detecting it, and making one ashamed of itself. There was nothing, however, in Irving's school life, nor even in his college career at Edinburgh University, to suggest his subsequent meteor-like course. He was simply a handsome (bating his aquint), generous, manly youth, a little magnificent in his way, and only marked by shrewd Professor Leslie as a likely mathematician, who might possibly do something considerable if chance should happen to turn his thoughts in that direction.

All along, however, Irving had devoted himself to the work of a Presbyterian minister, or perhaps missionary to the heathen, though that Church had then no missionaries anywhere. Like other Scottish divinity students then, having completed his Arts' curriculum, he sought to maintain himself by teaching during the years given to a somewhat irregular theological training. Hence, by recommendation of Professor Leslie, he went, first, to a school at Haddington, and had for a pupil there Miss Jane Welsh, now familiar to all the world as Jane Welsh Carlyle, wife of the prophet, "who was not easy to live with," as she found to her cost. Her father, we are told, noted in Irving "a tendency to wrangle a hole in everything he was asked to believe," but Miss Welsh herself saw other qualities in him, which, had the fates permitted, might have made both their lives happier than they were. "Had I married Irving," she said long after, "there would have been no tongues." Perhaps, and yet who knows? As a loyal wife, she adapted herself to Carlyle, and lived his life, and thought his thoughts, and very possibly she would have done the same thing had she fallen to Irving's lot. There is no doubt that Irving loved her at one time, and it seems just as clear that she would have needed little persuasion to accept of him. But it was not to be. From Haddington he went to Kirkcaldy, to a similar school there, being succeeded in the former town by his friend Carlyle, who also followed him ere long to Kirkcaldy to a school which was set up in opposition ■ Irving's But though so far rivals, they were not less friends, for Irving's generous nature had not a touch of envy in it. Neither ■ them, however, was meant to be a schoolmaster, though both were fain to teach the world. They shrank the profession, and had no patience with stupidity. Their hearts lay to another line of things, and after a while the one drifted away into that literary life whose struggles and successes are known to all the world, while the other betook him to preaching the gospel in ■ fashion that should make the world also hear him.

The life of a Scottish "probationer" is rather a trying one, and if he goes a little off the beaten path so that plain country folk are not quite sure about him, the treatment he meets with is apt to make him a little sharp and sarcastic. Irving had a good deal of discouragement from many others, besides the Kirkcaldy baker who left his pew and marched down the aisle whenever he entered the pulpit. No patron looked to him, and no congregation thought of "giving him a call." Yet his temper was nowise soured, as it would have been, had he been thinking of himself more than of his work. His nature remained sweet and cheerful as ever, only he began to think of going forth as a missionary, like the Apostles, without staff or scrip. When Dr Chalmers at length asked him to assist him in St John's parish, Glasgow, Irving said that "if they put up with his preaching they would be the first people that ever did," and, with some few exceptions, they did no more than just put up with it. Yet if they had given him a fair hearing they would have found that the very same truths which Chalmers enforced with such rugged and fervid eloquence were more thoroughly discussed by his youthful assistant in a style that was modelled on the great masters of the English tongue.

It was not in Glasgow that his work was to be done, but ■ came to him at last, when he was thirty years old, in the shape of a call to the poor broken Church of Hatton Garden, which had, ■ the time, only one elder, some fifty seat-holders, a bad position, an unpopular character, and a clause in its trust-deed requiring the minister to preach, once a day, in Gaelic. Yet Irving was eager to accept of the post, and willing even to face the Gaelic sermon if they insisted on it, which, however, they wisely evaded. There was a buoyant hopefulness in him, and he felt sure "he would do great things" now that he had a clear field for himself. For during his long probation he had pondered this question deeply, How should the gospel be preached so as to reach all sorts of men? The more vital question, What is this gospel I have to preach? had not yet been much in his thoughts. It came to be the uppermost one, as we shall see ■ due time, but for the present he took ■ pretty much for granted. But he had really studied the art of preaching—the style, the manner, the best way of restoring its ancient sway over the minds of men, and he felt as if he could so proclaim the old familiar gospel that the leaders of the people, the men of highest faculty and richest culture, should once more return to its allegiance, as in England's better days when its foremost minds were still "believing."

■ this spirit he went to Hatton Garden, and the result showed that so far he had not miscalculated his powers. I very one knows how there was an unwonted stir among the Scotchmen of Bloomsbury and Islington, how men like David Wilkie and Allan Cunningham became not only regular church-goers but drew other artists and litterateurs along with them to hear the new Baptist in the wilderness of Holborn, how the fifty poor sheep became so many hundreds that the little fold ere long could not contain them, how Sir James Mackintosh, moved by a touching word of prayer, spoke of the preacher to Canaan, who again told the House of Commons that the most eloquent sermon he ever heard was preached by a minister of the poorest church in Christendom, how the verdict of the great wit and orator sent the West end carriages a rolling City ward into unfrequented regions, where dukes and statesmen and great ladies waited their turn as at a levee. All London was stirred. It was not only the giddy throng of fashion that rushed after a new sensation, but scholars, artists, as well as merchant princes. Nor did they sit only ■ hear twenty minutes of elegant sentence-making, like a fountain of many tinted rhetoric playing delicately for their amusement, but for three hours at least they were pined with argument, illustration, and entreaty in the language of those stately past ages when men wore full bottomed wigs.

It is not in human nature not to ■ more or less gratified by such popularity, but there is not the slightest sign that ■ injured the perfect simplicity of his character. I dare say it is very nice to feel the sweet breath of fashion as it is wafted about one's pulpit. One soul may be very much the same as another, and yet the rustic of silken souls, and the odours they bring with them, their lovely faces and pleasant smiles are, very likely, rather intoxicating. On the whole, however, there are few who have passed through the ordeal more unscathed than Irving. Speaking to his people, at the opening of their new church by-and-by, he called it "an hindrance to devotion," adding

We have stood in imminent peril from the waste of rank and dignity that have been paid to us. There was, however, much good to be expected from it, and therefore we willingly paid the price, being desirous that they who heard the truth but seldom, should hear it when they were disposed. But these are bad conditions to our being cemented together as a Church. They withdrew us from ourselves to those conspicuous people by whom we were united, from which I have not ceased to warn you, and against which I have not ceased to be upon my own guard.

That might, perhaps, be a little more grammatical, but at least there is not a hint in it that he was growing giddy in the breath and buzz of popular favour. And at the time when that favour most abounded he might be found chiefly, not in Belgravian drawing rooms, but in the lanes of Pentonville, or the slums of Soho.

All this excitement arose from preaching a set of ideas with which his hearers were almost as familiar as with their own faces. His first book belongs to this period, viz., his "Four Orations for the Oracles of God, and an Argument for the Judgment, in Nine Parts." Its doctrine is altogether of the type known as evangelical. Mr Spurgeon might have preached it, bating the style. There is the usual exaltation of the Bible, as being in every sentence and syllable of it the infallible word of God, guaranteed by miracles, and therefore to be read, not critically, but believingly. There are the three R's—Rein, Redemption, and Righteousness. There are the usual warnings that death seals a man's state irrevocably. And there are pictures of eternal punishment nearly as horrible as those of Jeremy Taylor. There is, also, the usual—may I say?—Pharisaic or Philistine satisfaction with our own country as being with all its faults, the "chosen nation," the home of truth and piety and freedom, all owing, of course, to the preaching of the gospel. There is no novelty in the matter, ■■■ in the manner of treating it.

Yet the book, in spite of all this, was fitted to make respectable orthodoxy uneasy. There was no sort of heresy in its teaching, but still it was not "safe." One who spoke about doctrines as "popular idols," and those who upheld them "as men who frowned excommunication on all who doubt of their pre-eminence," one who dared to say that the "shorter catechism was not an exhibition of the whole Bible," and questioned the wisdom of teaching children "these narrow epitomes," above all, one who could affirm that

"From the constant demand ■ the religious world for the preaching of faith and forgiveness, and their constant looking against the preaching of Christian works, their constant appetite for mercy and disrelish of righteousness, or if righteousness it be, their constant demand that it should be the imputed righteousness of Christ, not their own personal righteousness—from these features of the evangelical man, I am convinced that many of them are following their hopes upon something else than the sanctification and changed life which the gospel hath wrought," clearly such an one was not a safe guide for young Scotchmen in the great metropolis of trade. Then, too, there were not obscure hints that he thought the religious world not to be very different from the fashionable world, and that pious agencies came perilously near being mercantile concerns, and altogether that the Churches, too, had better be thinking of the judgment to come. Hence a coldness sprung up among his brethren towards Irving. An atmosphere of suspicion gathered about him, thin at first, but gradually becoming more dense and foggy. There were whisperings at clerical meetings and glum looks in the street. Alas! the prophet's work is always "a burden," and sometimes his heart breaks under it.

It was while he was still the favourite of fashion, though beginning to be distrusted by his brethren, that the London Missionary Society asked him to preach the annual sermon at its meeting in 1824. This was the clerical "blue ribbon" awarded to the foremost preacher who could gather the biggest audience and secure the largest collection. Irving would attract dukes, earls, merchant princes, and honourable women not a few. ■ was known, too, that he took a deep interest in missions, and had spoken warmly about Wesley's labours among the King's-wood colliers, and the Moravian Brethren in Greenland and the West Indies. Therefore on the appointed day the directors came cheerily to the great tabernacle in Tottenham Court Road, where a vast throng was already assembled, so that they had to begin the service an hour before the advertised time. They could arrange the commencement, but the end was beyond their power, and after more than three hours of it they would have given all the collection that it never had begun at all. Yet, if Irving had had a little tact, he might have said all he had to say without giving serious offence to any one. That however, was not his line. What need was there for policy and adroitness in proclaiming the truth? He had asked himself what ■ was that Missions supremely needed, and what ought the true missionary to be? To these questions he thought the Missionary Societies replied, "Money, give us plenty of funds, and with the help of a committee and a secretary, the business shall be done." But to Irving this appeared to be the most fatal of all mistakes. Not money, but men, was what they needed above all things. Were not the apostles sent forth without purse or scrip? Had not Paul worked at tent-making while he evangelised the nations? No society raised funds to equip the monks of Iona. To find men of that stamp, then, and send them forth with a blessing and all Church authority for the work—that is the business of a Missionary Society, not to have offices and clerks, and transactions liker Mincing Lane than God's house. So he preached, and the worthy directors thought he was partly censuring them, partly painting a knight errant, and no more understood him than Sancho did his Quixote.

All this did not help him bring back the confidence of the Church to her wayward, however loving son, and ere long, also, the wave of fashion began to return to its own natural channels. If, then, he had been leaning on the favour either of the Church or of the world, it is about this time that we might look for signs of disappointment, or efforts to bring back the fickle crowd to Hatton Garden. And happily we have, just at this period, a brief diary, or rather a series of daily letters, in which he depicts himself, without knowing that he is doing so, having no half-conscious thought how it will look in the eyes of posterity. It was written, in all the confidence of domestic affection, to his wife, daughter of the minister of Kirkcaldy, whom he had married in 1823. They had been troth plighted while Carlyle and he were schoolmastering there, and the former hints not obscurely that he had only been kept to the engagement by threats of legal procedure. I find it hard to believe this on the sole authority of one who, for some reason or other, had no good-will to the Martin family, especially as there is not a trace in Irving of any soreness or coldness such as an enforced marriage almost certainly produces. Of this marriage a child had been born—a little Edward, fondly loved during his brief life. Carlyle, himself childless, untouched, perhaps untouchable by those sweet lights which children shed upon our harder moods, rather sneers at Irving's doting on this babe of a large hope. But no one else will think the worse of the father for carrying the little fellow shoulder-high through the green High bury lanes, and finding rest and relief in him. He lived only two short years, dying in Kirkcaldy, whither Irving had transported his household, hoping that the sea air would restore the child's health. There he had to leave them, and he was on his return to the now lonely house in Myddelton Square that the diary was written as a sort of daily letter to his wife, and if any one can read it, and still think of Irving as a vain self-seeker, he must be wholly incapable of knowing a true man when he sees him.

Each day begins with a boundless hospitality, for already the dining-room, before he comes down to prayers, is filled with a throng of elders, devout ladies, stray waifs. He has picked up, and young Scotchmen in want of a breakfast or an introduction, all of whom sit down to his morning meal, and get also more or less advice and "exhortation," the amount of which, before he gets to bed, is something amazing to think of. When these early visitors leave, he betakes him to his study, and the diary records what books he is reading, what thoughts they suggest to him, and how the sermon for next Sunday is gradually shaping itself. Then after an early dinner of the frugallest kind, come visitations of the sick, dealings with sinners, a glance at the new church building in Regent Square, and a meeting in Hatton Garden or elsewhere, after which there is more visitation, some one to comfort, or in any rate to "exhort." It is rarely much before midnight when he gets home, and sets to writing his diary. This ceaseless activity is only varied by the tremendous strain on the Sunday, carried on amid the heat and excitement of a crowded church, for three hours and a half in the morning, and two and a half in the evening, the interval being filled with work or worry of one kind or another. As we read the story, we see not his genius we think of, but his entire devotion to duty. Not as a prophet does he show himself to me at this stage, but far more as a priest—one "ordained for men in things pertaining to God." Of dukes, countesses, statesmen, orators, the diary says nothing whatever, neither boasts of their presence, nor regrets their absence, but simply ignores them altogether. But it is full of tender interest in struggling poor folk, in hapless waifs, in hopeful converts, and in broken hearts. As he had been among the starving Glasgow weavers, when he was nobody, so was he now among neglected Scotchmen in London, when all the world was wondering after him.

PENCIL OR PEN

BY THE RIGHT REV THE BISHOP OF BEDFORD

Thou shalt watch with me the cloudlet sleep
On the breast of the changeless blue

Here purple with heather there green with fern,

The broad slopes gleam afar,
And ruddy the slanting sun rays burn
In the thorn-bush on the scar

Thou shalt watch the stream, from pool to pool

Singing and smiling still,
In its mince waterfalls, bright and cool,
As ■ drops from the far drawn hill.

See how it creeps by the older roots
And the mosses brown and green !
See how in silver bars it shoots
The boulder stones between !

O H, for the spell of the artist's brush
To carry this golden glen
And ■ set it there mid the roar and rush
Of wearily toiling men !

They should gaze on the mountain's eloquent face,

They should breathe its fragrant air
And perchance a dream of the wondrous grace
Might lighten a dim heart there

Ah toiler ! not for myself alone.

Would I love ■ fair things well,—
Thou shalt sit with me on my mossy throne
At the foot of the upland dell

Thou shalt gaze with me on the mountain sweep,

With its manifold changeful hue,

See how the fountains of snowy spray.
As joyously on they run
Over the level slabs of grey,
Are dancing in the sun !

I envied thee, painter, thy artist eye,
As I looked on the hollow hill ;
Yet are there no graces too softly shy
For the magic of thy skill ?

Lo ! wonderful mosses and tiny flowers
Make the marge of the streamlet fair,
For it is not a grudging hand that dowers
The glen with its beauty rare.

And the mystic wonder of the place,
In things both great and small,
Is the witchery of exquisite grace
That crowns and perfects all.

And while thou, O artist, the great things
seest,
And the splendour, as 'tis meet,

I may turn my freer gaze to feast
On the small grace at my feet.

The Pimpernel twines its tender thread
Mid the mosses green and wet,
And the Sundew nestles in russet bed
With its glistening coronet.

The Wild - thyme curves out its fidgeted spray,
And many a cushion swells
Of the Ivy-leaved Campanula
With its thousand fairy bells.

Then the magic pencil I'll crave no more,
But I'll wield my uncouth pen,
And the mosses and flowers shall bring their stoic
For the solace of weary men.

And the care-worn toiler in dusty ways
The things that I see shall see,
And shall sing to the Giver his song of praise,
As he shares my joy with me.

LIFE AND WORK AMONG THE EAST-LONDON POOR.

By THE REV HARRY JONES, M.A.,

PREFENDARY OF ST PAUL'S, LATE Rector OF ST GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.

MY knowledge of the East of London is direct and connected. I have not dipped into it on philanthropical errands from the West. I have not hunted within its borders for curious literary material. I have not visited it commercially during business hours, but lived for ten years within a few doors of the famous Ratcliff Highway, and daily seen from my study window the masts of the great ocean going ships which were creeping evenly and slowly to their berths in the Docks after months of tossing by the sea. My path and work have lain among my eastern neighbours and fellow-parishioners, and whatever memories I retain of them have been packed up in the ordinary round of life.

Not very long ago the East of London was reckoned to be quite oriental. Many Londoners who knew Syria had not seen Stepney, though it has a cosmopolitan reputation, every child born in the sea being supposed to belong to that parish. But the poor half of London was unknown to the rich. Now, docks have been dug deep into the land by the side of the Thames, and the Pool is no longer a "forest of masts." It is only a highway to the haven of those ships which discharge cargoes nearest the city, and is not entered at all by many which stop short of its narrow waters and are unloaded lower down. Moreover, a crust of houses beyond the City which made entrance into the true East London difficult has been pierced or removed. Railways, trams, and omnibuses penetrate and traverse the whole region, and the rest of the metropolis has been awakened to the fact that a city with more than a million inhabitants lies at its feet.

One discovery, to those who have eyes to see, is that East London is the basement floor of the whole metropolitan building. It holds the store room, butler's pantry, and cellar. For instance, the warehouses which skirt the docks are filled with tea, coffee, wine, spirits, tobacco, sugar, and spice, let alone a varied and manifold wholesale store of such things as indigo, ivory, wool, &c. &c. I cannot unravel these details. They are too enormous to be spoken of as details. Take one ground floor I have often crossed while on a pastoral round. It is one out of hundreds. There you might often behold some twenty thousand tons of sugar—enough to sweeten the Dead Sea. Close by this is a cellar containing, literally, some "acres" of port and sherry. And as for the tobacco——. Lately a little book has been published about narcotics and stimulants, recording the habits of literary and scientific men, with an eye, not yet satisfied, to the furnishing of evidence whereby to judge correctly of their influence. One of the most fruitful and entertaining novel writers of our day claims to be a steady smoker while at work. He has a keen perception of the value of tobacco. One day, when he was paying me a visit at St. George's-in-the-East, I took him into a cigar floor. The custodian said there was then only about two hundred and eighty thousand pounds worth of cigars in the room, and he gave my friend a bundle to smell. The whiff of covetousness was Gargantuan. "I couldn't have one to smoke now, could I?" said he. I have since seen several eruptive references to the wealth of East London in the world of fiction. The flavour of a quarter of a million of Havannahs leaves an impression, when suddenly made. Indeed, as they are our country cousins who show us London, so it is the West which reveals the East to Easterners. The friends who visited me made me think more of our every day life, and now that I am no longer permanently resident in East London, though I carry on some of my old work there during stated periods, I have come better to apprehend its condition. It is necessary to step back in order to take in some views which are counted to be importunate. They stand too near us in the field of vision.

I have likened East London to the basement of a great house, as it holds both cellar and store room. But it has become chiefly interesting to social inquirers and philanthropists as it is also the stratum of servants. It is filled with workers. The chief masters live up stairs, as it were, and do not mix with the society of the basement. They, or at least such as represent the housekeeping heads of families, descend to give orders, but the rest of the family is only waited upon—at a distance. And the discovery of a million servants or sheer workers all living together has shrewdly exercised philanthropists, for one first article in the creed of a rich man is that the poor are far from the kingdom of heaven. I do not mean to say that the West of London has put its hand into its pocket and paid for preachers and teachers to awaken and instruct the East. No such thing. It has read with interest about the monotonous streets, the weary wastes of houses, where there is no "society" and the places of worship are only half filled, but it has done next to nothing in order to correct these supposed defects. Some successful brewers and distillers, assisted possibly by the thought that the source of their wealth is too thirstily appreciated, have given freely of their time and money to good works, but, as a rule, the wealthy have stood aloof. Perhaps a crowded Belgravian congregation has sent a so-called "enormous" collection of some £700 or £800 once a year to the interesting "East," after strenuous pleading on the part of some popular minister therefrom, but the proportion between the sum and the income of the worshippers does not represent the relation between the Western employers and Eastern servants of London. It is a mere "tip," and a small one. I do not blame them. I do not believe that the most lavish almsgiving would do good to the East. It is only as it fights its own battles and does its own work well that it thrives. The East really lives by means of the West, and any combined action on the part of the employers to supply the employed with comforts beyond what they could earn would do more harm than good. I am sure, however, that an individual exercise of generosity on a large scale, however Quixotic it might be esteemed, would produce genuinely wholesome results. We do not sufficiently appreciate the excellence of eccentricity. It is a pity that Mr. Besant called his charming book "All Sorts and Conditions of Men" an "Impossible Story." Virtually it is not impossible. It indicates a need which could be met. Think what a very rich man might do, without the plague of any committee, in an East-London district, not in the shape of direct Elementary Education, since the School Board for London is looking after that, but in the way, e.g., of a large swimming bath and school, open all the year round, or a winter garden, not a little scrap under a hand glass, but one big enough for people to wander about and get warm in. I leave Dives to think of some other great gifts, which would no more "peupense" the recipients than the British Museum does Bloomsbury Square, or Kensington Gardens do the regions around them. Beside such open handed donations a real want of East London society is middle class leisure, not any shower of ordinary doles, which degrade individuals. For instance, there are very few who have time to look into the Board Schools. The mere visits of more ladies and gentlemen would be very valuable. They need know nothing about "codes." But an educated stranger, or kindly intelligent friend who goes round the classes and has a cheery word with the teachers and children, brings in a whiff of change, for which the school work may well be momentarily suspended. Most welcome. Even such ordinary school visitation comes to be missed and appreciated by masters and scholars when weeks pass without consciousness of their relation to any world beyond the scholastic circle. While speaking of these schools, moreover, I must remark that no provision is made for the yearly entertainment or "day out" of the thousands of children who people them. This might be afforded once in a way by some good natured Dives, but short of that I would suggest that the mere exhibition of "Punch" to their scholars would be incalculably appreciated. I never saw a "Punch" anywhere during my whole ten years' residence in the East of London. Think of the bank of little faces, wrinkled with fun, which is never tired of holding its street session in those Western parts where this drama is held, and then think of a generation growing up ignorant of such an innocent and absorbing entertainment.

I have referred to the yearly excursion, common to all "denominational schools," and for which we may see many autumnal appeals in the papers under the head of "A Day in the Country." This is much prized, but more as a corporate frolic, than for any wholesome rustic influence or refining instruction.

Once, when I had taken a large party out, I looked to see if any cared to pick wild flowers, but saw none till I noticed a solitary lad slowly searching the grass. "Here," thought I, "is a nature-loving soul," and I watched him with interest. He had, indeed, deserted the noisy group around the "knock 'em down," but only because he had won a cocoa nut, and was looking for a stone that he might crack and eat it by himself.

One day is not enough in which to pass from London sentiments into a perception of the country. That is best roused by an organization for which Mr. Barnett, of St. Jude's, Whitechapel, is chiefly to be thanked. Growing numbers of poor children are thus sent into some rustic village for a fortnight or more every summer. Arrangements are made for their board and lodging, frequently with a peasant, and the little white faced folks come home with brown cheeks, and an unfading perception of cows, sheep, hay, corn, and flowers "all a growing," but not on the head of a costermonger who makes them, the flowers, tremble with his yells

The ignorance of Londoners is sometimes startling to a countryman. As the boys were leaving our Rames School in Cannon Street Road one day, a mare was led past with a young foal at her side. Several of the lads had never seen a foal. "Did she lay it now?" remarked one, quite seriously. He had got some mixed notions about a mare's nest. Once I was visiting a needlewoman, whose work was to embroider emblems involving thistles on naval caps. I ventured to remark that they were not quite correctly done. "Ah!" said she, "but then I never saw a real thistle. To her they were simply heraldic, like griffins."

There is, however, one form of rustic vacation taken by the poor which gives them change of scene if not of society. I refer to the gathering of hops. I did not fully realise this till one day, an Irishman whom I had helped to provide with a wooden leg stopped me saying, "Surr, I've been hopping." As he had done nothing else since I had known him, I waited for explanations, and learned a good deal about the yearly exodus of "Pickers." But in my experience, every year has distinctly increased the communication between town and country and seen more poor people get some change of air. The great need of the day, however, is to bring better air into their dwellings. That is the chief change required, and it is in progress, though slowly. It is true that working people are better lodged in the East than in the West of London, partly because land is cheaper, and partly because they are not led to live in houses constructed for another class, and then deserted by them as the tide of fashion moves westward. In this case whole families are often crowded into one room, as often comes to pass throughout such places as Soho. Cheap lodgment is, however, bad enough eastward, and the air is spoiled, not because it comes over many roofs, but because, in most cases, each house poisons the supply of its own household. The London system of sewerage is dangerous everywhere, all dwellings, great and small, being put into possible communication with the foul mischiefs generated by a whole metropolis, but the small, about which least trouble has been taken, are naturally most exposed to the enormous underground springs, stores, and streams of vitiated air with which London has been supplied in these scientific days. Beside the ever new taint from leaky drains, the poorest houses are rendered unwholesome by long contracted rottenness. Something has been done to replace these death breeding "homes," but hitherto it is difficult, if not impossible, even to say what more is needed in order to make London as healthy as it might fairly be expected to be. The necessary information can hardly be gathered. I speak advisedly. My brother clergy were pleased to elect me as one of their representatives at the London Diocesan Conference, held in 1883, and one of the committees appointed by that body was set to inquire into and report upon the condition of the dwellings of the working classes. I was asked to serve on this. Sir Richard Cross, the author of the well known sanitary Act is our chairman. We met, and began to inquire. It presently appeared that under existing conditions it is by no means easy to ascertain how much in London is untouched by recent sanitary legislation. We wrote to the officers of health of all the parishes and unions a large number, in the metropolitan area, asking for information on this point. I thought I could give it, but the answers were few and meagre. The unpleasant fact is that much unhealthy house property is held by members of the various municipal bodies, and as the officer of health can reply officially to queries only with the permission of the local corporation of which he is the paid servant, his testimony is checked. He vestsures them selves may be willing enough to remove sanitary nuisances, but there is always the chance of there being two or three members able to block progress. I called myself at the Local Government Board to ask where the information, sought by our committee, could be obtained and I learnt that it was virtually inaccessible. The first thing needed is a Royal Commission to compel evidence as to the sanitary necessities of London. For this our committee have petitioned the House, and, here we have stuck fast.

Meanwhile, however, promising examples exist of what may be done. There was a horrible region at the back of the Royal Mint. It was, I think, the worst part of London I ever knew, and yet the rents were in some cases high, as much as four shillings a week being paid for one room. The character of its inhabitants was mostly, as usual, determined by their dwellings, for a rotten house makes a rotten household. Lately this district has been scraped bare, and then partially covered with Peabody buildings. The result has been an influx of local industry. The old inhabitants, though they might in divers cases have been lodged cheaper in the new tenements, have fitted, and some of them have taken possession of a dilapidated court in Stepney. They did not wish to be better lodged. They all refused the new provision made for them. They made light of it, and went their ways to worse streets and lanes of the City. They needed compulsion to come in, and the compulsion to use a better dwelling can be given only by the demolition of such degraded dwellings as they inevitably gravitate to, as long as there are any left. In fact, their occupations being somewhat loosely applicable to London at large, they did not much care where they lived, so long as they were not obliged to live decently. As I have said, those engaged in local industries have flowed into the new Peabody buildings, and filled them. When lately I looked, in the porter's lodge, over the list of applicants for the next vacancies, I found that genuine working people were waiting ■ get nearer to their work. Great nonsense is sometimes talked about the turning out of poor people from the poorest houses, as if they were unfairly discomfited by being removed from the scene of their labours. No doubt some are discomfited, but many of those turned out are such as cannot live permanently near their work. I refer to bricklayers' labourers, whose chief business probably lies in those zones of the suburbs which are being still built. They may be wanted anywhere, but seem to love the inner "rookeries" of the metropolis. As these are pulled down their inhabitants in many cases are only compelled to live nearer to the districts where most of their work lies. The very poorest houses, moreover, are preferred by thieves, habitual or occasional, and they are helped in their degradation by the survival of their abominable dwellings. As these are pulled down a great encouragement of iniquity is abated. The moral fibre is most likely ■ show mischievous action when set in filth, and thus it ■ not the greatest of all evils or hardships ■ pull down a radically bad house whenever you can lay your hands upon it. The residents, in a large number of instances, are, by the very nature of their work, not tied down to that immediate neighbourhood, fresh acres in the suburbs are constantly being covered with new cheap houses, as the demand increases these houses are supplied, and often ■ is well to force the inhabitants of vile tenements to move into those which are better, and not dearer. No change, of course, can ever be made without causing inconvenience to some. The dust will fly directly you begin to sweep. But of ■ the dirt which needs to be swept away the poorest houses are the dirtiest, and he who demolishes one does a good work, though he himself may not be prepared to erect a better in its place. There is, e.g., a court in my old parish, St George's-in the East, which simply wants to be pulled down, burnt, swallowed up, or done away with anyhow. Hereby hangs a tale. I realised the origin of the court in this wise. We had need to set up a "giant stride," a pole with ropes, whereby boys can swing round with centrifugal impulse, in our playground. I knew that a burial-place had been there, or near there, once, but was not prepared for the skulls we dug up when we set about erecting our pole. I had inherited no registers of the dead who lay in that place. They were numerous, but their bones were their only monuments. A ghastly heap of these was turned up—and buried again. Some said that they were the remains of corpses which had been found floating in the river or docks. Others, with much probability, conjectured that Lascars had been buried here. And then I realised the origin of the court to which I have referred. A large number of Lascars, not very long ago, formed a marked feature in our mixed population. They were reckoned, however, to be dangerous, and likely to grin and run about the City. Thus a two storied court, lined with single rooms, was built for them, having no back exit, and closed at each end with doors. Into this they were driven every night. Here they were locked up, and I presume that those who occasionally died were buried in the plot of ground which afterwards formed our school yard. The Lascars eventually disappeared, perhaps they all died, and I wish that their barracks had disappeared or died with them. But an "enterprising" builder got possession of the court, and let ■ over to—well, not the most reputable of my fellow-parishioners. Not one of the tenements has, or had, any sanitary accommodation or back door. Charles Dickens used ■ come here and grub for sensational localities. He found them. This court became the haunt of the lowest class in the parish, and was the slum in which he placed the opium den frequented by Jasper in "Edwin Drood." That picture was drawn from the life. We came, indeed, to know the "haig" there described, and who was locally called "Lascar Sall." Her real name was Talbot. She eventually, for some time, attended one of our mothers' meetings, and even came to church. But she got into "trouble," poor thing, and we lost sight of her. Her rival, "John Chinaman," who kept the opposition smoking-shop, was well known to me, and, externally, a very civil fellow. His surroundings, however, were abominable. There is no better word for it. If the Beach of Bishops had been set to live there they must have been had too. This court now exists. I tried to get it pulled down and have its site included in our "Recreation Ground," which ■ adjoins, but failed. Of course it ought to be clean swept away, without any pseudo-sentimental thought about ■ inhabitants. They might go to more decent dwellings ■ they chose, and I should like to make their choice imperative. The worst phase of the whole matter is, of course, seen in the fact that any fellow-creature endures such dwellings. What the clergy, and all who are interested in the better lodging of the working classes should encourage, is "discontent." Once get all classes determined ■ apply existing legislation to the cure of present sanitary evils, and determined also to improve the laws where they are defective, and we need not hear of the miserable lodging of the poor. We have learnt of trades unions. They have done good. But a grand future is open to a householders' and lodgers' sanitary union. There ■ no reason why dwellers in the poorer parts of cities should not band themselves together for the enforcement of sanitary laws. There are special reasons why they should. The needed work will never be done if it ■ left only to philanthropists. A revolution in cheap dwellings should ■ made, and seen to "pay." The Peabody trustees have done something to clear the course, but they are too slow. They ought to mortgage every one of their buildings as soon as it ■ erected, and go on covering fresh ground. Thus they might send a wholesome wave over London. No doubt several spaces intended for buildings have been left too long open, but when I look back at the state of things twenty years ago I feel myself tempted to believe that a new action has been set up which shall not fail; but the best impulse that can be given to ■ is the "discontent" of the persons most closely concerned in the provision of cheap and healthy houses. Indifference is radically the source of the greatest social curses we inherit.

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST.

By Robert Bennett.

By SARAH TYTLER, AUTHOR OF "CITIZENNE JACQUELINE," "LADY BELL," ETC.

CHAPTER I.—THE BEAST.

THE white glare of an Indian sun was beginning to beat on the parade-ground at Nhilpoor. The English regiment, summoned for early drill, was detained to witness a painful piece of discipline, which the authorities trusted would prove a salutary warning. A young soldier named Thwaite, a fine, manly fellow in spite of his faults, had in the course of several years' service risen to the rank of sergeant. This desirable result was the effect of energy, daring, an obliging temper when he was not crossed, and a clever aptitude for a soldier's duties, born of mother-wit, sharpened by a rather better education than was usual in his grade. Unfortunately his merits were counterbalanced by defects, which not even promotion had been able to check. He was as rash and reckless as he was dauntless and enduring. He had an uncertain temper, spoilt by what was understood ■ have been a hard youth. He was careless of the company he kept, and careless of the excoemes into which he fell in bad company. He had an elder sister, married to a cousin of the same name in the troop; but in spite of her efforts, and notwithstanding the staid example of her husband—a pattern of prudence, though ■ had not the wit to rise in the world—young Will Thwaite had been going from bad to worse lately, and had indulged in one fit of dissipation after another. They were beyond being hidden; they could not escape punishment; and both offence and punishment were totally incompatible with his position as a non-commissioned officer.

His best friends had grown weary of pleading for grace, which was so often abused. A court-martial could only come to one conclusion, especially as the Colonel of the regiment was somewhat of a martinet, and had never entertained any great favour for Will.

It was in anticipation of the spectacle that a certain solemn stir went through the mechanically controlled body, drawn out ■ strict order. The culprit was brought forth to confront the Colonel, who proceeded to see the sentence carried into effect, without any symptom of dislike to the duty. William Thwaite was reduced to the ranks, and in sign of the degradation, the signal was given for the usual official to remove, in the presence of the man's comrades and subordinates, the stripes on the arm of his jacket, which were the token of his grade.

Till then Will Thwaite had stood like a statue, though his face was sullen and lowering. But the moment he felt the offensive touch on his arm, he sprang aside, and before any one could anticipate the action tore the stripes from his coat by one wrench, and flung them right in the face of the Colonel, with a savage shout, "Take that from a better man than yourself!"

Blank consternation was the first result of the lawless defiance. The deed was such a gross breach of military discipline, such an unseemly violation of authority, that the poor Colonel gasped, and could hardly believe his senses, while the junior officers and soldiers gaped in harmony with their senior's gasp, and for an instant every energy was paralyzed.

Thwaite did not take any advantage of the pause to attempt a flight, which would have been as mad as what had gone before it. He stood at ease, with the angry grin still on his face, till the whole company recovered themselves. He was put under arrest, a second time, without offering any resistance, and marched back to durance, while the dismissed soldiers formed into groups and discussed the event of the day, filling the barrack yard with subdued commotion.

The orator who spoke beneath his breath with greatest horror of the outrage which had been committed, and wagged his head with most reprobation and foreboding, was Lawrie Thwaite, Will's cousin and brother-in-law. It was not Lawrie who, as might have been expected, carried to his poor wife the news of his fresh, unpardonable outbreak, and the imminent danger in which he stood of some punishment still worse than being drummed out of the regiment. A gabbling straggler sought out Jenny, and without preparation divulged to her the miserable incident.

Jenny wrung her hands, prematurely withered and drawn by much clothes washing for the troop. Well might she lament and cower in apprehension. The next court-martial weighed out the terrible, but warrantable—almost compulsory—retribution, that Will Thwaite should undergo a certain number of lashes before being dismissed from the service.

CHAPTER II.—JENNY'S STRUGGLES.

JENNY THWAITE, a hard-featured, hard-working, middle-aged woman, was more attached to her brother than to her husband. Indeed, it was alleged that she had married Lawrie Thwaite principally that she might have a chance of following Will to India and of being still near him. The reason might be that while poor Will, smart as he was, had sore need of such protection as she could afford him, there was no question that Lawrie Thwaite was quite capable of taking care of himself. In addition, Jenny had never borne a child, which might have interfered with the sisterly allegiance, while Will had all along been like her child, seeing that ■■■ was nearly fifteen years her junior. She had looked after him in those old hard days of his youth, she had toiled to procure for him an education that might be more in keeping with his future than with his present fortunes, she had suffered the keen disappointment of seeing him grow up wild and unsteady, until he forsook the trade to which he had been apprenticed—only stopping short of breaking his indentures and leaving Jenny to pay the forfeit—and enlisted into an infantry regiment under marching orders for India. Then Jenny consented to marry her cousin, who was in the same regiment, and who stoutly denied ever having decoyed Will into the service.

Lawrie was more Jenny's contemporary than Will's, and having been on the look-out for a careful, managing wife, who might wash, or do dressmaking, or perhaps keep the girls'-school, and so greatly multiply her resources, he had hovered about Jenny Thwaite with matrimonial intentions for years.

Jenny had not been blind to her boy's delinquencies, she had rated and reproached him, and sometimes was not on speaking terms with him for days. But it was all for his good. She loved him faithfully through his worst scrapes, and was secretly serving him, even while shunned by him, or in declining for a brief space to hold intercourse with him. She was the first to hush a sign of amendment, and was extravagantly proud of his promotion, insisting that he would never stop till he got a commission, which would be no more than his due, though she must give up her washing, and hoping that Lawrie would have served his time before that day came round.

The process of retrogression, even when it reached its extremity, did not shake Jenny's fidelity. It rather knit her so closely to her brother that she ceased to protest against his folly. Was it a time to be picking out holes in his coat and pointing to his errors, when the poor lad was in trouble and brought to so sorry a pass that ■■■ needed every grain of love to fight for him, cleave to him, and, if it were yet possible, save him?

Jenny would leave Laurie to play the cautious, cold-hearted, judicial part—to draw back in case of incurring reflected blame, to stand aloof, though with a decent show of reluctance, or to join in the chorus of blame. Nor did Jenny greatly censure her husband for his conduct. It belonged to the poor man's nature, as she had known when she married him, and so long as he did not propose to stop her in the most desperate exertions she might undertake on her brother's behalf, according to the original bargain between the pair, honest Jenny could not see that she had any title to sit upon her husband.

It might have been otherwise if Jenny's conviction of her husband's fulfilling his bargain had been shaken, or if she had guessed that the great secret of her independence lay in the meanness, rather than in the phlegmatic magnanimity of the man she had married, and who mortally dreaded to offend her high spirit, lest he should lose the constant harvest of her skilled work.

Jenny moved heaven and earth to deliver her brother from the barbarous infliction of the lash. She knew well that it would be the death of his moral nature, and that the brand would enter his soul, even if his high-strung physical system recovered from the shock it must receive. If it had been possible to administer the punishment vicariously, without Will's knowledge, she could have been wrought up to bare her brave shoulders like the Russian women the knout, and like another Godiva have faced ignominy, so that the victim, who was her own flesh and blood, her darling since her early girlhood, might be permitted to go free. That resource was impossible. All that Jenny could do, and she had only a few days to do it in, was to wander day and night, praying for a commutation of the sentence. She appealed here and urged there. She worked upon the chaplain to draw up a petition for her. She vexed the souls of men with her sometimes speechless, but never-failing importunity, and the dry-tongued anguish of her despair. She declined to be repulsed, though she had been rather a proud little woman in her better days. She won over gentle, illogical, enthusiastic ladies to espouse her cause, and to plague their husbands never to mind precedents, not even justice, but for dear mercy's sake to grant Jenny Thwaite's prayer. She was the most careful washer and clear-starcher, the best darning, the nicest sewer of plain seam, the most trustworthy nurse on a pinch they had ever found. The whole men would fare the worse, and every officer's household be in straits, if they drove Jenny beside herself. Why, the poor woman must go mad, she would die on their hands, and they would have two ruined lives, two deaths at their door. Was that what their stupid, stubborn bondage in form wanted? Colonel Bell was not a bit the worse of the insult. He had not so much as a scratch on the face, and was a poor fellow to be treated like a brute, because, for once in his life, he had forgotten himself, and behaved like a baby? Did not Bertie or Charlie throw his toys at any one who came in his way—at papa himself, when the child was in a rage? Don't speak of the ladies of the demoralising effect on the other soldiers, the loss of prestige where the rule of the officers was concerned, of mutiny, and insurrection and chaos come again. No such horrors caused in the nursery from making as little as possible of Bertie or Charlie's naughtiness, and leaving the child to come to himself.

Jenny wound up her vehement representations by what sounded in the circumstances like wild romance, of the Thwaites having grand connections, with the likelihood that the family would rise in the world some day, when certainly the officers would be sorry for the cruel, base punishment they had inflicted. These unreasonable and passionate statements on the whole did harm to the woman's suit. Nobody had time to ask or give confirmatory details of the improbable story, which appeared to rest on no foundation, unless it were a little vapouring of Will in his cups, and some wary conceited bragging on the part of his brother in law. It was either a credulous delusion or a pure invention.

In the meantime, Jenny had no encouragement from those most interested in the affair.

"It is of no use, Jenny," said her husband with ostentatious dismallness, doing little to second her in her frantic exertions.

"Never mind, Jen," said poor Will, when she visited him, "it will soon be over," turning away to hide a shuddering recoil. "Everything will soon be over, and you'll be well rid of a rascal who has only been a trial and grief to you."

CHAPTER III.—RESCUE AND SACRIFICE.

Jenny's fond, piteous struggles proved in vain. Law and order were inflexible. The offence was too outrageous. The welfare of the British army was at stake. Will Thwaite was to be flogged, though many a kind heart resented the necessity, or waxed rueful under it.

The morning of the flogging rose as sultry as the day on which Will had grossly insulted his commanding officer in the discharge of his duty. Will never forgot the airless heat of his cell as he lay on his face and awaited the summons to public shame and torture.

Jenny did not lie on her face idle, though her door was shut, and it was in shrouding darkness that she busied herself with a dumb intensity of preparation, in gathering together fomentations, unguents, rags, and bandages, and in filling a disused kit with wearing apparel and provisions for a journey.

But the post-runners came in before the hour for drill, and among the letters for the Colonel was one from a firm of London lawyers, which filled the scrupulous man with disturbance and dismay. There could be no mistake about it. He knew by name the respectable firm that applied to him, and their communication was carefully attested.

The laws of the service were as the laws of the Medes and Persians. Never had there been a more scandalous contempt of discipline than that shown by Will Thwaite on the parade-ground. But though the welfare of the British army ought to be the first consideration, there was also something—a great deal according to Colonel Bell's ideas—to be said in support of aristocratic privileges and prejudices. Good heavens! a baronet and squire of many acres and long descent could not be flogged in the presence of a regiment of soldiers; some of whom represented his social equals and future associates, while the rest were his undoubted inferiors. This was what the matter had come to.

The lawyer's letter to Colonel Bell contained the document which was to buy off William Thwaite, private in the regiment, on the grounds that he had succeeded to the rank and property of a grand uncle, and was now Sir William Thwaite, of Whitehills, in Eastham; and it was not fit either for the rank and file of the army, or for the honourable fraternity of baronets and squires, that he should continue a day longer than was necessary a private soldier, even in the most select and distinguished regiment.

What would the firm think if the tidings were flashed to them that the baronet and squire was about to receive his deserts in the form of corporal punishment?

No, it could not be; the sentence, stringent as the obligation was, must be quashed—whether on the plea that the negotiation for Sir William's discharge had gone a certain length before he committed the offence, whether that Will Thwaite and Sir William, of Whitehills, were two different and distinct individuals, or from some other flaw in the indictment.

An informal council or court of astonished, scandalised officers was held. Colonel Bell assumed the responsibility of dealing with the War Office, and it was announced in a yet wider circle of open-eyed, open-mouthed, interested persons, that no flogging was to be performed. For William Thwaite, or, more properly, Sir William Thwaite, had already ceased to belong to the service, therefore his misconduct had been dealt with under a false assumption. If he were still to be held accountable it must be before another tribunal.

The news found Sir William too stunned to take in its meaning, beyond the two items that he was delivered at the eleventh hour from indelible obloquy, and that he was at liberty to depart from scenes which had become odious to him.

He staggered out into the blinding sunshine, doggedly enduring the measured explanations and shy, awkward congratulations of his recent superiors and judges, and impatiently shaking off the rougher and readier good wishes of his former allies. He went straight to his sister's without waiting for an invitation from Lawrie Thwaite, who, to be sure, looked more taken aback with the extraordinary change in his brother-in-law's fortunes than even Colonel Bell. The Colonel, after the first shocked sense of incongruity and confusion, detestable to a man of his precise cast of mind, did not testify any vindictiveness or unwillingness to admit that the scales had undergone a sudden reversal in a comrade's case. But Lawrie shrank into himself, looked blue and green, and could hardly furbish up the thankfulness that was called for from him.

"Did you ever see a chap hang his head as if his nose was bleeding, because his brother-in-law weren't walloped, and had come into a pot of money and a handle to his name? It ain't always not lost what a friend gets," remarked a shrewd observer.

"Could this fellow have counted on any chance of his coming into the succession? He is a cousin of the other beggar's, and he might have calculated on Will never getting the better of the beastly consequences of his precious performance, drinking himself to death, or shooting himself. I have known a man pull the trigger on less provocation."

surmised a more thoughtful speculator on the event which was the talk of the station for weeks to come. "Well, I for one am glad that the luck has fallen to the first. He has the thews and sinews of a man, a clean-made, well-knit fellow, and would have been a first-rate soldier if he could have learnt self-control. I remember his dragging Roberts out of the enemy's range in the encounter in the Little Ghaut when he first came out, and when we had some brisk business doing. But he was always getting into a mess, and this last spurt of insolence threatened to put on the finishing-touch. He will go to the dogs as it is, taking a little longer time perhaps."

Nobody, save the two, saw and heard the ecstasy of Jenny's recovery of her brother and recognition of his changed estate.

Nobody—Jenny included—doubted that Sir William would immediately start for England, where much business, the unpleasantness of which would splendidly gild, must await him. The lawyers had sent ample funds for his travelling expenses, and there was nothing to detain him.

But a sorrowful, peremptory impediment sprang up on the eve of Will's starting. Jenny was worn by long years of work, and her constitution had not been improved by the climate of India. She was further spent by the burning anxiety and incredible exertions of the last few days in the hottest of the hot season. She fell a ready victim to the fever hovering about the native town, and the disease from the commencement assumed a hopeless aspect.

There was no want of interest and sympathy. The mingled sensations, which Sir William's story had excited, relieved themselves in a crowd of attentions to the invalid. Jenny had many more shapes of jelly, bottles of wine, and preparations of iced milk sent to her than she could have possibly swallowed, even though her short illness had been indefinitely prolonged. Her former employers waylaid Sir William and Lawrie Thwaite every time they stirred abroad, with inquiries, offers of service, even proposals to come and share the task of nursing the patient. These demonstrations proceeded quite as much from the romance of the situation, with the melancholy nature of poor Jenny's final part in Sir William's good fortune, as from interested motives.

Lawrie Thwaite did not fail in attention to his wife, though ■■■ had never recovered from the combined shocks of his kinsman's dishonour and honour. He was a plump man, he said, and could not stand such flights of fortune. But he knew a good wife when he had her. He was persuaded—drawing the deduction from his own disposition, that it would be the last blow; everything would be up with him if Jenny died, and not only deprived him of her services, but severed the near connection between him and Sir William. "Drat Will Thwaite, that he should bear a title like an alderman or a dook."

But Jenny, who had always been courageous and self-denying, was resigned to her fate and the will of God. She tried her best to meet and overcome the passionate rebellion of her brother. Her heart was still so full of gratitude and joy on his account that she had no room for sorrow for herself. ■■ appeared as if she had come to see that all was for the best, and could feel an unearthly satisfaction in this last offering up of herself for the lad.

"You won't want me any more, Will, I should only have been in your way," she said faintly.

"Jen," he protested in his vehement depths of love and sorrow, "you know I would rather have lived in the most miserable den, and had nothing except potatoes and salt to keep me from starving, with you, than without you to be master of the finest house in the kingdom, and have grand furniture and delicate dishes at my command. So don't go for to leave me, Jen—don't, if you ever cared a farthing for a scamp who was never worth the trouble you took for him, and the fondness you wasted on him."

"No, no, my dear, I have my reward when I think of you as a gentleman among the best. I do know that it is sore for you to give me up, for we've come through the hardships together, that we've, but we've seen the last of poverty and knocking about, and it is all for the best. A pretty like figure I should have made as a baroness's sister! Why, Will"—raising herself up with difficulty, a smile on her wan face—"you'll get a fine young lady for your wife, as good as she is fine. You won't miss your sister Jen, though your kind heart will never let you forget her."

"I don't want a fine young lady," said Will hoarsely. "What should I do with such cattle? They would only laugh at me and despise me. I only want you, Jen."

"Ah, lad, you don't know what is good for you. Rest content; there is One as knows, and He don't make no mistakes, though it ain't the thing we fancy we want. He gives us mostly. But there is something you can do for me, lad, before I go—a single favour I'm bold ■ ax."

"Ax all I have, and you are welcome to it, Jen. Don't put your request in that way," said Will reproachfully.

"Nay, ■ is the fitting way, since you are the head of the house—Sir Wil'am, no less"—dwelling on the words in her weak voice with loving triumph. "If I am not the first to do you honour, who should be? But I ha'n't too much breath to spare. Will, dear, ■ is the drink that has been your ruin; not that you're ruined—far from it—and you ain't a sot—God forbid—but you've gone your own way, and not been too petticklar about the company you kep'—judging others as you did yourself, like a innocent 'igh-spirited chap—not always looking out for number one, keeping out of mischief yourself, and leaving others to pay the piper, like poor Lawrie, and the drink has done the rest. When it was on you it has driven the wit clean out, and made your temper work like mad. Promise you will have no more to do with the drink, for it tempts gentle and simple, in one shape or another, ■ I've seen in some of the tip-top bungalows where I've gone to do a day's washing. Your being Sir Wil'am and a squire will not keep you straight, but will only make your fall the greater, if you let the drink get the better of you. I'll not rest in my grave if that day come. Promise me, Will, you'll have done with the drink, and I'll die 'appy."

"I swear I'll never put my lips to a glass from this day forth, if that will content you. It is the least I can do for you, that has done everything for me since mother left me a whining babby," the young man vowed solemnly.

"And I can answer for your keeping your word;—that's my good lad," declared the dying woman, with growing feebleness and perfect satisfaction.

Will roused her afresh. "Is there anything more I ■ do for you, Jen?" he implored—"not for myself, but for yourself or any other person you mind about."

"Bless the lad! what should I desire now but to 'ave him sitting there, where my eyes can fall upon him, the last thing. Well, there is Lawrie. I doubt poor Lawrie will miss me a bit," muttered Jenny, rather in a tone of benevolent consideration than of keen sympathy. "You might spare a trifle and settle summat on Lawrie. He's your cousin, as well as my good man—a poor relation of the family, such as you were wont to be when no helping-hand was held out to you; but it's forget and forgive where I'm going. With that and his pension, when his time is out, he'll fare well enough, without feeling the odds of me gone, and no more money coming in to eke out his pay."

"He may have the half of all I'm to get for your sake, Jen. I don't feel to care about it," said the new squire in his despondency.

"The half of your inheritance! Have you taken leave of your senses, lad?" cried Jenny, almost springing back to life and energy at the extravagance of the proposal. "What would Lawrie Thwaite do with a gentleman's allowance? You could never make a gentleman of him. He would only board it, and run the risk of being robbed and murdered, or be cheated out of it by some fair-tongued scoundrel, for Lawrie ain't wise, though I've heard him called a wisacre. Between you and me, he's greedy and cunning, poor soul; but there ben't no great harm in him, and he ha'n't much of a head-piece. No, Will, I said a trifle out of your abundance; stick to that, and I 'ont be displeased or troubled with the fear that I did wrong in marrying Lawrie to follow you, and so mebbee hung a millstone round your neck. We're but weak critters, and don't see an inch before our noses. For his sake as well as for yours, let it be no more than is in keeping with what he has been used to, and what he needs. It is another thing with you, who are to be a grand gentleman, a benefactor to your kind, like old General Leigh with his soldiers and the natives. You remember him and the monster funeral he had? Ay, but I would have liked to see you at the height of your glory!" cried Jenny, beginning to wander. "I would have liked to have seen Whitehills just once, and then crept down into the dark hole. Whitehills, with its floors of gold and its gates ■ pearls, and you among your ivory and your apes and peacocks. But we'll meet again in a better place, Will—a better place, where there's no more parting."

Jenny was dead and buried. There had been a most respectable attendance at her funeral. ■ seemed perfectly natural that her brother, Sir William, should act as chief mourner, paying his sister all the respect which she had so richly merited, in his first appearance in public after his accession to rank and fortune. The company were actually at the grave's mouth before an awkward omission was remarked. The widower had not joined the little cavalcade.

Will took himself severely to task because he had shut himself up with his sorrow and only come out when ■ was summoned to walk at the head of the coffin. He went immediately on his return to seek his brother-in-law, and take the first steps in the arrangement which had been agreed upon between Will Thwaite and his sister. ■ was too late: the wretched man had hanged himself.

The catastrophe was classed as a singular instance of wedded love and despair in a man who had not been demonstrative in his regard for his partner during her lifetime. Paradoxical, pensive spirits pointed to it as a case of repressed emotion and misunderstood devotion.

The sorry truth was that Lawrence Thwaite had been goaded, beyond the utmost stretch of his endurance, by the cruel chapter of accidents which had thwarted all his crafty plans and secret hopes. Why had even happened so promiscuously, and yet with such horrible fortuitousness, for Will? Why had his prodigal course been stopped, before folly and the climate had sent him post-haste and betimes, beyond the succession to a baronetcy and a squire's acres? Why had the indignity and anguish of the flogging been remitted? Why had old Sir John Thwaite, after he had lived beyond his three-score and twenty years, not hung out just another month, but insisted on dying in the very nick of time? Why had the post-runners not slackened their speed and delayed the mail, if but for one hour? And now the last misfortune had happened. Jenny, who was so clever a bread-winner and manager, had taken it upon her to die out of hand. There had been no love lost between him and Will in the past. Will would seize the opportunity of Jenny's death and his departure to enter on his possessions, to get rid of Lawrie, as Lawrie, in similar circumstances, would have got rid of Will. Lawrie would be reduced to his poor pay, with the prospect of greater indigence in his old age, after he had been let down from a condition of comparative comfort, and shut out from the intoxicating prospect of a great inheritance.

It was more than the miserable man could bear. He counted himself hardly dealt with, both by God and man; his brain reeled, and he flung up the game in a sudden fury, which altogether overcame his caution and deliberation.

As for Will, he was cut to the heart by what struck him as the ghastly result of his swift, selfish unfaithfulness to Jenny's trust; though he could not pretend to regret, on any other grounds than those of horror and pity, his kinsman's fate. It sank into Will's spirit that no good had come, or would come, of his prosperity. It had saved his worthless credit and life, but ■ had cost Jenny her life, and ■ had driven Lawrie Thwaite to destruction.

CHAPTER IV.—WHITETHILLS.

THE Thwaites of Whitehills were one of the oldest families in Eastham, but, like many another old family, all ■ members had not preserved its dignity intact, or behaved with the decorum which ought ■ have accompanied blue blood. Two generations before, a foolish lad had alienated his kinsfolk by a low marriage with the daughter of one of the keepers. He had consummated his evil-doing, in the eyes of the head of the house, by declining to come begging for pardon, and ■ submit to the authority which should mete out to him at once his punishment and such assistance as might enable him to make the best of his bad bargain and refrain from disgracing his family further. He was only too willing in his refractoriness to drink as he had brewed; but since such culprits are not often gifted with the strength of character and determination of mind which mark the successful architects of their own fortunes, the drink he consumed grew very thin indeed. He sank lower and lower in the social scale, and ended by becoming a considerable burden on his father-in-law, the keeper. He had, as a matter of course, been dismissed from Whitehills; but ■ he was a capable, industrious man, master of his calling, and had not been privy to his daughter's love and ambition, he succeeded without much difficulty in getting employment in another part of the county.

The matter, though a source of mortification and pain to the Thwaites of that day, was of less consequence, apart from family pride and affection, inasmuch as the delinquent was not the heir, and had more than one elder brother.

There was ■ lack of sons then at Whitehills; but time sometimes works havoc among the strongest of such stays. Time was rather slow in its work ■ this instance, and as a cousin who has descended in the social ranks is not like a brother fallen into low life, the successors of the erratic Thwaite who was at the bottom of the mischief were still more left to their fate by their illustrious relatives.

The poor Thwaites, inheriting the good and evil of the paternal temper, had the rare grace not to obtrude themselves on the notice of their loftier kindred, though the plebeian branch kept up the recollection of their descent. One of them had even gone so far as to make, on one of his few holidays, at a considerable sacrifice, an unusually journey in third-class carriages and on the tramp, to gaze, from a respectful distance, with gloating, covetous eyes on what, in picturesque language, might be called the cradle of his race. He kept the expedition jealously concealed from people who had even a nearer interest in it. No doubt it added to the liveliness of the interest, that the news of the gradual sweeping away of the elder branch of the stock had filtered somehow ■ those most concerned. Deaths at home and abroad, old bachelors whose rights perished with them, childless couples equally without representatives, left the last Sir John, in the direct line, limited to his family and to the alien Thwaites for the preservation of the title and land in connection with the original name. He had no power by the terms of the entail to will away the inheritance—even so far as heirs female, while there existed the remotest heirs male who could prove their descent and produce their registers.

In view of the exigency of the situation, Sir John seized the opportunity of marrying twice—first in early manhood and again late in life. A third opportunity was not vouchsafed to him. In the first instance the children died in infancy. In the second the sole child born was a boy, weak both in body and mind.

There seemed no resource for Sir John save to make himself acquainted with his poor relations, and cultivate them diligently while there was yet time to provide a decent wearer of his honours. But the old man was of an arrogant, narrow temper. He clung to the last, with as much passionate pride as human feeling, to the hope that his poor boy, with all the aid which his position could give him, would grow stronger and wiser as he grew older, and when that trust was stamped out by the death of the little fellow, the father would not consent to put a low bumpkin in his son's place. He washed his hands of the whole matter, the error of his ancestor and the misfortune of an illiterate, underbred master of Whitehills. Sir John peevishly refused to do what he could to set the wrong right. If Providence had chosen it was to be so, why should he plague himself to concoct a partial remedy?

All that Sir John would attempt for the name and the good of the place was to keep it as long as he could and keep the till his last breath. Then he contrived to do till he was an octogenarian with four or five years to spare.

The Thwaites with the puddle in their blue blood had not been longer lived or more productive of heirs than the main line had shown itself. At last the inferior branch resolved itself into Will and Jenny Thwaite, the son and daughter of the elder grandson of Dicky Thwaite, who fell from his station by marrying the keeper's daughter, and Lawrie Thwaite, the grandson of the younger son of the same worthy. There was no confusion of numbers or difficulty in tracing the proper descendant from the man who formed the link ■ the baronetcy and estate. Perhaps the wonder was that no long-sighted individual had anticipated the end, and insisted on advancing money, or otherwise bettering the condition of the future Sir William. But Will and Jenny would have looked shyly on such overtures, and their going out to India put temptation more out of their reach.

Sir William had never seen Whitehills before the day that he drove down to it with his lawyer, one of the leading members of the well-reputed firm, a clever little gentlemanlike man, who honestly wished to do his best by his strange client, but could not make much of him, as he watched him curiously at a crucial epoch of his history. Sir William was a personable enough young fellow of five or six and twenty. He was not above five feet eight in his inches; but his sinewy figure was well developed. His carriage was good, though it partook a little of the ramrod; but that defect was sometimes to be found in the bearing of field-marshal. Thanks to his soldiering, Sir William was delivered from the clumsy, loutish shuffle or slouch of a day-labourer or a mechanic, and from the jerking gait or skip of a journeyman tradesman or counter-jumper. His close-cropped hair was chestnut, the florid colouring of his face had not yet lost the bronze of India and the tan of a sea voyage. It was a complexion which was not a bad match for that of a college undergraduate who went in for athletic sports, or of a country gentleman who had his year strictly divided into fishing, shooting, and hunting seasons.

In some respects the lad looked younger than his years, though ■ was of manly make. In others—in a slight massiveness peculiar to his features, and in what had become the indelible gravity of his aspect, he gave one the idea of maturer age than he had attained. The best and the most striking things in his face consisted of two marked traits. The natural sweep of his hair made an ample corner on each side of his forehead, disclosing a full brow, above well apart eyes and eyebrows, which lent an impression of honesty and frankness, as well as of intellectual capacity. His eyes were dark blue, and though they sparkled oftener than they melted, would have gone a long way to confer beauty on a woman's face. The worst points were incongruous and contradictory in the inferences to be drawn from them. The jaw inclined to dogged squareness, while the chin was ill defined and boded weakness.

Mr Miles the lawyer, during the necessary detention of Sir William in town, had in the most delicate manner suggested an outfit in accordance with the change of rank. This and other considerate attentions had provoked no resistiveness on the part of their object, such as might have been apprehended from a feather headed fool suddenly raised to an elevation altogether beyond his level, with the etiquette of which he was necessarily unfamiliar. Sir William adopted a tweed morning suit and a dinner dress without making any difficulty. What he did in trifles was a happy sign of what he might accomplish in weightier matters. His mode of meeting the hunt given him raised him in the opinion of the late Sir John's agents. But the instructions could not be more than hints, for, with all his rusticity and simplicity, there was something about the heir which kept sensible, self-respecting men, gentlemen themselves, at a proper distance.

On the other hand there was nothing about Sir William which could force his prompts to look down upon him, while they should be under the necessity of taking the upper hand with him. The lawyers found their client had fair parts, and could understand what was explained to him, even though it had to do with business out of his accustomed rut. He had received a very tolerable education in the three great primitive R's, and of one R he had availed himself pretty considerably, in what appeared, at first sight, untoward circumstances. He had a taste for reading, and in spite of his admitted wildness, had taken advantage of the regimental library.

Altogether, what with the gain of his foreign experience and military training—granted that the last was in the ranks—he might at least hold his own, on the score of ordinary intellectual knowledge, with those young English gentlemen who have no taste for the classics, have been plucked over and over again in their examinations, frequent stables and kennels instead of drawing-rooms, and never open a book except the Field or Bell's Life.

Meane Miles and Dickinson were rather proud of their client. They had dreaded something very different, now they augured quite hopefully of his future—a quiet fellow, not at all without common sense, which was better than uncommon genius, who had done with sowing his wild oats, and pulled up effectually so far as anybody could judge. He might not make such a mess of the baronetcy and property as some very fine gentlemen would have done. Manners, of course, he had none, but no manners were a great improvement on bad manners. He had everything to learn there, but comparatively little to unlearn. He had his drop of good blood, which people would be particularly ready to recognise, seeing it was now fitly balanced by an old title and good landed property. The last, no agricultural depression, or vindictive policy of old Sir John in granting long leases at low rents, and pensioning dependents inordinately, could greatly impair. In those days, when landowners had a strong call to fall back into gentlemen farmers working their own land, against odds too, Sir William might not be amiss as a plain country gentleman. Let him marry well—

A good deal later with a long sigh she said and never fair in her finger-tips, and be unenable to his wife in those respects in which she was his superior, and there was no fear of him. He seemed a finish fellow in the main, both in physique and morals.

What puzzled and disconcerted Mr. Miles in his otherwise satisfactory charge, was the inflexible gravity and inscrutable reserve with which Sir William made acquaintance with his prospects, and at last with his place. It was surely unnatural, especially at his age, that he should express no rejoicing, hardly even satisfaction, at his accession. He had lost his sister very recently, the death of an elderly married woman, though she had brought him up, was not likely to affect so deeply a young fellow with the ball at his foot.

Sir William and Mr. Miles were driving over from the nearest station in a trap which the lawyer had appointed to be ready for them. He had thought it better not to order the Whitehills carriage to meet them, with its announcement that the new comers, and its proclamation of the body they might pass on the wiser arrangement was for arrive without attracting p

■ a demonstration were demanded and found desirable, let it come later, when everybody should be better acquainted and prepared for what was to happen. When Sir William's wishes were asked on the subject, he emphatically acquiesced ■ Mr. Miles's judicious plan.

The day was in spring, daring blustering, but not uncheery, March weather. The landscape was as flat as most of the scenery of Eastham; but it was not without its charms in the absence of picturesqueness. It was wide and free, even to its broad, rutted, shaggy green lanes, in which a gipsy encampment of the evicted Shakers might pitch a tent or two, and still leave ample room for the small traffic, principally of carts or waggon and day-labourers passing that way. There was a certain rugged sincerity ■ the unpretending homeliness of the fields, together with a shade of sadness and sombreness oftener attributed to some descriptions of French than to any examples of English landscape.

This suspicion of pathos had a complex origin. This corner of Eastham had never been in the van of agricultural progress, and was as moderately productive as it was inadequately cultivated. ■ had plenty of well-preserved, carefully-stocked coverts for game, and been a hunting reputation, but the low value of the land in other respects was evident. Not merely in the spaciousness and frequency of the lanes, but in the recurring wedges of ground covered with straggling, sodden grass and rushes.

The country here was very scantily populated. Anything like market-towns or villages worthy of the name were separated by six or eight miles. In general, a village was represented by half-a-dozen thatched or tiled houses—not even clustering together, but standing with wide gaps, till the dwellings extended over a quarter of a mile—by solitary roadside inns, and roadside shops which partook of the character of Australian stores. As for the small, ancient, often beautiful churches, they seemed to exist principally in connection with their rectories, sometimes equally beautiful in their exterior, red-brick multiplicity of angles and lustrant green draperies. The mansions of the nobility and gentry were largely conspicuous by their absence, and the square seats had sunk into farm-houses, dating in more than one instance from Elizabethan or other times, which would have delighted the antiquary or the

what was, in fact, one of the most primitive districts in England; though it had not been furnished with any barricade of hills or rivers.

The working people, consisting almost entirely of day-labourers, the moment they had passed their first youth, looked dull and apathetic, on rare occasions fierce and savage, as if heart and spirit had either been crushed out of them, or raised into sullen revolt by the grinding toil necessary to keep soul and body together. ■ was probable that William the Conqueror's Doomsday Book attested the region—what with Norman castles, Saxon homestead, and religious houses, squatters on waste territory, fishery of pike and tench and shooters of wild fowl—more populous and fully as thriving as ■ was to-day.

So much for the sombreness of what was comparatively waste, half-inhabited and down-trodden in this section of Eastham; but there was no gloom which a March wind and a changeful March sky could not relieve and carry off. There was a flavour of liberty and a feeling of room to breathe in the uncrowded earth and the unvitiated, though somewhat moist and heavy air. The patches of blue in the sky were matched by the springing green corn and the banks studded with primroses. There were more than primroses gemming the little watercourses and the long grass by the sides of the ditches; there were such quantities of purple and white violets unseen by the travellers, that they lent a subtle sweetness to the scent of decaying leaves and freshly turned-over earth. Bees were wheeling and cawing over the ploughing and the sowing in the fields. Small birds were stirring and chirping in the coverts, where the twigs of the underwood had swollen with the bourgeons, and acquired the bluish-purple tint of the bloom on a plum. Colts, calves, and lambs were kicking up their heels and frisking in the meadows.

"That is Whitehill, Sir William. Let me congratulate myself on being the first to point out to you the home of your ancestors," said Mr. Miles, betrayed into tall language by the importance of the occasion, as the trap turned the bend of the road which brought the mansion-house into view.

"Just so. Thank you, Sir," said Sir William, who had not got over the last form of address, and who spoke mechanically, and almost as apathetically as any native. He did not even spring up to a standing position to catch a better glimpse of the house. What he did see of it, perhaps, was not calculated to strike him much, unless he were blinded by the sense of ownership. He was neither antiquary nor archaeologist, and what he distinguished between the leafless branches of the trees of the park was only a long low white building, with the remains of a moat in a gleaming pond—a common feature of all the old "halls" in that part of Eastham. The house was not likely to impress his ignorant, underbred taste. He felt rather inclined to contrast the reality a little sadly and sardonically with his poor Jen's delicious dreams—in which she confounded earth and heaven—of floors of gold and gates of pearls.

Mr. Miles had cleared his throat and began to talk of the origin of the name. There were no hills in Eastham, and hardly even one elevation here. Some people thought that "hills" referred to remote cromlechs or mounds over illustrious dead, whether Danes or Normans, Saxons or Britons, and that the adjective "white" meant either the unsullied purity of their patriotism, or the clear light of that land to which their souls had fled.

Old Sir John had pensioned his domestics so liberally that they had retired in a body for the most part, to enjoy the idleness and domesticity secured to their declining years. One or two, who had been more Lady Thwaite's servants than Sir John's, went to form the nucleus of a comfortable establishment for the well-jointed widow at the dowager-house of Netherton, four miles off. Mr. Miles had taken care that a new staff should be put in office, and had enlarged to his wife on the great gain of a discreet butler and a stand, efficient housekeeper. The first performance of these important minor actors in the drama was perfectly satisfactory, and did credit to Mrs. Miles's selection. They behaved with the silent, attentive civility which was all that was wanted from them. If they could practise imperturbability in addition to the quiet discharge of their duties, it might be as well; though Mr. Miles began to hope more and more that Sir William would not, from the beginning, tax too severely the nerves of his domestics or outrange their standards. No doubt a gentleman from the ranks might hold his tongue to his agent, and yet not preserve his distance from the inferiors with whom he would come in constant contact. For that matter, these would hardly have held him their social equal of old. But Mr. Miles was fain to anticipate better things from Sir William.

The heir had crossed the fine old hall, really a choice specimen of a low-roofed but spacious, many-recessed entrance hall, where black and white marble had preceded tiles, and a great fireplace, sending forth a ruddy glow of light and heat, diffused a grateful warmth that took out the sting implanted by the March winds, and offered a kind of physical welcome home.

From the equally balmy atmosphere of a corridor, rich in pictures, cabinets, and the superseded Lady Thwaite's fancy in flower-stands and low ottomans, Sir William had entered the library, with its entire lining of books, its classic busts and faint perfume of generations of culture transmitted by the medium of old Russian leather. It had been Sir John's study, though he was neither a scholar nor a student, and had never struck him as out of keeping with its possessor. But it was here that the sense of the contrast between his past and present position seized upon Sir John's successor and staggered him.

It was easy enough to guess that the change might be too great to be pleasant, though none save Will Thwaite himself knew the whole story of that Nihilpoor, where he had lain on his face groaning, awaiting the brutal punishment of the lash. The scene rose up before him with sickening, revolting vividness. Just so it would arise and fill him with a kind of dire bewilderment and terror as of discovery, exposure, and the awakening from a mad beguiling dream, on many a future occasion which would otherwise have been among the gladdest and brightest experiences of his life. Not the den of Nihilpoor alone, for that had not been the first instance of his lying under arrest in a dog hole, neither had he been a martyr to military tyranny and his commanding officer's persecution. He had deserved all he had got and more. The guilt of low desertion in which he had been sinking deeper and deeper, from which Jen had striven in vain to warn and snatch him, stood out as plainly written in letters of fire on his brain. From the moment he had bent over Jen's bed and known himself powerless to save her, his remorse for those grievous sins against her devotion, which had cost her life, smote him with throes of self-disgust convulsing his nature and threatening to remain an indelible accusing record on his conscience, quickening any original sensitiveness which had been hardening for years, and rendering it morbid for life. He could not agree with her that she would have cut but a poor figure without to adorn his elevation in rank. If that were true, he might as well perish the elevation, for he knew, as she did, how she was his superior, and how she had done more to save him, and better than he. It was over her grave that he had stepped to his promotion. He had even, in his wretched self-engrossment, neglected her last charge and suffered Lawrie to perish. ■ it were not for his pledge to Jen, he would not care what became of him when everybody was singing out the mocking lie that ■ had been so lucky in coming into a fortune and all of rubbish. But, for Jen's sake, he must keep his word and deny himself to the last the one antidote ■ his misery. He must die game and sober.

CHAPTER V.—NEIGHBOURS.

SIR WILLIAM had paused on the threshold of the library, and Mr. Miles, who was watching his companion, saw him get first red and then white, and hang his head. The next moment the master of the house walked to one of the windows, and, as if to mask any disturbance ■ had betrayed, asked, in the slow, measured speech which attaches to speakers who weigh every word they utter, "What is that house to the right? Who occupies it?"

"There is only one house within sight, I think," said Mr. Miles, in the easy, unaffected tone he sought ■ establish between the two, joining the speaker as ■ spoke. "That is Lambford; it belongs to Lord Fermor. He is in his dotage, and Lady Fermor rules for him. She is your nearest neighbour. I am sorry to say she cannot be called a good neighbour."

Sir William's curiosity was easily satisfied.

Naturally it was not the first time that the lawyer had dined with his client. Mr. Miles had already found the opportunity of noting two things. One was, that the young baronet conducted himself very much according to ordinary rules. He had assisted as an orderly at mess dinners; he had come home as a first-class passenger, and, being surrounded by an odour of good fortune, his presence had been welcomed instead of tabooed at the table d'hôte. He was too proud to subject himself to ridicule by failing to acquire habits which the practice of a little observation and self-restraint could quickly teach him. A smart soldier, clean and neat to finicalness, tutored to one species of etiquette, has always the making of a conventional gentleman in him, however far ■ may be from the higher type, and Will Thwaite, apart from his fits of dissipation, had been a very smart soldier.

The second peculiarity which had attracted Mr. Miles's attention was that Sir William drank nothing save water. Taken by surprise, the elder man was tempted to rally the younger gently, for already the lawyer was doubtful whether the young baronet were a fellow at whom his neighbours could safely poke fun. "Are you a Good Templar? Have you taken the pledge?"

Sir William did not appear to see the joke.

"No, I am not, though there are some of the sort in India," he said with his accustomed gravity; "but I have taken a pledge, though it is not of the kind you mean."

"All right," answered Mr. Miles. "Every man should judge for himself." At the same time he was reflecting in his own mind, "I wish you may keep it. Possibly these are the wisest lines for you."

So it was the butler, and not Mr. Miles, who received a shock from his master's decided waiving aside of his attentions with, "I don't want any wine."

"No wine, Sir William? I beg pardon, sir, but I think I must be mistaken. Do you mean neither sherry nor chablis, nor hock?—I have them all here with the liqueurs, and the claret and port later. Perhaps you prefer a liqueur first. Some of the gentlemen I have been with always began with a liqueur."

"No,"—Sir William stopped himself just in time from saying, "No, thank you, sir," to the black-coated dignitary, hanging anxiously on his words—"I drink nothing but water, my man," floundering into the opposite extreme of too affable familiarity this time. "You need not trouble to have out these things," indicating the old cut wine-glasses and decantera, with a fine indifference, "unless, of course," stammering a little as he corrected himself, for the obligations of hospitality are strong in the class from which he had just emerged, "when any gentleman is here who drinks wine."

The butler knew that his master had been a grub before he became a butterfly, but the sentence about the wines floored the subordinate considerably. "I say," he remonstrated with himself, "I can't stand this! 'My man,' indeed! from one who has piped his own belts and polished his own shoes. Why, the Dean called me 'Mr. Cumberbatch' as often as not. Good wages, light work, and time to one's self are all very well, and an inducement to put up with a master who has risen from the dirt, though he were the right heir, and is a likely enough young gentleman to look at. When it comes to that we're all Adam's sons. But what are we coming ■ when wine ain't countenanced at a squire and baronet's table? There will be no broken bottles of claret, or sherry, or nothin' for the hall-table; and beer will vanish next. We're to be tea-tottlers, if not saints. What about the plate? Is silver or silver-gilt sinful? Are we all to eat off coarsest earthenware, and sport sack cloth and ashes?"

From the caustic irony of his thoughts the reader may judge how deeply the boiler was moved. Nevertheless Mr Cumberbatch was able to bring in a note on a salver, and present it in a respectfully reproachful way to Sir William. He took it, opened and read it, and then handed it with a mystified air to his companion, yet it was no more than one of those notes which fly about the world launched by idly busy hands, and do not even require an answer.

It had only one reason for making a mark on reaching its destination. It was the daintiest note Sir William had ever received, written on black edged note paper like satin, supplied with both a crest and a monogram—a tiny version of what, in an enlarged form, had been shown and explained to Sir William the two bounds in a bush under an oak tree, which constituted the heraldic bearings of the Thwaites, together with a fanciful miniature A T.

The clear writing was a little bold for so small an epistle, while it conveyed the frankest, most courteous, and magnanimous of greetings. "Dear Sir William," it said, "I cannot help calling you so, and desiring to be the first to bid you welcome to the charming old place, which I know so well, and where I have been so happy. That you are in the room of my dear husband and beloved child is only an additional reason why I should have the most cordial interest in your welfare, if you will allow me to say so. I trust I shall soon have the pleasure of seeing you, and knowing you as a friend and near neighbour.—Believe me, dear Sir William, yours sincerely, ADA THWAITE."

"Well, Sir William?" said Mr Miles tentatively, with a smile, while he was turning over rapidly in his mind the considerations which the note suggested. "What can she want? She does not intend to become Lady Thwaite the Second by captivating young Sir William after she has disposed of old Sir John. Oh dear, no! She is a great deal too astute, while she is too mild and well bred an adventuress for so violent and vulgar a dodge. She must be ten or fifteen years his senior. Mischief, not malice, pickings, not plunderings, are her cue. I know her of old. The prestige of becoming, by the assertion of a prior right, first and best acquainted with the gentleman, and then of trotting him out to the neighbourhood, on the gas wire for his arrival, if he turn out a decent specimen of resuscitated gentility, will count for something. There may be certain dowager perquisites over and above the bond, though she has a very pretty jointure, and he is saddled with a life almost as good as his own on the property. She will have the use of his horses when he does not require them, with offerings of game and fruit beyond what Netheriton can produce. She will have the advantage of continuing the first female influence at Whitchills till she gets a wife."

Mr. Miles's speculations were interrupted.

"I suppose it is Sir John's widow, and it is good of her not to mind," said Sir William slowly. "But what am I to do about her? What does she expect me to do? I have no acquaintance with people of her kind. I am not fit to go into such company, at least, not yet a bit."

It was as if Sir William had proposed to reply to the note dashed off in a few minutes, by sitting down at his desk, squaring his arms, and musing with care and deliberation, and not without the assistance of a dictionary, a formal, frozen letter, so precisely to the point that it might have been printed.

"Oh, you will find no difficulty!" said Mr Miles cheerfully. "I know Lady Thwaite quite well, and will introduce you if you like. She is not a hard person to get on with, and she may in turn make you acquainted with the neighbourhood, which in the sense of society is not extensive. I never did any man or woman good to shun his or her kind, and hold them at arm's length, any amount of difficulties and rubbing the wrong way is preferable. Lady Thwaite means to be gracious, and it will not do for you—I speak as your friend and senior by thirty years—to meet her advances ungraciously. You must condone all former neglect or anything that strikes you as forward in the present overture. I will confess to you that I do not give her credit for the finest perceptions or the most exquisite tact. But the world, which is not too nice in its tastes, does not agree with me. It counts her as pleasant and clever as she is good-natured, and votes her its greatest popularity. She is certainly good natured, but she can be offended, though she is not very spiteful. She might do you harm by driving her pair of ponies all over the country, and airing her rebuff in the spirit of an accomplished gossip, who finds food for her calling everywhere."

She can treat the matter either as a grievance or as a good joke, which would be rather the worst treatment of the two."

"I don't care a rap," cried Sir William, swelling a little with indignation; "she may, if she likes, for me. I shall be a poor creature, indeed, if I mind what a parcel of old women say."

"Softly, softly, my dear fellow!" asserted Mr. Miles, seeking to keep the peace. "No man can afford to be so independent. In the second place, Lady Thwaite is not an old woman. What put such a shocking idea into your head? I shall be surprised if you take her for more than five-and-twenty—about your own age—when you see her. In reality she is a handsome, well-preserved woman between five-and-thirty and forty—no more."

"I shall think the worse of her if she is made up to look what she is not, like a horse at a fair," said Sir William a little doggedly, and with brutal plain speaking, as a recollection flashed across his mind of his sister Jen, with her spare, worn figure and face, and her patches of grey hair. Where had he read—for this ex-sergeant had been given to reading in his wiser moments—of such ashen patches as flakes of heaven's sunshine?"

"You must remember she has a claim upon your forbearance," represented Mr. Miles adroitly, not noticing the ebullition which smelt of the hole whence Sir William had been dug. "Your first impulse to regard it as good of her to write to you was not altogether wrong. Poor soul! the fate of her boy cut her up considerably."

"Very well, I'll go and see her if that will be of any use. I expect that is what it will come to," said Sir William, as if he were submitting to a disagreeable necessity.

Mr. Miles had to be content with the concession. Holding intercourse with Sir William at this date partook a good deal of the nature of a one-handed conversation, and the one-handedness seemed to increase when the only share of the host, in the post-prandial conviviality, consisted in passing the decanters, which Sir William was scrupulous to do. The situation began to get intolerably heavy to a town-bred man accustomed to a very different description of dining out—something that he was used to regard complacently as having to do with "the feast of reason and the flow of soul."

"The cub is not a bad cub," he grumbled, "but I hope Lady Thwaite, or some one else, will have licked him into shape, so as to render him livelier, before I visit Whitehills again. Funeral baked meats would be a hilarious entertainment in comparison with this orgy on entering into possession."

As a little variety, after coffee had been sent in, Mr. Miles proposed a stroll in the dusk, comforted by the sense that things would not be so unsocial, since Sir William had not abjured a pipe along with a glass.

The two men went as far as one of the park gates, and stood leaning over, looking into the darkening high-road. It was as empty as most country roads at the season and hour, when all at once a close carriage appeared in the distance, looming out of the obscurity, jolting rather than bowling along.

Mr. Miles grew quite excited by this little adventure, though it was hardly within the bounds of possibility that it could bring other visitors to Whitehills. As the carriage drew nearer he had, at least, the satisfaction of announcing that he knew it. It was one of the Lambford carriages; he had seen the liveries when he was down at Whitehills before. Lady Fernor must have been at Knotley to her banker or shopping. The old lady still did her business for herself, though it was a mercy to think she was too old for the gaieties which had made her earlier career notorious.

Mr. Miles's scandal against Queen Elizabeth was brought to an abrupt conclusion. The carriage stopped, the coachman kept his post, while a groom alighted. Presently it became evident that Lady Fernor wished the lamps lit before she proceeded farther, and that the groom was bound for the porter's lodge to get a light. For anything that the two lookers-on knew, they might be unseen by the occupants of the carriage. But it did not accord with Mr. Miles's old-fashioned politeness to remain hidden while he could help a lady. He had met Lady Fernor at old meets and hunting breakfasts at Lambford. He opened the gate, stepped briskly forward, leaving Sir William behind, and went up, hat in hand, to the window, which had been drawn down. "Can I do anything for you, Lady Fernor?" he asked with the civility of a man of the world. "I doubt if you have forgotten me. My name is Miles. At one time I was often down from town on law business of poor Sir John's, and I had the pleasure of getting a little sport and enjoying Lord Fernor's hospitality when the scent held and we could get a run across cow Lady Fernor's old head, in a juvenile bonnet, was thrust out of the at once. Hauteur or reserve had never among her faults. "I remember you factly, Mr. Miles. I am glad to renew acquaintance Will you be so good as to see that my groom lights the lamps so that one or other does not go out after the first hundred yards? I have been to Knotley, and stayed too long—let myself be benighted like a dissipated old woman. But what brings you down here just now? ■ at anything about your new clown ■ a baronet?"

"Hush! he is just behind me." Mr Miles was forced to warn her.

"There, bring him forward at once and present him to me, and to my grand-daughter Iris is in that corner. Are you awake, child? Were you ever introduced to Mr Miles?"

"I think not, but I shall be happy to undergo the ceremony now," answered a fresh young voice.

"Many thanks for the permission, Miss Compton, but, if you please, we'll agree to defer the ceremony along with the presentation to Sir William. I can scarcely see you two ladies. We are only just come. The time is not propitious, let us wait for another and a happier day."

Mr Miles retreated on the plea of giving some directions about the lamps. "I am not going to be the man to introduce Jezebel to him," he was resolving. "Let us be thankful she has, in a great measure, outlived her sorceries, but they say she has taken to play, in her age, like the most accomplished performer at Homburg in its worst days or Monte Carlo. I believe the grand daughter, poor thing! is a nice girl to have come out of so bad a nest," still pursuing his reflections.

Mr. Miles was hampered by the fear that Lady Fermor's personal remark might have reached the young man, but as the carriage disappeared in the darkness from which it had emerged, and the lawyer rejoined his companion, he felt bound to deliver his testimony that danger had been near.

Sir William anticipated him by a remark in which a shade of doubt and discontent was audible. "I thought you said the Fermors were a bad lot."

"A shocking bad lot, so far as Lord and Lady Fermor go," corroborated Mr Miles emphatically.

"And yet you are quite thick with them." The pupil suddenly turned the tables on his Mentor, still with the suspicion of mystification and annoyance in his manner.

"Not thick in your sense," answered Mr Miles promptly, "not more than common courtesy demands. I am sorry that your nearest neighbours are the Fermors, Sir William. He, poor old wretch, may be reckoned nowhere now, but she—well, she forfeited her place in society ages ago. She has, in course of nature, given up hunting, and there are no more hunting breakfasts, or stud dinners, or election banquets at Lambford. The place used to be a great rearing ground for hunters, and both host and hostess went in strongly for politics—at least, as far as the hurly burly of elections. You will not come across him, and you may not encounter her, which, let me tell you, will be no loss for any young man who wishes to keep himself straight and avoid temptation. It is my duty to make you acquainted with the rumour that high play goes on whenever she can call up the ghost of company at Lambford."

"Does nobody go near her then?" said Sir William, dwelling on the isolation. The sharp ears of his adviser detected that ■ had a fascination for a lad who might be a pariah in his own person. Mr. Miles was induced to qualify his statement in policy as well as in verity.

"Oh, not so bad as that!" She rained with reason the hue and cry of the world against her, but it is an old, half-forgotten story she has lived long enough to survive her punishment so far. The household at Lambford has been outwardly quiet enough for a dozen years. If people choose to lose money over Napoleon or vingt et un, or no worse than what, it is entirely their own doing, and is quite another matter from a public scandal. They say she ■ kind to poor old Lord Fermor. There has never been a word against Miss Compton, the grand-daughter, and she is likely to inherit her grandmother's savings—although there are other grandchildren, not Comptons—Dugdales and Powells, the children of two daughters of Lady Fermor by her first husband. Even Lord Fermor's heir ■ law does not hold it wise to keep up a quarrel with the present mistress of the house. Lady Fermor, at her worst, maintained what I should call a brazen adherence to her Church whatever it had to say to her, and I have no doubt subscribes handsomely to parish charities, so her rector and rectoress, with their staff, must extend a certain amount of countenance and support to her, whether or not they regard her in the light of an interesting penitent, I cannot tell. Between the oblivion into which her past is falling, forbearance with her as an old woman, and pity for an innocent victim like Miss Compton, there is some amount of neighbourly amnesia. Shall we drive over to the quarries I told you of to-morrow, Sir William?"

SUNDAY READINGS.

For each Year's Day.

BY THE EDITOR.

JANUARY 6TH.

Read Psalm ciii. Heb. xii. 1-14.

NO thoughtful person can regard the beginning of another year without some serious reflections. As Abraham went forth from Mesopotamia, "not knowing whither he went," so do we launch forth on a new epoch, ■ ignorance, and yet not without many natural presentiments. For each one perforce forecasts the coming year, anticipating the possible incidents, the mercies or the trials, the new scenes or the weary monotony of continued drudgery which it may bring them.

Retrospect ought, however, to teach us how vain are such anticipations. We may perhaps be able to recall the New Year's Day ■ of the past when we indulged in similar speculations, and can now see how often they have been falsified. Most people can say, on a survey of their past life, that they have been led by a way that they knew not. When they think of their childhood, or the struggles of early or later years, the successes and disappointments of their career, leading all up ■ the particular position they have now reached, they can see with more or less vividness how their path has been like that of Abraham, "who went forth, not knowing whither he went."

And now, on the first Lord's Day of a New Year, as we may be once again impressed by the uncertainty of the unknown future, experience as well as Scripture should bring us many lessons suggested by the consciousness of our ignorance.

I. We are taught not to presume. We are apt ■ take for granted that our course will be the same in the future as it has been in the past; that we shall have the same dear faces around us, and enjoy the same health and comfort. And so we make plans for the coming year as if the future lay in our own power. The presumptuous man takes for granted that while trouble or sorrow may happen to others his house will stand firm. When he hears of the uncertainties ■ life he never asks, like the disciples, "Lord, is it I?" but tacitly assumes that he shall not be moved. All such presumption is vain, and it is beneficial as it is wise on a day like this to recognise that we are each and all of us going forth on a way that we know not.

II. But if such ignorance of the future forbids presumption ■ also reproves the spirit of discouragement and despondency. There are those whose natural temperament leads them to anticipate evil rather than good. There may be circumstances in their lot which suggest sad forebodings. But such fears may be as much out of place as presuming on the unbroken continuance of present happiness. You do not know what unexpected good may be in store for you at the very moment when you are thinking only of disaster. Jacob, with his timid, gloomy temperament, said, "All these things are against me," at the very moment when, in reality, every circumstance was big with mercy.

Our duty is to go forth on the New Year as Abraham did on his journey, in faith and obedience. Then all will be well. Let us have hearty faith in God's personal care. When we realise the full force of the word, "The Lord is my Shepherd," that we do not need to make Him our Shepherd, but only treat Him as our Shepherd by following His guidance, then we can march on with unfaltering steps. We may not know whither the path is leading us, but when we know Him, we can be at peace.

Unbelief and disobedience can alone thwart His good purpose.

Let us, then, really trust God, and go forth in obedience on this new stage of life, being willing to follow rather than lead. Let us recognise all events which may happen to us when in the way of duty as the elements of a wise education, and be anxious to learn the lessons they are sent ■ teach. Let us commit ourselves, our homes, our friends, our cares, hopes and anxieties into His hand, asking Him to strengthen us, that whatever happens we may not shrink from duty nor wound conscience. When we thus sincerely yield ■ Him in all things as our Father, through Jesus Christ our Lord and Master, then may we joyfully share the assured confidence that nothing can by any possibility separate us from Himself and in Him from all that is truly good and blessed.

JANUARY 13TH.

Read Psalm xvi. and St. John xii. 34 to end.

Genuine trust in God is but another name for Christian life, for it implies obedience, confidence, and love. Conscious want of trust ■ one of the most bitter trials. I do not now allude ■ speculative doubts, but to that which is often experienced in times of sorrow or in hours of religious anxiety "I have no faith, I cannot feel confidence," is then one of the most sorrowful confessions. Now the Psalmist tells us the source of true confidence, "They that know Thy name will put their trust in Thee."

Knowing the name of God according to Biblical usage just means knowing what God really is. We are therefore taught that the secret of distrust is ignorance, and the source of confidence is the apprehension of God's character and ways.

Ignorance of God ■ perhaps the last thing which people nowadays would expect to be laid to their charge. In a sense, it is the last thing to be laid to the charge of professing Christians now, as ■ was apparently the last which could have been applied to the so called religious world in the days of Christ. And yet it was of men who prayed seven times in a day, and who studied the every joys and titles of the law, that Jesus said, "Oh, righteous Father, the world hath not known Thee." For there are two kinds of knowledge—the one acquired by intellect and memory, the other through the sympathies. The one is formal, the other is vital. Now to be truly acquainted with God is to know a Person who in commanding our affections sways our life and character. And thus God did not give man a mere system of truth, but He sent Him who is the truth, and through no technical creed demanding the assent of the intellect alone, but through Jesus Christ, who loved us and gave Himself for us, did He at once manifest His glory and touch our sympathies.

True confidence springs from knowledge. Ignorance has also its confidence. A child has no fear in a powder magazine, or in handling the most dangerous explosives, but this confidence of ignorance is widely removed from the confidence of the expert who does the same actions, yet with perfect knowledge of their character. In like manner there is a confidence which arises from religious ignorance and indifference, which may appear quite as deep as that of him who enjoys conscious peace in Christ. True Christian confidence, however, springs from knowledge. ■ can say, "I know Him in whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which ■ have committed ■ Him."

■ is true that the first effect of earnest

thought is ■ produce anxiety rather than peace, for the true knowledge of God must take away the false confidence of ignorance. And this brings me back to what was said at the outset regarding the distress experienced by those who have become conscious that they are without that trust in God which gives peace. For all such I now add a word or two of plain counsel.

I Be thankful that you have become anxious, even although the anxiety may have brought you a certain misery. The sense of pain is a sign of life.

II. Beware of a common confusion. There is no more morbid or dangerous condition of mind than that which is frequently witnessed during times of religious excitement, when persons, hearing a great deal about "having faith," begin to scrutinise their experiences or sensations ■ discover whether they have "enough faith" or not. As a natural consequence they either become landed in a darkness which is almost maddening, or they make a Saviour out of some sudden feeling which they term "finding peace." But it is neither faith nor the feeling of peace which can afford abiding confidence to any reasonable man. A terrified introspection in search of faith is exceedingly ignorant. As well might one seek for the pleasure which the landscape affords by searching into the eye or into the telescope. It is what the eye sees, not the eye, it is what the telescope is pointed at, not the telescope which delights mind and heart. In like manner it is not faith, but what faith contemplates, which awakens love and banishes fear. Instead, therefore, of anxiously crying for faith, let us simply look in self forgetfulness to God, or let us just think of what Christ was when He was on earth, or let us gaze up to the Cross and see Him stooping over us, His mercy streaming from every wound, and His arms stretched out as if to gather us and all men back ■ His Father. Dare we look up to that face and doubt His love or His willingness to forgive and help us? Verily, "They that know Him will put their trust in Him." "Acquaint thyself with God and be ■ peace."

JANUARY FORTH.

Read Psalm .xii. St Matthew vi. 25 to the end.

There is nothing, next ■ sin, more common than care, and any teaching regarding our cares cannot fail ■ be practical. St. Peter helps us to know what we ought to do. "Casting all your cares upon Him, for He careth for you."

SUNDAY READINGS.

As we are all tempted to seek comfort rather than a right state of heart, it is well for us to distinguish the kind of cares to which the apostle alludes. ■ is evident that he means the cares which may come in the way of duty. We could not expect him to say, "have no care," if we are following a course of evil which entails misery. There are many cares that are of a kind which cannot be cast upon God, but which ought to be cast away altogether. And if our anxieties arise from greed, or vanity, or lust, or dishonesty, then the counsel we require is, "Have done with these things," rather than, "Cast thy burden on the Lord."

But the cares incident ■ Christian life may be various. There may ■ gnawing anxieties connected with business or the economies of the household, or there may be family cares arising from the delicate health of those we love, or, worse than this, from the misconduct of those who are dear to us, or our cares may be distinctly personal, and may take the form of doubt or despondency, or be connected with secret struggles against besetting sin, or with anxieties regarding our own religious state before God. We need not specify these cares. Every heart knows its own bitterness.

We may be sometimes tempted with stouical fortitude to shut all such cares up in our own hearts. But that is not the best thing for us. What we most require is sympathy and confidence. There is comfort in having a true friend ■ whom we can unbosom our troubles, especially if that friend is one who can advise and help us. It is better still if that friend is the very person to whom we are chiefly responsible. Then whatever happens we know that our motives are understood. Having made "a clean breast" of everything, we would find that much of the sting of anxiety was removed.

Now the apostle counsels us to act in a similar way to God. This is quite possible. We can cast our cares upon Him to a great extent by simply unburdening all that we feel in frank, humble, faithful prayer. How helpful is it thus to go to Him with the cry, "Oh, my Father, thou knowest how painful this doubt is to me, how intolerable is this load of sin, and how anxiously I seek to do the right, and to know and love thee as I ought. My Father, help me!"

But we are not only to tell our cares to God—we are to cast them all on Him. "Roll thy burden on the Lord," and the Psalmist, "and He will sustain thee." And when we have done so, then, although duty, difficulty, and trial may remain, yet that which is worst in our cares will be gone.

The reason why we are thus to cast our cares upon God is thus sweetly given "for He careth for you." Christianity, while recognising the divine character of all law, teaches us that we have ■ do with a divine Person, who knows and cares for His children. This is the mystery of God's goodness which has been declared in Jesus Christ. He has taught us about the Father, Who is not too great to care, but is so great that He does care for the very least. We who believe in Christ can, therefore, ■ with confidence to the throne of grace.

If the Lord cares for us, then we may be certain that He will direct our path. We may feel very blind about it all. ■ is enough if we know that He will lead us on step by step. "Commit thou thy way unto the Lord, and He will give thee the desires of thine heart." He will give you your truest and deepest desires, although in a form and by a method you may not anticipate. St. James and St. John asked for high places in Christ's kingdom, and Jesus gave them the desires of their heart, but how differently from the manner they had expected! "Can ye drink of the cup I drink of and be baptized with the baptism I am baptized with?" Therefore when we cast our cares on the Lord, He may perhaps lead us in the very opposite direction from that which we expected or wished for, but, as certainly as the whole past history of the Church is true, it will be in the very way which we ourselves will in the end acknowledge to have been the wisest and best.

Read Psalm cxxv and St. Mark vi. 1-13.

It was in Nazareth, the scene of His early years, and among His own friends and relations, that our Lord discovered the greatest scepticism. The people who in one sense were the most privileged were those who received the smallest benefit. This is remarkable, and the reason assigned for it is no less striking. "He could do no mighty works there because of their unbelief." This is a curious statement. For if miracles were intended to produce conviction, why were they not wrought before an audience which required so much to be aroused? And when it is said that Christ "could do no miracles there," we are compelled to ask how His power could be limited by anything in man.

I will not attempt a reply to these difficulties. I would only suggest the fact that miracles were never given as a cure for unbelief, but as "signs" accompanying the revelation of God in Christ, and that there must always be moral necessities which limit the Divine actings. ■ ■ thus that God "cannot lie," and that He cannot enrich with the blessing of salvation the heart which refuses ■ trust Him. As it is in accordance with God's principles of acting never to give the enjoyment of light ■ those who insist on keeping their eyes shut, so He cannot manifest His glory to those whose hearts are sealed by unbelief.

What occurred ■ Nazareth presents a startling picture of the sin of unbelief at all times. The unbelief which refuses Christ may be far removed from any conscious rejection of Christian dogma. The sceptic who doubts, or the infidel who denies, His authority are not the only unbelievers. Nay, the unbelief which ■ generally condemned in the word of God is practical rather than theoretical. The most deadly form of unbelief is often found clinging externally to a pure creed, and there are many persons across whose brain there never stole one honest intellectual doubt, who are yet double-dyed infidels in the eyes of Christ. Unbelief arises from the want of hearty confidence in God. Unbelief is the root of all resistance and of all sin. It makes divine aid impossible, for ■ seals every access to the heart; it closes the eye, so that it sees not His glory; it ties the tongue, so that it neither prays nor praises; it stops the ear so that it hears not. Unbelief may assume many shapes. It may take the form of self-righteous pride, which will keep the soul like a castle against the grace of the Saviour; or it may show its power in that idiotic indifference with which another man regards the most solemn questions of existence; or it may display its presence in the knees that tremble and the hands that hang down, and in the paths that have been made crooked, through the terrorism of a morbid self-consciousness.

On the other hand, all is possible where there is true confidence in God, leading to self-surrender to His blessed will. This confidence ■ the key which unlocks our whole being to His influence. We then lie open to His teaching. In yielding ■ Him we obey Him and receive His help and guidance in return. We are then like children, who, by grasping a father's hand, get all his strength and wisdom for their support and direction, while the child who will not trust, but in self-will casts that hand away, by the very act shwarts the fatherly desire.

Christ marvelled at the unbelief of the Nazarenes, and no wonder! For it is marvellous that there should be any intelligent being in the universe indifferent to God, or who refuses to obey Him. All material laws obey Him. And all His works, from the dewdrop that sparkles on the grass to the blazing sun which fills heaven with splendour, form together one mighty harmony of order and beauty. Among the ranks of the redeemed there is not a discordant note, for God reigns in every breast. As far as we know, it is only ■ man that there is found the unbelief of indifference. And assuredly most just is the condemnation on that other form of unbelief, which, when the light comes, "loves the darkness rather than the light." We ought to love the highest when we see ■

Let it be granted that we profess to be Christians, and believe in the Christian religion in its usually accepted form. So far we cannot be charged with unbelief. Yet, when we bring such beliefs to the test, may we not be shocked by the contrast which our lives present? For if we believe in the reality of God's great love to us, where, we may well ask, is the response of such hearty affection ■ the reception of similar love always produces? Tongues which seldom or never really pray to Him, hearts that never rejoice in Him, a self-indulgence which never sacrifices, and a self-will which never yields obedience, are surely not the characteristics of childlike and loving confidence. It is most humbling to realise, however dimly, what we might each be except for this horrible unbelief. Christ can certainly do mighty works in us and by us. There is not a man or woman whom He is not ready to bless now, as He helped those who received Him long ago in Palestine. There is no human being whom He is not willing and able to enrich with all good as He enriched St. Paul or St. John, or any saint in the Church. There is not a victory over sin, not a blessed work of ministry and usefulness, not a height of saintly perfection, not an adornment of grace which may not be ours now, in spite of all the commonplace surroundings of our daily lot. We cannot for a moment doubt Christ's desire "to do thus exceedingly, abundantly, above all that we can ask or think." What, then, is it which hinders? Unbelief—wonderful and most sinful unbelief! "Ye will not come to me that ye might have life." "Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it." "How often would I have gathered you and ye would not."

BETWEEN THE HEATHER AND THE NORTHERN SEA.

By M. LINSKILL.

AUTHOR OF "CLEYDEN," "HAGAR," "ROBERT HOIT'S ILLUSION," ETC.

CHAPTER XL.—FRIENDS AND NEIGHBOURS.

THE weather that one remembers for half a lifetime is always weather that is complete of its kind—the unbroken calm, the unmitigated storm, the time of ceaseless rain, of sustained drought. These are remembered as much by their unity of impression as by their rarity of occurrence.

Genevieve Bartholomew will always remember that first perfect autumn in Netherbank, the clear blue skies that went on being blue quite into December, the pale warm sun that threw long shadows across the grass all day, that lighted up the little house, and lent a new harmony to the soft, restful colouring that was so daintily disposed and arranged. Truly it had been a labour of love, that pleasant home-making, and full of new and unhopèd-for experiences.

"You must feel rather like a bride," Dorothy Craven said one day, when she came down to see the transformation that had been so quickly wrought, and so cheaply too, for the most part, as Miss Craven saw at a glance. The delicate coral-coloured stencilling on the walls, the curious pale grey green tints of the drapery that covered the old sofa and the chairs, the quaint festoons of Indian muslin and creamy lace that hung about the little windows, were none of them expensive luxuries. The things that represented money were those that had come across the moor in the carrier's waggon, the books, the pictures, the large screen of ancient needlework, and the soft rugs that covered the floor.

The piano had come later, with some necessaries for the studio, easels, lay figures, canvases. Genevieve saw them come, she watched her father as he unpacked them and put them in their places. Her feeling as she watched was like an emotion, to be kept strictly in the silence that Fate prescribes for hopes that are yet unaccomplished.

"The ornament of a house," says Emerson, "is the friends who frequent it," a truth of which the world has long been very well aware; bargaining only that the friends shall be ornamental; your most ornamental friend being he who brings the finest carriage to stand at your door, who has the highest title for you to sound before his name; or who represents for you the golden calf at least in being thickly gilded with the current coin of the realm. These be thy gods, O Israel!

Taking them as a whole, it could hardly be said that the people who came to Murk-Marishes were very ornamental people, either in the Emersonian or any other sense. It had never occurred to Genevieve that the little door under the thatched porch would be opened so many times to admit visitors, strangers with friendly faces and voices, with strong northern accents, with wonderings and questionings, reserved and unreserved admirations. Some of them came from afar and stayed to tea, and some went home congratulating themselves that the Bartholomews were likely to remain in the neighbourhood for an indefinite length of time. It seemed an odd thing to leave London, to break up a home, to choose a place like Murk-Marishes to live in, but then it was quite understood that people of genius were odd, always and unmistakably odd in everything they did.

It was mentioned—almost with dissatisfaction—that Mr. Bartholomew's manner was not so odd as it might have been, that his behaviour on the whole was really very much like that of any other gentleman. This was a reversal of ideas still existent in remote districts, and therefore made opening for doubt and speculation. To some simple souls it was a little relief that he should sit and talk of his crop of apples, of the way the studio chimney smoked when the wind was in the north, that he should confess to having read the Market-Stradley Gazette, that he should already know something of local politics. But there were others who agreed that this was not—well, it was not what people expected of a man whose name had been seen in a hundred newspapers, with praise and commendation, and unlimited prophecy attached to it. It was as if he had been guilty of fraudulent pretence.

If Noel Bartholomew could only have known what was expected of him by his neighbours it was sadly possible that he might have endeavoured to save them from disappointment. It would have been so very easy to save them. But since he might not know, nor even conjecture, he went on laying himself open to suspicion—nay, to worse than suspicion. Mrs. Caton, who was a lawyer's widow, and who claimed to be the leader of such intellectual and artistic society as the neighbourhood afforded, gave her verdict at once and unhesitatingly: "There is nothing in the man," she said with an air of finality. She was in her own house when she said it, an old-fashioned stone house standing back from the main street of Thurkeld Abbas. It was slowly furnished, and the lady was dressed to be in keeping with it. The prettiest things she possessed were her little fair-haired twin girls, Edil and Ianthe. They were always brought down when visitors came; no one perceiving more clearly than Mrs. Caton herself the value of the children, as picturesque incidents in her life and its surroundings. She was not unpicturesque herself, being a large, white, fair woman with very blue eyes, and a clear knowledge of what was becoming in the way of dress.

It need hardly be said that Mrs. Caton had her place in the established society of Thurkeld Abbas; nor that her verdict concerning any new-comer would have its due and sufficient weight. Nevertheless, at the moment when her verdict was given it was not received with that respectful acquiescence to which she was accustomed. "There is nothing in him," she had said emphatically, and for a moment there was silence.

Miss Standen, an elderly lady, who had been three times to London in her younger days, and twice since her maturity, and who therefore ventured occasionally to have an opinion of her own, put a question to Mrs. Caton. "Have you seen much of Mr. Bartholomew?" she asked significantly.

The turn of Mrs. Caton's head was something to be remembered. She had seen Mr. Bartholomew once; and Miss Standen knew quite well that she had seen him once.

"These things are not questions of time," said Mrs. Caton, speaking in her usual oratorical tone. "They are questions of intuition, of acquaintance with human nature. When I meet a man who talks to me for nearly an hour without saying a single striking or remarkable thing, I cannot say that I think that man to be a man of great powers."

"Not of great conversational powers perhaps," rejoined Miss Standen. "But does Mr. Bartholomew profess ■ be gifted ■ that way? He ■ an artist."

"To say that a man is an artist, that is an artist of any eminence," returned Mrs. Caton, "is to say that he is a man of thought, to imply that he ■ capable of finer thought, of finer feeling than his neighbours. Now if a man can think, it is only common sense to suppose that he can utter his thoughts."

"Not on demand, not when he feels that he is being watched and weighed for the benefit of the neighbourhood," interposed little Mrs. Damer, a lady who always appeared to be on the verge of losing her temper, and did, in point of fact, lose it occasionally. "If I were Mr. Bartholomew I should stick stolidly to the price of potatoes, and the surprising cheapness of Moor matton."

"That is just about what he did 'stick to,'" rejoined Mrs. Caton, who could express inverted commas with unsurpassable skill.

"But you admire Miss Bartholomew?" interposed young Mrs. Pencefold, in a conciliatory tone. "Surely you admire her?"

"My dear, I do admire her," replied Mrs. Caton, with judicial consideration. "I admire her prettiness, her politeness, and her slight figure. But there I must stop it seems. I do not wish to give offence; and we can all of us hold our own opinion. No one will be more glad than I if the Bartholomews should prove to be acquisitions to the more intellectual society of the place."

Again there was a wondering silence, and again it was broken by Miss Standen.

"Mr. Bartholomew is very much altered, don't you think he is, Mrs. Caton?" asked the lady in civil tones.

"Altered! Altered from what?"

"From what he was twenty years ago."

There was a pause, a stare, a little laugh.

"My dear Miss Standen! Twenty years ago I was a child in the schoolroom."

"Probably: but you are the same age as Miss Richmond, exactly the same. Twenty years ago she was seventeen; old enough to carry on a vigorous flirtation with Mr. Bartholomew, who was years older than she was. I saw nothing of it myself, but I heard plenty. It was said that he couldn't go out sketching anywhere in the district without her joining him, and sitting watching him for hours together."

"That might be due to her love of art," suggested Mrs. Pencefold, a rather amiable Lancashire lady, of sufficiently good birth to be able to feel some natural sense of duty in defending a member of a county family.

Her suggestion was received with incredulous smiles, and the smiles were followed by incredulous words, by words implying more than incredulity. ■ was a little sad to anyone with eyes open to see the sadness of ■ all.

Mrs. Damer was not quite sure that her eyes were open: she had an impression that she did sometimes see, that she oftener tried to see, but that her mental eyes were holden by some narrowness of education, of opportunity, of intellectual forthright. She was not sure even of such vision as she had. She knew it to be limited; it might be erroneous. She was certainly aware that she saw things with other eyes than her neighbours saw them, and her nature was such that the effect upon herself was apt to be stimulating. ~~She~~ ^{It} was nothing if not courageous; and her courageousness led her sometimes into—shall we say deep water, or hot water? Perhaps either would do.

At the present moment she was listening in silence, but not with patience. Truth to say, she was growing very impatient, and somewhat indignant too. She was not a woman who made any special profession of Christian charity, not more than the other church-going, district-visiting ladies who sat there, but this absolute uncharity struck her soul's sense keenly. Not one voice had been raised to utter one kindly word concerning these strangers, who had come ~~to~~ ^{make a} home in the midst of them. There had been nothing save pre-judgments, disapprobations, hints, detractions. And what ground, what reason had they for it all? The question burst forth at last with startling unexpectedness.

"What have they done, these people, that we should speak of them as we are doing?" the little woman asked with heightened colour, and a sudden gleam in her eyes. She looked at the lady who had spoken last, then ~~to~~ ^{at} Mrs. Caton, they were too much surprised to reply.

"I must speak," Mrs. Damer went on, "that man's face—it would be more polite to say Mr. Bartholomew, but let it pass—his face struck me as being so full of sorrow that I feel compelled to speak. Someone said awhile ago that there was nothing in him, if there is nothing else in him, there is a soul that has gone through a martyrdom of some kind. That look of patience, of subdued pain, never came into any human countenance but by great tribulation. . . . We know nothing of it all, nothing of his suffering, nothing of his life, and but very little of his work, why then should we judge so harshly? Why should we sit in judgment upon him at all?"

"My dear Mrs. Damer," said Mrs. Caton, who had fully recovered herself, "surely you exaggerate the importance of any remarks that may have been made! I may even add that you mistake the nature of them. Judgment! What, in your opinion, is judgment?"

"In my opinion one judges a man when one decides on insufficient data either that he is a sinner, or that he is a fool. We have decided that Mr. Bartholomew is—if not a fool, at least a stupid and shallow-brained individual, and this because ~~he~~ ^{he} has talked to some of us for half an hour ~~on~~ ^{at} a time on topics that we considered trifling and commonplace. I do not doubt it, ~~he~~ ^{he} talked to me in the same way, evidently hardly knowing that he talked at all, or if he did know, wishing that he might be silent. But why should he talk? Why especially should he talk for effect? Why should he try to impress anybody by fluent orations? His aim is of another kind, of a higher kind. I hate your clever, hard, glittering people, who will speak of a broken heart with an epigram, or crush a reputation with a paradox."

"I hope it will come to Mr. Bartholomew's knowledge that he has at least one eloquent friend," remarked Mrs. Caton with effective contrast of tone.

"I don't care if ~~he~~ ^{he} does," said Mrs. Damer, "and moreover he won't care either. He has other things ~~to~~ ^{to} care for, and he knows that he must stand or fall by the work he does, and not by the gossip of the place he lives in. Further than that, he knows that he has to die, and have his life written in picturesque phrase, and with sensational descriptions, before such as we are can see him in any desirable or worthy light. I saw the other day in a book that Canon Gabriel lent me, that pure genius is probably as unrecognisable as Pure Divinity was when it walked the earth. . . I believe that is true."

Mrs. Damer went away, doubtless somewhat to her hostess's relief. Yet Mrs. Caton was quite wise enough and clever enough to make the best of things.

"What a dear excitable little woman Mrs. Damer is!" she remarked, carefully readjusting the folds of her dress.

"The way she always stands up for absent people is very nice though," said Mrs. Pencefold. "And really there ~~is~~ ^{is} something in what she said before she went away. I was thinking about the same thing only a few weeks ago when I was ~~at~~ ^{at} home. We went over to Haworth one day, and we thought ourselves fortunate in meeting with an elderly woman who, when she was a girl, had been in Charlotte Brontë's class at the Haworth Sunday-school. She was an 'intelligent person, with a good memory, but the burden of her recollections of Miss Brontë was very significant. 'She wur allus little an' plam,' said the woman in answer to our inquiries. She remembered Branwell's wild ways, she had been well acquainted with the father's eccentricities, but of 'Miss Charlotte' there was only the one impression "She wur allas little an' plain."

"You must not tell that story to Mr. Bartholomen," said Mrs. Caton. "He might imagine that you were intending to be personal."

CHAPTER X.—"WHO RIDES BY WITH THE ROYAL AIR?"

COULD the ladies assembled at Mrs. Caton's have been made aware that while they were putting new life into a piece of old gossip, the same story was threatening to repeat itself, it is possible that Mrs. Damer would not have had ■ leave the house with that uneasy sense of victoriousness.

It was rather an eventful day ■ the thatched cottage. Something — Noel Bartholomew hardly knew what — it might be the sunshine, the bracing frosty air of the morning, the peace and stillness of the place, ■ might be any of these, or none of them, but something had stirred in his mental veins, and impelled him to the old creative mood that had once been his without let or hindrance. There was no sign of any sudden fine frenzy or enthusiasm. The canvas was placed on the easel, a figure was drawn in rapidly with red chalk, it was drawn from a sketch made long before, a sketch that was half a study, the head being carefully completed. It was the head of a youngish man, pale, red-haired, intellectual-looking. The expression was perplexing in the extreme. Was he a saint? a poet? a casuist? It was as impossible to help conjecture, as it was ■ arrive at any definite conclusion.

"You will reproduce it exactly?" Genevieve asked. She and her father were sitting over the fire after their early dinner. They were intending to go out after a little while, away across the sunny, fuzzy upland to the moor. It looked very tempting up there. Cattle were chiming about among the hillocks, sheep were browsing between the patches of brown ling. Out on the top there was an old man "graving" turf. By-and-by a carriage with a pair of horses crossed a corner of the edge of the moor.

"Yes, I shall try to reproduce the head as nearly as I can," Mr. Bartholomew was saying in his usual quiet yet intent way. "I did not think it had been so good. I shall not improve upon it."

The two soon relapsed into the pleasant silence that reigned so much in the little room. Genevieve was busy with her needle, embroidering a purple iris upon a piece of gold-coloured satin. Keturah, the small and somewhat eccentric maid-servant, who had been recommended by Miss Craven, was tidying up the garden a little. Presently she burst into the house.

"Here's Miss Richmond fra Yarell Croft, she's gettin' over t' stile! An' Mr. Cecil's wiv her, an' t' coach is gone doon t' lane. Ah! I bet anything t' coachman's gone to put it up at t' Wheatsheaf. . . . Hey Ah to fetch some tea in when they've been here a little bit, as ya tell'd ma when them folks com fra Lowmoor yesterday?"

Genevieve looked up, amused in spite of herself. "You may have the tea ready, Keturah," she said, "I will ring for it if we should want it. And do try to open the door for Miss Richmond without looking so very much amazed."

This caution notwithstanding, Keturah's round eyes were opened to their fullest extent when she reappeared. ■ was evident that she was proud to find herself ushering in the great lady of the neighbourhood.

All at once the little room seemed to be filled with a strange magnificence. Was it some Eastern queen who was coming forward with such languid, majestic grace, holding out her hand to Mr. Bartholomew, glancing with dark, dreamy, half-closed eyes at Genevieve? She was not smiling, her beautifully curved lips were closed, the under one drawn in like a baby's, making a deeper shadow round her perfect mouth and chin. Her black hair hung low over a wide, dusky forehead, the very faintest colour was stealing through the olive tints of her face as she began to speak.

"You will hardly remember my brother," she said, presenting a tall young man with fair curly hair, uncertain features, and a general expression of self-approval. He had a husky voice, and he blushed a little as Mr. Bartholomew introduced him to Genevieve, whom he had seen more than once ■ Thurkeld Abbas.

Miss Richmond was watching him as she seated herself on a sofa near the window, a subtle perfume was stealing from the folds of her dress of rich Indian silk; the barbaric-looking ornaments about her wrists and in her ears were twinkling and twinkling as she moved. She did not seem to hear Genevieve's polite remark that she was glad to have the pleasure of seeing her.

Miss Richmond sat for some moments without speaking, looking from under her half-closed eyelids straight into Genevieve's face. This might have been a little perplexing, a little oppressive, if Genevieve had cared to find it so; but the girl had only a vague notion that this was an old friend of her father's, to whom she was bound to show a courteous deference. Mr Bartholomew was talking to Cecil Richmond. Diana, lifting her eyes from Genevieve's face, took a leisurely survey of the room.

"You are intending to remain, I perceive," she said presently, speaking in the low, deliberate tone that suited herself and her manner well. People were compelled to listen, and to listen attentively to every syllable, if they cared to hear what she was saying; and for one reason or another most people did care.

"Yes, I hope we shall remain," Genevieve replied. "I hope so more earnestly every day."

"You like living in the country then?"

"I like living in this country, intensely. I did not know that I was capable of caring so strongly for a place in so short a time. . . I think I hardly yet understand it," the girl went on smilingly. "It is as if Nature had some occult force, some occult influence, which she had never cared to exercise upon me till now."

"Ah! That is the sort of thing that is to be found in modern poetry, I suppose?"

Genevieve looked up quickly, she was surprised and a little puzzled by the tone.

"Is it?" she asked. "Did it strike you like an echo? I was only trying to express what I felt. Still these days of many books are certainly days of many echoes. One comes across them everywhere, in literature and conversation. Do you not think so?"

"That is clever of you, very clever!" said Miss Richmond. "You are trying to find out if I am well-read. I am not. I never open a book, not now."

Thus was said with the same cool deliberateness of tone. Genevieve, who was not unaccustomed to human eccentricities, felt that some demand was about to be made upon her faculty of interpretation. She was perplexed, yet interested, and already awakened to the perception that here was a human being who presented difficulties enough to repel, mystery enough to attract. This perception was, of course, mainly intuitive, and being premature might certainly fail to stand the test of further intercourse.

There was a brief silence, during which Genevieve had been fully aware that she was the object of a second close scrutiny, and her colour deepened perceptibly under the conviction. When she looked up again a rather striking change had come over Miss Richmond's face: some of the self-complacency had gone out of it; she had the look of superchousness, and a new element had appeared in the place of these.

Was it sympathy? Was it a sudden motion towards friendliness of feeling?

"You are not at all what I have been expecting you would be," Miss Richmond said, lifting her eyes so as to meet Genevieve's less restrainedly than before.

"You have been thinking of me then? That was kind," the girl said. A moment later she added with a smile, "But will you not tell me what you were expecting, and where I fail?"

"The difference is not in the direction of failure," said Miss Richmond. "I should like to speak out plainly, to tell you the truth, but you would not like it, I perceive that. You would think me rude. As a rule I don't mind being thought rude, but for once I do. There would, however, be no vulgar flattery in my telling you that you have already given me a pleasure, and my pleasures are few, fewer than you may think."

"You are pleased that we are going to stay at Mrk Manabes?"

"Yes, exceedingly pleased. I had made up my mind that you would not stay, and that it would be your fault, not your father's. I imagined that a town-bred girl would never stand the loneliness of such a place as this."

This last sentence was not unpremeditated. Miss Richmond watched carefully how it sped. "Loneliness!" exclaimed Genevieve, unsuspectingly. "I have never had a lonely hour in my life. Descriptions of loneliness perplex me, I mean the kind of loneliness that is always crying out for human companionship. I do not understand it. Perfect solitude is such a potential thing, so full of influences to which one is never awake in one's social hours. I sometimes think that if I were so placed that I could never be alone, I should sink to a mere clod."

There was a little silence while Miss Richmond was revolving in her mind the significance of these admissions, that is to say a certain significance that they had for her. To herself she was saying, "Then that is evidence enough that you are fancy free, my golden-haired princess. I wonder at that, almost as much as I regret it."

On the whole it was a relief when Miss Richmond expressed a desire to see the studio. Mr. Bartholomew had not found conversation with young Richmond an easy matter; perhaps it had been less easy because of his keen consciousness of Miss Richmond's attention to all that passed. He knew that no word had escaped her.

They all went out into the sunlit orchard together. Genevieve, walking by Miss Richmond's side, felt her eighteen years and her general immaturity ■ be deuced disadvantages. She had not noticed till now the stateliness of her companion's finely moulded figure, the statuesque setting of her head. The cast of Herò, which was one of the treasures of the studio, was not more impressively suggestive of Olympian majesty than was the figure and bearing of this impetuous looking Yorkshire lady.

Miss Richmond had a distinct remembrance of the joiner's shop; yet she showed no surprise when she found herself in an artistically-furnished studio, surrounded by rich colouring carefully subdued, by all the usual and unusual appurtenances of the painter's craft: the sketches that are more suggestive than finished pictures, the casts that appeal only ■ the few; the odds and ends of bronze and copper, of richly-tinted glass, of roughly-moulded clay. There was a piece of old tapestry at one end of the studio, with salmon-coloured figures standing in awkward attitudes on a faded cloud of dark blue wool. On the other side there was a Japanese cabinet, and a brass bowl covered with Madura etched work. A tall Persian jar stood on the ground, behind there was a shield of ancient lacquered wood, and a sword with a Damascened blade was hanging slantwise on the wall between two unfinished pictures. Miss Richmond stopped before one of the pictures. Mr. Bartholomew was near her. Genevieve was showing Cecil Richmond some photographs of the sculpture discovered at Melos. There was a Perseus, a wine-looking Zeus, a goddess without a head, and the beautiful but mutilated figure which the art-critics were wrangling over, one naming it a Urania, and another asserting it to be a wingless Victory.

"I suppose it would be the correct thing to say that I admire them?" said young Richmond, speaking ■ his usual husky voice, and in a tone that was nearly as languid as his sister's.

"It would hardly be quite correct to say so if you don't admire them," replied Genevieve, who was a little amused. "I hope I was not putting any pressure upon your opinion?"

"No, you weren't, so I may as well speak the truth. I don't like statues—never saw a valuable thing that I cared for in my life."

"No! And pictures?"

"Oh, I care for pictures immensely, especially new ones. I ran up to London for three days in June, almost on purpose to see the Academy and the Grosvenor. My word! there was some colour there!"

"There was indeed," replied Genevieve, repressing a smile. "And since you care so much for colour, you will perhaps like ■ see some sketches of my father's. Will you lift that portfolio to the table, please?"

Miss Richmond was not listening to all this. She had but little knowledge of art, and small liking for even such phases of it as she understood. There were studies, sketches, suggestions on the walls that she did not profess to understand, others that she did not pretend to care for. The head of the pale young man on the easel was in nowise ■ her taste, and Mr. Bartholomew was not anxious to elicit her opinion concerning it. This was a small matter, but she noticed it; she was even aware that he was sorry that the picture was on the easel at that moment.

She turned from it silently. On the wall near it there was an unfinished single figure, a three quarter length of a Guinevere, seated on an antique couch, draped with emerald-tinted silk. Her face was pale, full of the "vague spiritual fears" that had come upon her, because "The powers that bend the soul,

To help it from the dith that it cannot do,
And yet is even in extremity begun
I was and plague her."

More care had been bestowed upon the expression, upon the sorrow of the face, the dawning repentance, than upon the actual beauty to be represented by the drawing of rich contours, or tints of pearl and carnation. The history of the sorrow that her loveliness had wrought was inscribed on rather than the loveliness itself. The regret for the past, the pain of the present, the hopelessness of the future—these were the things that had inspired the painter's soul, so that you saw only a far and remorseful woman, half-ready even then to throw herself at Arthur's feet, had the king been there.

"It is not my notion of Guinevere," said Miss Richmond. "That face reminds me of the face ■ Velasquez's 'Magdalen ■ the foot of the Cross,' the one at Farnley, a face that is all to us and tenderness and grief. I can believe in the repentance of Mary Magdalen, but not in the repentance ■ Guinevere. Perhaps I do not understand the Queen as Tennyson would have her understood, but I always think she must have felt to the last that life had dealt hardly with her."

"And you think the feeling that life has been hard, and circumstance difficult, would make against human repentance?"

"Yes. Surely it must do that? It must at least do that."

"There I would venture to differ from you," said Bartholomew courteously. "I think that if one's eyes were not holden one would see hardness and difficulty and try to be aggravations of remorse rather than palliations of misdeed. The burden is laid with design and with exactness, so much is required because so much was given, and no one of us full of his part but through weakness or willingness."

"Not willingness—no, not willingness," said Miss Richmond, turning away from the picture. "There are contrary winds in life as in nature, and one is driven on to the rocks all against one's will. One cannot alter one's self, one cannot force circumstance, one cannot move others, as one would."

There was a touch as of despair in her tone, born, perhaps, of the thought that her forgetful outspokenness had not been of a nature to create the impression she wished to create. With all her talent she was apt to find her small diplomacies putting unexpectedly in the middle, like the fraying of a garment that has been too long in use.

"You mustn't mind my not admiring your 'Gunsvere'," she said in conciliatory tones. "There is so much that I can admire—thus, for instance. Is it another Tennysonian subject?"

"No, it is not—though I am almost as faithful to Tennyson as Rossetti is to Dante. This picture is, as you see, unfinished. I meant to entitle it, 'The King's Daughter.' It is from the 'Earthly Paradise.'"

"A book I only know by name. I have seen it, of course, but I have never read it. What is the story?"

"There are many stories, this is a scene from one, a parting scene. The lady is the Princess Ingiborg, the other figure, which is only indicated, is Kiartan, who does not care for her as she would have him care, but who is yet passionately sorry for her. The beauty of the passage, in my thinking, is the Princess's sorrow for his sorrow. . . . I have the book here. . . . That is the part I meant to illustrate."

Alone she was, her head against the wall
Mad full of life, heavy eyes were shut when he Stood on the threshold, she saw him go
He ringed the clash of arms, and took his hand
And thus with quivering lips awhile did stand Regarding him, but he took little she O'er his head, and in the hot tears flow
Last of her life, at last she spoke

Woe, woe, woe
If thou who art the kind of all men
Must sorrow for me, yet more glad must I
To see thee live, my love, joyfully
The last time, that when of this sorrow came
And thought of me there-with, thou might'st not blame

My little heart for ever yielding thee,
I saw thee as I lay, once—great shalt thou be,
Blessed of all, and dying we forgot
I saw thee as I lay, once—great shalt thou be

Miss Richmond read the lines, not quite to herself, but in low, pathetic under-tones, that seemed to lend an intenser meaning to the words. The passage was marked, she did not read farther, but closed the book and gave it back to the painter.

"I should like to see that picture when it is finished," she said.

Bartholomew was silent for a moment.

"I wish I could promise you that you should see it finished," he replied.

"Will it take so long?"

"It would take about a fortnight—not more. . . . But it is not a question of time. It is nearly four years since the painting was begun."

"Really? Then I see, you have lost the—the feeling for it?"

"Yes, that is it precisely," said Noel Bartholomew, almost betraying by the glance he gave his surprise that she should understand. "The mood in which I began it is dead, I think it is dead for ever."

Miss Richmond stood silent a moment, looking into his face with a look of intense, concentrated compassion, such as he had never dreamed could be made visible on a countenance like hers. It almost startled him from his indifference.

"The Princess's face is a portrait, then?" Miss Richmond asked, speaking in a subdued tone that was far removed from curiosity.

"It is, and it is not," the painter replied. "I had a model—that is to say, a lady staying with us for a few days kindly sat for me. She had a lovely picturesque face, pale and sad-looking, but I tried to idealise the features, partly that she might never be recognised, so that I should not call it a portrait."

"Could you not finish it if the same lady sat to you again?"

"No, not now. I might finish the figure of the Princess, and I might paint a Kiartan to stand beside it, but the whole thing would be worthless, and wooden as the chair on which the picture stands. There would be no beauty in it, nor any truth, nor any life whatever."

"And you have no hope concerning it—I mean hope for the future?"

"None."

Miss Richmond again stood silent, with nursing eyes turned downward to the floor.

"I wonder how it is?" she said at length, speaking softly. "I should have thought that the chief idea of the picture, the pain of parting, would have been an idea that you could have recalled always?"

Noel Bartholomew looked up, his eyes seeming to quiver for one quick moment under their lids.

"I can recall it," he replied slowly. "Yes, you are right; I can always recall it, if—if it should ever be absent long enough to need recall."

"Then I see why you cannot put it into paint," said Miss Richmond, looking into his face with grave and fervent compassion. To herself she spoke in another and a wilder way.

CHAPTER XI—CANON GABRIEL.

Two quiet days passed before another carriage containing visitors awoke the wonder that Keturah's round eyes seemed made to express. Genevieve was just going down to the studio with a cup of tea for her father.

"You can show these gentlemen down the orchard," she said. "And once more let me ask you to look less amazed. Now don't forget, Keturah."

"No, ma'am; Ah won't forget. Ah never forgets nothing. Ah'm a despart deep thinker."

Noel Bartholomew put down his palette and brushes gladly for once, and for once there was a really glad look on his face. He hastened to meet a friend.

How lightly one uses the word! how one squanders it on the most inadequate occasions, making it do duty for a dozen other words of lesser value that would better far express the lesser meaning!

Year by year, day by day, "dream delivers us a dream, and there is no end to illusion."

So, if there be any healing waters left anywhere on the earth, any Bethesda Pool where one might be made whole of the wounds that one has had, one may rest assured that these waters be in the depths of a true friend's soul.

For Noel Bartholomew the healing water of sympathy was stirred to its divinest effect by the man whose mere coming had power to raise expectation, whose mere glance raised expectation to a spiritual certainty.

He was an aged man, a man one thought, a man of prayer, of suffering, of endurance. All this, and much more than this, was written on the pale intensity of his face.

The physical line of the man had never been fully equal to the demands made upon it by the soul's life. The higher had dominated the lower at a fearful expense to the latter. Now, you saw as it were through the turnings of the frame, and you dreaded the effect of the quick flush that mounted to the thought-riven forehead, as you might have dreaded to see the point of a lancet near a main artery.

It had so happened that Canon Gabriel and Genevieve had not met before.

"I have been wishing to come for days past," he said, taking her hand in his and holding it with a warm friendliness that the girl felt to be very precious. The old man's kind sad eyes, the wistful simplicity of the smile that parted his still beautiful mouth, were expanding her confidence in himself as the sun of a summer's dawn expands the lily till it yields its heart's last secret. Genevieve had no secrets that the world would have called such, but even in that first hour she betrayed the kinship of her soul to a soul that understood.

"I was needing him," she said to herself when she knelt for her prayer that night.

The clergyman who accompanied Canon Gabriel was, of course, the blushing Mr. Severne, the Canon's curate. He was still blushing. His blush would have been the one distinctive thing about him but for his smile, which was distinctive also. It was an irresistible smile, in the sense of forcing you to smile either with the curate or at him. To ignore it was a physical impossibility. Yet in common fairness it must be added that there was something about the man that saved his smile, his blush, and himself from any touch of ridiculousness, a something that day by day commended him more warmly to Canon Gabriel's affectionate regard.

It could hardly be said that his desire to please was more evident to-day than any other day. It was always evident; and always combined with touching little doubts about his success. The doubts were not expressed except by blushes, which were more expressive than any words he had command. Before five minutes were over he was openly deploring his limited vocabulary. Only Genevieve was listening. Mr. Bartholomew and Canon Gabriel were discussing other things.

"I—I don't know whether it's worst in one's sermons, or in one's parish work," said Mr. Severne ingenuously. "And when I think anybody is listening who—who minds about it, I get awfully nervous."

"Do you? That is a pity. But I should think you could not feel nervous at the school-room service at Murk-Marshes. The people there seem as if they would be so very un-exacting."

My thr... ..

"So they do, is a rule. But now and then other people come, more—more educated in a way."

"Are you meaning me?" I was there on Sunday afternoon.

"Yes, so you were. But you sat behind the stove pipe, and—and—"

"And you were grateful to me for sitting behind the stove-pipe?"

"Well, I was," admitted Mr. Severne blushing and laughing with real enjoyment of the position. "If you'd been looking at me I should have felt ever so much worse."

"Then you may rely upon my not looking at you in future. There is no necessity for it. There is so much to be seen from the school room windows. But you must promise me not to think that my attention is wandering if you see me looking out of the window."

"I—I should be glad if I could think it was wandering—then perhaps you wouldn't find out that I was wandering, it is so difficult to keep to one's subject. But even that is not so difficult as visiting in the parish. I never know what to say—especially when I go in."

"Couldn't you ask after the baby?"

"I do, I am awfully fond of children. But some of the people haven't any. Some of them seem as if they hadn't anything and I don't do anything that one could talk about. They don't read, they don't think, they don't work, and they don't go anywhere."

"And they don't gossip?"

"Oh, don't they?" I—I began to wonder.

"I mean—"

"Severne, come and look at this picture."

It was the Canon's gentle voice that spoke, and he added, in the humorous way that was so well upon his fine gravity—

"I am sure I need not apologise to Miss Bartholomew for relieving her of the burden of entertaining you."

"Well, I—I don't know," said Mr. Severne, blushing two shades deeper. "Perhaps I may have been entertaining Miss Bartholomew."

"That is eminently probable. But now look at this head. What should you say of the man who sat for that?"

"I should have to think before I said anything. It meant for a saint?"—a John, for instance?

"That is how it impresses you?" said Mr. Bartholomew.

"Well, it did at first."

"And now?"

"Now I seem ■ see some hardness in those hazel coloured eyes, and there is some thing very like hardness, too, about the mouth. Still, it is a good face, and it is very—very intellectual. Don't you think so, Canon Gabriel?"

"I think it is wonderful! wonderful to see a Judas in a face like that!"

"A Judas!"

"That is Bartholomew's idea of Judas, and I think in future it will be mine. I could conceive of Christ choosing a man like that to be His disciple. There are such insignificant possibilities in the head and face. You say ■ yourself, that man may be anything he chooses. But it is not a Hebrew type, Bartholomew?"

"No, it is more Hellenic, and therefore more suggestive of the bust that is seen, or will be, physically speaking."

"I exactly, but one hardly cares for that. It is the power, the subtle inconsistency, the possibility of pathos underlying the hard determination. One sees the man who could betray his Master for a paltry price, but one also sees the man who went and hanged himself because his remorse for so doing was greater than he could bear."

"It has always been terribly perplexing to me," said Genevieve. "I cannot comprehend the alternations of feeling that must have understruck both motive and action."

"You will comprehend it better when you are older," said the Canon. "Such alternations are as readily possible to-day as they were eighteen hundred years ago, is possible in Muriel Marshes is in Judas. There are doubtless people who can love and hate the same persons by turns and who can feel either passion with equal violence."

"They must be very miserable people," said Mr Severne who had a habit of putting hypothetical cases ■ himself, and was wondering at that moment whether he could ever come to dislike Miss Bartholomew.

"I think you said this head was only a study," observed the Canon. "You are going to paint a picture from it?"

"Yes, the picture is begun. It is here—this morning's work still wet. I am not satisfied with it ■ day."

Mr Bartholomew was unwise enough to turn his canvas, so that his visitors could see his work. It might be that he had ■ in time in so doing.

"Oh, I say! how curious!" Mr Severne exclaimed. "It ■ the same, the Judas over ■ again, and yet ■ is like—like some one else. Don't you see, Canon Gabriel?"

"I hardly know what I see yet," said the Canon speaking more cautiously. "It is so very unfinished."

"So it is, the hair isn't done, and all that, but if it had been darker, and had had black hair hanging over the forehead, I should certainly have said it was Miss Richmond. Let it be strange. It is so like the Judas, too!"

"You are rather a stupid boy," said the Canon drawing the young man's attention ■ another sketch, and perceiving with some satisfaction that the painter was amused rather than annoyed.

"It is curiously difficult sometimes," said Bartholomew, "to catch a likeness, but it ■ often equally difficult to get rid of a likeness after ■ has once got in. It may have come in unintentionally, but no intention will suffice to dismiss it."

"Then that would account for some of the repetitions that one often sees in pictures by the same artist," said Canon Gabriel. "But what or rather who, is this? A St Agnes, surely?"

"No, I meant that for the nameless sister of Sir Percivale. I used to wonder why Connyson had not bestowed upon her one of the most beautiful of his beautiful names, now I think it better she should have no name." The picture was only a head, only a pale, silken head with a wan and playful face, and eyes with the "deathless passion" of holiness in them.

It was hung rather high, and Mr Severne was looking up at it as he might have looked at some marvellously wrought altar-piece. Canon Gabriel was saying softly —

I r u c h y d e a t t o s p e a k w i t h
A t t e n t i o n a n t u y a k t i l l h e r e y o u
B e y o n d t h e w a t e r f o r t h e
M a d a m w a s f i n e w o l f e u
B e m i n t u l l e c f h o l a s

"Would you mind standing there for ten minutes, Mr Severne?" asked the painter courteously, as the Canon's voice ceased.

"No. I shouldn't mind a bit, of course not," said the curate, blushing quite the deepest tint that he had exhibited yet.

"Are you going to make a sketch of me? Oh, I say! I should like it, I should really!"

"Then look quite grave, please, quite quiet, as you were looking just now."

"And we will go up to the cottage and have some tea," said Genevieve, turning ■ Canon Gabriel.

Ah, yes, think you. That is wise. Severne will never behave as he ought ■ do if we remain."

CHAPTER XII—SIR GALAHAD

"Your father's imagination seems to be recovering its activity," said Canon Gabriel when they reached the sitting room. There was a cheery fire burning, a smell of turf came from the kitchen, a breeze was stirring the ivy-leaves to and fro upon the diamond panes, the low sun threw long rays between the flower pots and across the cosy little room.

"I think his imagination has been active all the while," Genevieve said thoughtfully.

Perhaps only too true. It was the power to realise the things he saw that had gone from him. The misery of it was in that.

"The power not the wall?"

'No, not the will never the will It was strange I can hardly explain though I think I understand It seemed as if he had not power to obey his will I have known him will to do a thing and compel himself to do it but none knew better than he knew the utter worthlessness of it when it was done And people did to torture him they could not understand I believe the world looks upon the production of art, or of poetry as upon the production of so much luck laying

"But you are happy about your father now?"

"It is a kind of crisis. So much may depend upon so little just now."

"What sort of idea should you think he has about Mr Severne? I mean what sort of artistic idea? He seemed struck by some thing—

Genevieve smiled softly. "I think my father's idea would be the same as mine—that Mr. Severne would make a good pendant to the sister of Sir Percival."

"A Sir Galahad? That is strange! I have had the same notion about him ever since he came. The moment I saw him and heard him speak I thought of the lance—"

It is of course in Severne's youth and in his goodness rather than in his beauty that one sees the analogy. But if any one has seen, or may see, the Holy Grail, then Severne sees it.

'You can say that of him?'

Yes, I can say that of him. He may not have seen the gold and silver beams stealing through the moonlight, or the crystal Chalice, rose red with beatings in it, but he has seen all that these things symbolise. The Chalice of the Wine of Charity has touched his lips, and left its odour there, nay it has gone deeper than that. He is not, I grant it, clever as the world count cleverness but he is as willing as St Paul was to be considered a fool. And what that all is, that is the loss of the wisest of us.

Genevieve was standing near the fire her head was raised her deep shut eyes were heavy with thought wistful with strong yearning

"Canon Gabriel, will you help me if I begin the quest of the Holy Grail?" she asked speaking in a tone of timid, childlike humility.

"Certainly, I will help you my child, if God permit. But I think that the quest has begun for you already."

CHAPTER XIII — THE SIGNIFICANCE OF CRUDE OIL IN THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD

"I saw a allus driftin over Ingbarugh Moor

It seemed as if the burden of the old man's strain was about to work its own fulfillment.

The bright cheery autumn weather came to an end quite suddenly. Where the yellow glow had been, a thick white snow fog spread, the hollows between the lands or the stubble fields were filled with a cold blue haze, the distant dark edges of Ussilly Crags were shrouded, a piercing wind began to blow, the last leaves went flying from the trees, and the bare boughs agonised in the merciless blast.

It was one night the broad white lakes began to fill. Genevieve, looking out from her window under the eaves, saw them fling, past in the blue black darkness in a visible way her lamp. They swept horizontally, like morsels of detached mail, and all the time

Next morning the wild level of the cottage was obliterated, it remained obliterated for several days. Down in the hamlet people were saying that there had been no such snowstorm since the winter that Joseph (Caven) lost his sheep, and Matthew Christy his life.

After a time there came a pause in the descent of the snow. The frost returned milder for some days, and the wind hushed and squally, but at length a really fine looking morning broke a keen and clear morning. The sky was of the deepest, coldest steel blue, all along the main and horizon great wild clouds were driving rapidly, but every now and then broad rays of sunlight shot across the cold white world, making the day seem serene if you only looked landward. ■ was tempting to any one with a desire for out door air, but Mr Bartholomew had threatenings of bronchial troubles, not new to him, and therefore to be dreaded. This was tiresome, as he was wanting ■ over to the Bank at Thurkeld Abbas.

He was rather glad when he saw Miss Craven driving slowly, carefully down the white upland. She drew up by the stile, and Keturah ran along the snow-covered field to hold the horse. Dorothy usually stopped at Nethenbank to ask if she could execute any commissions "in the town." She drove an old white pony and a black gr, a turn-out that commanded a respect in Thurkeld Abbas not always accorded to vehicles of greater pretension.

Something ■ Mr Bartholomew's perplexity, something to his amusement, Miss Craven refused to transact his business at the Bank.

"I'll not do that," she said in her usual brusque way, "but I'll drive your daughter to the town and back again if you like. I've nothing but myself in the gig, an' I haven't much to do at Thurkeld, only the butter an' eggs to leave, an' the groceries ■ get, an' a few things to get at Hartgill's."

"You will let me go, father?" Genevieve asked, a faint glow of delight rising to her cheek as she spoke.

"Why do you ask with such mild emphasis?"

"Because my desire ■ so strong."

"Exactly," said the father, looking at her with solemn comprehension, as his way was. Then he went to the window. It was easy enough to understand the girl's eager desire ■ be out there amongst all that new white beauty that was glittering in the sun. Sun shine is always hopeful. After due hesitation a restrained permission was given. Ten minutes later Genevieve was sitting by Mrs Craven's side, wrapped from head to foot in furs and shawls, and doing her best to subdue the child like excitement that was born of the unusual elements in her present and prospective experience.

"Oh look! look there!" she cried, as they turned a corner of the lane that led down into the village. There was a tall, ragged hawthorn hedge on the seaward side, and the snow had drifted through the interstices, making such strange forms as surely never snow made before. Giant sofas and couches, tall chairs of quaint shapes were ranged one behind another, each with its end to the hedge, all the way along the road, precisely as furniture might have been arranged in a vast show-room. The sight was unique enough to be remembered for a lifetime, but it was not an easy matter to drive through or by this strange display of freaks. Miss Craven was very careful, her old pony was patient and willing, but nervous withal, and the aspect of things was beginning to be less amusing, when the figure of a horseman was seen approaching.

"There!" said Dorothy, with a quick, keen flush of annoyance. "Was ever anything more vexin' than that?"

"Is it some one you know?" Genevieve asked.

"Know! Yes, more's the pity. It's Ishmael Crudas. You'll have heard your father speak of him, I reckon?"

"Yes," said Genevieve, blushing too now, for very sympathy, "my father told me a little—only a very little. He said that perhaps it would be a pain to you if you thought I knew more."

"Pain! It's all pain together. But I don't mind your knowing. I mind nobody's knowing. Some day I may tell you myself maybe."

The horseman approached. He was a grey haired, keen eyed man, in later middle age, with a complexion as ruddy and as fresh as it had been thirty years before. Evidently he was a well-to-do man, everything about him, from the sleek, dark, dappled grey he rode to the sound quality of his rough topcoat, bespoke the prosperous, thriving Yorkshire farmer.

"Well done, Miss Craven!" he shouted at the top of a shrill and somewhat penetrating voice. "You've about gotten through t' worst on't, but mebbe Ah'd better lend ya a hand as far as t' Wheateheaf, so as you mayn't turn reproachful, an' say 'at Ah've got t' best on't. Steady! Crazel, steady!"

Miss Craven protested, in tones almost as shrill as his own, thus making it evident that her interlocutor was rather deaf, as indeed any one might have guessed from his manner of speaking. Apparently her protestations were carried away by the wind, which was boisterous at times. Mr. Crudas dismounted, led his own horse with one hand, and guided the uncertain steps of Miss Craven's pony with the other, Miss Craven meanwhile looking determinedly beyond him with fixed eyes, glowing cheeks, and a firmly-closed mouth expressive of the deepest mortification.

"T' road's been cut all t' waaay fra Murk-Marshes to Thurkeld," said Ishmael, remounting and riding by Miss Craven's side. "Ah com round by Briscoe. Ah was on my waaay ic t' Haggis to ask aboot that coo 'at ya said was such a bad milker. But Ah shall ■ up that way again next week, an' we can talk things over. Ah might ■ weel go back by Thurkeld noon as any other way. That's road you're bound Ah reckon?"

Miss Craven admitted that it was, by the slightest possible parting of her lips. To Genevieve's surprise this repressive manner had no particular effect upon Mr. Crudas.

"You're not goin' to introduce me to that young lady then, Dorothy?" he said, glancing past Miss Craven with his small keen eyes. "Ah sall be t' introduce mysel', Ah see, an' Ah can do it wi' a good grace an' all, seeing 'at Ah knew both her father an' her mother afore she was born. Hoo dis ye? father like livin' at Murk Maushers, Miss Bartholomew?"

"He likes it very much, thank ye," said Genevieve, leaning forward and answering, with one of her rare smiles. "Perhaps you will call at Netherbank? my father would be glad to see you."

"Thank ye, miss, thank ye!" Mr. Crudas shouted in shrill delight. The value of the invitation so graciously given was doubled by the fact that Miss Craven heard it given. It seemed a mere matter of gratitude that Mr. Crudas should side round to the side of the ■ on which Genevieve sat, but another matter was stirring ■ his brain, or ■ coming to stir. What if this dainty looking young lady could be won to sympathy, to help, ■ the creation of such influence as she might have with Miss Craven? The thought had struck him on the sudden, and he had been quick to perceive the possibilities it held. Nothing so likely as the unlikely.

"Desp't weather," he began, by way of giving himself time to think how a middle-aged Yorkshire farmer, of rough speech and aspect, might make himself agreeable to a young lady of such perfect manners, such undimmed beauty as this. "Desp't weather it's been. Ah don't know 'at ever I heerd tell o' more damage done at one time i' my life. T' papers ■ full o' now! but disaster—disaster by sea, an' disaster by land. Ah reckon it's been as bad aboot here as anywhere. They say there's over thirty wrecks lyn' ashore atween Shields an' Scarborough, an' more ships missin' nor folks knows on yet. Did ye hear tell 'at Ah'd seen a vessel ■ doon mysel' night afore last?"

"You saw it?" asked Genevieve, turning paler and looking out to the dark horizon where the sea was still heaving under the frowning heavens.

"Ay, Ah saw it, an', so far as Ah know, nobody else saw it. She turned over all of a sudden, an' came up again bottom upward, parted clean i' two, like a 'bacca pipe. Then she disappeared, an' there wasn't as much as a spar left floatin' 'at Ah could see, but 'twas gettin' on for nightfall. Ah'd been out all t' day. Ah never can rest i' t' house wi' t' signals firin' an' t' rockets roarin' i' that way. Ah watched the savin' o' three ships' crews fra the top o' Smithcliff Nab that day, an' Ah helped a bit i' savin' other two."

"While they saved by the lifeboat?" Genevieve asked.

"Some by t' boat, an' some by t' life lines," answered Mr. Crudas. "There was a woman fetched ashore i' the cradle, poor thing! over such a boilin', ragin' sea as Ah reckon you never saw. She was the last but one ■ leave the ship. She stuck tiv her husband—he was i' water, an' he stuck tiv his vessel till all t' rest o' t' crew was safe. Then t' line wi' t' cradle an' t' life buoy was shot oot again, an' just as t' poor fellow seemed to be puttin' one foot into t' cradle, he was blown clean overboard,—ch, but it was an awul minute that! There wasn't a shadow o' a chance i' such a sea. He bawled aboot a bit, sometimes one could see him, an' sometimes one couldn't, tho' he was nobbut a few yards fra t' shore. I heerd a cry, a terrible cry, it's i' my ears yet, but whether it was the drownin' man or his wife, Ah don't know to this minute. They said she was tum go."

"And all this was just here, and we did not know," said Genevieve. "I thought I heerd a gun once in the night, but I did not know what it meant."

The girl stopped. She was growing paler and paler as her keen susceptibility was wrought upon more deeply by the thought of the seeming carelessness and indifference in which she had been living through the storm. The idea of sitting in safety, in warmth, in unappreciated security, while men were crying their last agonizing cries within sight of the place where she sat, was almost intolerable. It seemed as if she had wronged those who had suffered of their due sympathy in failing to suffer with them so far as she might have done. It was as if she heard a voice in the wild wind—a voice asking, "Could ye not watch with me one hour?" Then the wind fell a little, and the voice seemed to say, "Inasmuch as ye did it not to these, ye did it not to Me."

They were nearly at their journey's end now. The dark clouds were drifting upward from the sea; the sun was hidden, the distant moorland was changing from grey to purple-black.

"Ah doobt t' daay's go n' to worren' on't," said Ishmael Crudas as they entered Kug-gut, the main street of the townlet. Ishmael turned ■ go his own way, which branched off a little farther down the street, shouting "Good daay" to Miss Craven and Genevieve as he went. There was a strange gloomy look upon the face of the houses, the piled up snow on either side of the street looked dirty and distressful, the people were hurrying about—more people than Genevieve had seen in Thirkeld Abbas before; and it soon became evident that some common cause was making common stir.

"You know where the Bank is?" said Miss Craven, as they stopped ■ the Richmond Arms. "An' what are you going to do till I'm ready? Haden't I better call for you at the Rectory?"

"Yis, thank you; if you will be so kind," said Genevieve. She still looked sad and thought burdened as she turned to go down the narrow street where the Bank was. Marshes Lane was the name of it, and Marshes Lane was the most silent and deserted street in all the place, as a rule. To-day a throng of people were coming swiftly down, talking rapidly, earnestly as they came, and looking into each other's faces with concern and dread.

"Has anything happened?" Genevieve asked of a tall woman who seemed to be trying ■ cheer a shorter woman who clung weeping to her arm.

"Ay, miss, there's anuff happened, if it's true what folks say," answered the woman in tones of pain and excitement. "There's a ship i' distress just down t' the Bight here, an' they say it's The Viking; an' if it is, my sister's little boy's aboard—little Davy Dine. An' it's nobbut his second voyage, poor baun' An' he is a bonny little lad, miss, an' sharp as a bee.* But don't take on so yet, Ailsie. Wait an' see. God's been good ■ thee so far. Don't take on so till tha knows the worst."

Genevieve had turned, for the women still hurried on as the tall one spoke. The younger one, hardly knowing what she did in the sudden bewilderment ■ her grief, put out her hand to Genevieve, who took it warmly between her own. She could think of few words that held any comfort, and these few were difficult to utter in the strong wind that seemed to be growing stronger every moment. When the little town was left behind, as it was before Genevieve became aware of the fact, there was no protection. The blast swept the wild-looking scene, bending the leafless trees; driving the untrodden snow over the cliffs in steamy clouds; blowing through the thin garments of the women, who were hurrying in groups along the bleak white road that led down into Soulgrif Bight. "Come wi' ma, come wi' ma!" the younger woman intimated when Genevieve paused once in the lane. "Come wi' ma, and see the last o' my little lad!"

And again it seemed to Genevieve that there was a voice in the blast that went sweeping by.

CHAPTER XIV—"WHO I TIL I LOVED THAT LOVED NOT AT ALL I SIGHT?"

THE scene in Soulgrif Bight disclosed itself quite suddenly from the turn at the top of the cliff. It was a wild scene, and impressive, and the sounds that dulled and deadened the hearing were at least as unpressive as the sight itself.

The houses that composed the little fishing hamlet at the foot of the cliff were ranged somewhat after the fashion of an irregular semicircle. Some had stood on the very fringe of the sea, these were wrecked for the most part, and you saw figures moving through and beyond the slanting rafters that had held the roof.

Others stood dotted about on ledges of rock, on rugged and hardly approachable points, the cliffs having in some instances taken away on every side, and left the old tiled dwelling on a rocky plot in the midst of rocks. Some few were ranged together on a shelf at the back of the bay, and on the slope in front there were upturned boats, masts, and oars, the wrecks of lost ships, and other pathetic vestiges of lost lives.

Few details were noticed by Genevieve as she went down Soulgrif Bank, still holding the hand of the woman who was still silently weeping. The Bight seemed ■ be rapidly filling with swift-moving, apprehensive figures. Some came from the north, some from the south, some were going down with Genevieve and the fear-driven woman, who seemed to look to her, if not for help, then, at least, for all the sympathy she had ■ give. There was an excitement, suppressed as yet, on every countenance; and every eye was turned strainingly seaward.

At present this seaward view was suggestive only of terror—of angry and awful power. The dark clouds were obscured, so too was the darkly-heaving distance of the sea. Mystery was the key-note of the scene, the mystery of driving storm-scurd—scurd of ram or snow meeting and mingling with the scud of riven, flying surf. The only light in it was a heavy, lurid, yellow light, that appeared to be neither of sun, nor moon, nor stars—a light that seemed to strike upward from the torn sea, rather than downward from the troubled heavens.

Down ■ the bottom of the narrow rock-bounded road a dozen or more of the fisher-folk of the place gathered instantly about the strange little group of three. It did not seem strange, nothing was strange save the awful booming of the sea all along the foot of the cliffs, the wild roaring and lashing, the mad bursting and tossing of the waves that stretched in broken heights and shallow depths across the Bight from Driscoe Point to Soulegrif Ness. What roar was of the water, and what of the rushing mighty wind, could not be discerned. The sole sound that had distinction there was the shrill crying of the myriad seagulls that had their home in the rocks to the north. For Genevieve Bartholomew there was an added terror in their defiant scream that every now and then subsided into a mocking chuckle as the birds passed boldly near. It was as if some malignant storm spirit swopt by on its wicked wing.

The two women with whom Genevieve had come down from Thusheld Abbas were the daughters of a drowned man, the widows of drowned men, the sisters of drowned men. All they possessed—the means of life itself—had come to them from the sea, the self same sea had taken from them all that made life worth having. Aithie Diene would have said "neaily all" a day or two before, believing that her boy was safe on board The Viking, then, as she supposed, taking in coal at Newcastle for Dieppe.

The news that a schooner, believed to be The Viking, had been seen drifting past Buscoe Point, disabled and dismantled, was the first news that the poor woman had had of the sailing of the ship. She knew at once that it must have sailed before the coming on of the storm. Where had it been during the awful days and nights of veering wind and changing, tempestuous sea, that it should now be drifting helplessly northward again?

More than one ■ the men assembled there had seen the hull of the disabled ship as it rolled and laboured past the point. The mainmast had snapped on a few feet from the deck, some three or four figures gathered about the bows was all that could be discerned through the darkness and mist of the edge of the snow squall.

Two of the men on board—it was hoped they were on board—were Soulegrif men. Their wives were there in the Bight, and their little children. One white-headed old man stood alone, covering his face ■ times with his son's wetter while he prayed for the last son that the sea had left him. Had it left him? Was he there, midway between the frowning heavens and the angry sea? The old man was walking on, still alone, still praying, still keeping his eye fixed on the changing, threatening distance. Suddenly he heard a voice beside him, a gentle, swift, anxious voice trying to speak so that it could be heard above the storm.

"Have you seen the ship? Do you think it is there? Do you think ■ can be there?"

The old man turned, gazing surprisedly at the white, beautiful, eager face, the compassionate eyes before him. He had not heard, or had not understood, the questions. Were they in some strange tongue? Surely it was some message of peace that had been sent to him!

He was wondering silently, a man on horseback was dashing wildly down a steep path between the rocks. The latter stopped rather suddenly as Genevieve was repeating her question in a louder and more deliberate way. She had not noticed him till he drew up.

For a moment he sat silent in the saddle, as if he too were half bewildered by the tall, white, fur-clad figure, the wind-blown masses of rippling golden hair, the pale, clear-cut face that was like a sculptor's dream, the dark, wistful eyes of the truest, deepest violet colour he had ever in his many wanderings beheld. All against his will he was arrested by the unconscious grace, the appealing glance, the intense compassion visible on the face so suddenly upturned to his.

The gentleman raised his hat, "I beg your pardon," he said. "You were asking about the ship. It is there, I have seen ■ from the moor." Then he turned to the old man. "Is anything known about the vessel in Soulegrif Bight?" he asked of him.

The old fisherman's eyes filled with tears. He had heard what this clear, strong voice was saying. "I know 'at my son ■ aboard, sir," he said. "If he be aboard yet, him an' all 'at's wiv him 's dependin' o' their lives."

"There ■ no lifeboat here?" The question was put in quick, decisive tones.

"No, sir. An' if there was she couldn't live i' such a sea as this."

"Where ■ the nearest lifeboat station?"

"At yon end o' Swarthcliff Bay, sir, six miles to the south'ard. Ah thought they might public ha' seen the vessel as she passed there but Ah reckon she passed when one o them snow squalls was on if she passed at all! I ut there's no sayn where she's been such wether as this.

The stranger raised his hat as he dashed off again, then he crushed it down over a great square forehead contracted with pain, with strong resolution. His firm mouth was strenuously compressed, his large dark brown eyes were lighted with the determination of effort rather than with hope of that effort's success.

Genevieve looked after him, feeling as if some help had gone with him, some help and strength. Certainly the cold wind was colder, the dark heavens darker, surely the white snow flurries that were beginning to sweep upward from the sea swept in more persistent record with human loss and loneliness than ever snow had swept before.

Do you know that gentleman's name? he asked of the old man who still stood near.

No! Lady, no! Ah don't know what they call him. He'll be a stranger hereabouts. Ah reckon. He seems keen set in something. God keep him fra him an ill.

An en said the girl, audibly and reverently.

CHAPTER XI.—IN IT IS ON THE SEA.

Nearly an hour after the gentleman on his black hull passed swiftly through Souls Gulf, he had drawn up the cliff to the south wall there was a slight change in the aspect of things. The wind veered a little, the snow storm began to clear away to the north.

Every eye in Souls Gulf was fixed on the river in the edge of the moving cloud.

It went on moving, moving over sullen dark, blue black waters fretted with leaping tongues of white foam, tongues that leapt hungrily one upon another because nothing else was there for them to leap upon. There was nothing else from Innescot Point to the river cloud edge that went on moving away.

Even above the desperate thun and boom of the sea you could hear or perhaps feel, the low ground tone of despair that came from the hearts of the people standing there.

More than three parts of the wild wide bay was clear now, clear and cold as blue steel, but no dismayed hull rose darkly between sea and sky.

Some there could have prayed that the cloud might stay now, that its merciful obscurity might rest upon the little space that was left between its ragged edge and Souls-gulf Ness, as once the cloud rested upon the camp of Israel. But it moved onward, swept past the Ness.

From point to point there was nothing for the eye to see save the great drift of waters nothing for the ear but the war of the unabating tempest.

Genevieve Bartholomew, with the fearlessness of ignorance, went farther along the beach to where some large masses of fallen rock were lying under the cliff. Two of the aged fishermen, who had turned their backs to the sea, and were standing with pathetic lines of hopelessness about their mouths, with sad, strange recognition of the worst in their eyes, gave her a word of warning as she passed.

"Don't go! owe far that way, miss! T' tide's risen. When it touches von stein, the Knikmusters Steen, they call it, its dangerous comin' back."

"Is it? I thank you. I shall not stay," the girl shouted through the roar. "I want to see if I can see anything from that ledge. I am afraid you will think me foolish but I did think that I saw something, just now there! I saw it again. A black speck on the water!"

The men turned swiftly, something in the girl's eyes, hopefulness of manner striking chords of responsive hopefulness in them.

There was nothing to be seen, but they knew well that so small a thing, as a piece of wreck, or even a boat, might show itself for one moment and then hide itself for many in such a mountainous sea as that. They hurried away to where a group of people were gathering round a woman who had doubtless been made a widow since that snow squall burst upon the bay. There was a man with a glass in the crowd, and at the first sign he turned to sweep the angry water in which it seemed so little likely that anything could be and live.

Yet not one full minute had passed when the cry half glad, half full of anguish, swept across the light. "They've taken to the boat! God help them! they've taken to the boat!"

For the moment every one had seen it for themselves. Away beyond the scudding, desperate, madly-plunging surf a vast ridge of water had risen slowly bearing on its unbroken crest a tiny boat with six dark figures visible against the cold, clear sky. "Heaven help 'em!" said the man who had been watching them through the glass. "Heaven help 'em! There's some on 'em stripped to swim!"

Even ■ he spoke the boat disappeared. A great white crest with a flying mane swept up between, seeming as if it broke into the blue ether that was changing to green. There was no murmur in the crowd, no cry, only a breathless, heart swelling silence.

Could nothing be done, nothing, nothing? It seemed ■ Genevieve as if no one asked the question. She did not know as they did that in such a sea as that the question was an idle one. The probability was that the boat would never reach the broken surf if it did its buffeting would soon end.

"Ah! it's hard to perish within sight of the reek of your own chimney," said a lame man who passed on crutches. Only a year before ■ had been washed ashore, senseless, stunned, and maimed by the wreckage of the ship he had sailed in all his life.

Genevieve, mindful of the warning that she had received, went upward toward a nearer ledge of rock, which seemed to offer even better chances of observation. No one noticed her now, every face being turned seaward, waiting for another glimpse of the boat, if it might so be that another glimpse was to be had.

None knew better than the simple fisher folk of Soulgulf Bight that the extremity could never come that should find God's aim so shortened that it could not be. Some prayed silently, some aloud, some prayed, not knowing it was prayer they offered. Miracles had been wrought in Soulgulf Bight, and doubtless miracles would be wrought there again. Why not now?

Suddenly, very suddenly, the painful, breathless silence was broken. A woman looking southward saw on the snow covered cliff top some object looming, towering greatly against the sky. A crowd of toiling people were all about it, horses were being moved hither and thither, ropes were being thrown and coiled and bound.

"My God! my God!" said the woman who had been praying passionately for her husband's life. "My God! it's the LARION!"

Even so, it was the life boat.

Knowing that no boat that ever was built could round Biscoe Point in such a tempest as that, the captain at the coastguard station had refused to launch the life boat, to sacrifice almost certainly the lives of thirteen brave men. It was painful to make the refusal, but even as he made it a thought struck him.

"I cannot launch her here, Mr Kirkoswald," he said ■ the gentleman who had ridden in hot haste from Soulgulf Bight. "She would never round the point. But if it were possible to get her overland through the snow she might be launched in the light."

"Then for Christ's sake let us try! There are supposed to be six men and a lad in the foundering ship."

So the trial was made, and the dry and the deed will live, as brave deeds have lived in England always. The children of children yet unborn will tell of the cutting of the frozen and deeply drifted snow over hills and through hollows for six long miles, the painful dragging, step by step, of the massively built boat, mounted on her own carriage, by men who wrought in silence, in utter obedience, in splendid willingness, with desperate resolve.

"If you will take command of the men who work on the road, Mr Kirkoswald, the coxswain and I will see to the boat," said the captain of the coastguard to the stranger, who was working already with spade and mattock in the snow. His horse had been harnessed to the boat's carriage, but it had to be unharnessed, as its owner needed it for the new service that was required of him. It was difficult service, and important, but he was equal to the task, and men who might not speak aloud spoke softly, saying always to themselves, "Well done!"

Men and horses from well nigh every farm on the road joined the band of volunteers, the men working with such a will as they had never in their lifetime brought to any labour of their own. Massive snow drifts disappeared, heaved away in heavy blocks, the horses strove in the shafts—as many as eighteen being yoked at one time in places where the road was steep, or the snow imperfectly cleared. No difficulty stopped or stayed this little force of brave Yorkshiremen, as they struggled forward and ever forward on their painful errand. I can the men who knew that for them the worst was yet to come, the biting ■ the terrible sea after the terrible toil on land, even they spared not themselves, no, not even when the life-boat stood on the top of Biscoe Bank, and was seen towering there by eyes that could only see through mists, welcomed by voices whose words of greeting were choked and overpowered by sobs. Strong men wept as the ringing cheers at length passed upward through the deafening roar of wind and wave; but their weeping had ■ be brief. The end was not yet.

MAYME LALANNE

A Short Study of his Life and Work

By ROPTKE WATKIN

AMONG the French artists who are more than mere names to all on this side of the Channel who take even a moderately intelligent interest in art, Mayme Lalanne occupies a distinguished place. By precept and example he has exercised a healthy influence and won an honourable fame. His is no reputation founded on one or two popular or sensational successes. It is built on the continued good work he has done in the valuable branch he has chosen as an etcher and designer. In Graphic Arts for September, 1898, there appeared a short sketch of the life and labours of the master who is acknowledged to be a distinguished in charcoal of figure subjects, especially in France. As a landscape artist in the same medium Mayme occupies a somewhat irregular position although there are many artists who would give to Alphonse Dubouche a reputation of pre-eminence. Each has his own method—his own system of interpreting and rendering Nature and each method, differing in its own opposing in many points, will always have its defenders, so long as the constitution of men's minds, their ways of thinking and their outlook on the world, remain differing and opposed. There is room on this earth for ours for all varying kinds of excellence. We need not undervalue the careful execution in the delicacy, the graceful finish of Alphonse Dubouche's work from the bent of our disposition, we feel that the breadth, the suggestiveness, the skilful tones, the massive simplicity of Lalanne appeal more to our imaginations. Each in its own way is good.

Mayme Lalanne's father, who died only a few months ago, held an official position in connection with the law courts of Bordeaux and in that city our artist was born on November 27th 1827. The facts of his life are fully recorded of his labours and successes. He became a Bachelor of Letters in January 1848 and went to Paris in 1852. From his early youth famous as a lithographer, when lithographers were artists—as is his teacher in the elements of art, and in the great school of Nature he put to the proof and perfected the lessons he had learnt in the atelier. In the Salon of 1852 he made his debut as an exhibitor and since that date he has every year contributed to the Paris exhibitions. The official positions he has held in connection with the Salon, the medals and decorations he has received in the course of the last twenty years, are sufficient proof of the impression his work has made on those best qualified to judge. Among the honours bestowed on him may be mentioned gold and bronze medals from Bordeaux (which is pleasant to note has not been slow to recognise the genius of its son) gold medals from the Salon and medals and diplomas from many foreign and international exhibitions. He is a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour (1875), an Officer of Academic (1875), and occupies the highest distinction of all because he is the first etcher who has been knighted simply for his qualities as an etcher, a Chevalier of the Order of Christ of Portugal. His last honour was conferred on him in 1886 by King Dom Fernando of Portugal, who is himself an accomplished etcher and as Lalanne remarks in his Journal 'his last honour was conferred on him in 1886 by King Dom Fernando of Portugal, who is himself an accomplished etcher and as Lalanne remarks in his Journal'.

It is his by his powerful influence, markedly aided in the revival of etching. Since 1880 Lalanne has been every year an important member of the Salon jury, a good proof of the confidence placed in him by his brother artists.

His life has been a busy one. The brief catalogue of all he has achieved fills on with wonder as to how he has managed to accomplish so much. His charcoal drawings his etchings his pencil drawings (in the three departments his skill is pre-eminant), and his oil paintings are legion. In addition to being a regular contributor to the Salon, he sends to almost every important provincial exhibition in France. In this country he has always been well represented at the Black and White Exhibitions in the Dulley Gallery and in the Glasgow Institute of the Fine Arts. He is a teacher with many pupils and as a teacher he may be said to stand at the head of a school which he has himself created. He is an author. His Traité de la Gravure à l'Eau Forte and his work on charcoal drawing.

Le Fusain have been pronounced by the best judges to be splendid examples of lucid explanation. He speaks as one in authority, and instructs in that practical manner possible only to a man who is himself a perfect master of what he professes to teach. As Charles Blanc, the influential art critic, truly observes, other writers on etching have written for those who know, Lalanne writes for those who do not know, and to them he appeals as one whose experiences have given him a right to advise and guide. He sympathises with difficulties and discouragements, because he has encountered them himself and learned how to overcome them.

The revival in France of the art of etching, and the impetus given to that revival by the Gazette des Beaux Arts, and by the establishment, in 1863, of the "Société des Ygures-Fortistes"—with which the name of Alfred Cadart is so honourably associated—seem to me to afford material for one of the most fascinating chapters in the history of modern art. In its commencement, at least, it was a purely artistic movement, and the men who gave life to it were genuine artists, and loved their art for its own sake and not for the material advantages they might derive from it. Among them Lalanne stands prominent. He is, as Hamerton says, "even trillingly a true etcher," as Bewick was a true wood engraver. With a few lines he indicates all we require; his method is direct, simple, and straightforward, and in all his work there is a fine feeling of reserve power. His etchings, both as separate plates and as book illustrations, are too many to be particularised here. The little river scene—Plate 3 in the "Travels"—Hamerton declares to be the most graceful landscape-etching produced since the days of Claude.

Lalanne is a master of pencil-drawing—not an art thought so much of now as it once was. And little wonder, considering the formal horrors that are perpetrated in drawing classes under the direction of so-called drawing masters! Lalanne's pencil drawings, his street scenes, his coast views, his landscapes in France and Holland, are charming. Not the least of their charms is their simplicity. They look easy to imitate. A well-known "drawing master" once told me, as we stood before a frame of Lalanne's sketches, that any one of his pupils could do as well. The pupils must have possessed a gift that Providence had denied to their instructor.

Good as Lalanne's etchings are, his fusains are better. These once claim attention from their originality. In his etchings there may be too much system, although he is an artist that knows how to conceal art. His charcoal drawings abound in poetry and suggestion. As an accomplished critic, Karl Robert, points out, the advantage of the charcoal point is, that it allows the artist to achieve an effect and attain quickly to a satisfactory result. Of this advantage Lalanne has availed himself to the full. With a just idea of values and of what goes to the making of an effective composition, he is always both impressive and suggestive, and although his work is never laboured, it is as little hasty or careless. In all his "motifs" he shows taste and self-command. A stormy sky, a distance pregnant with delicate mystery, a mass of foliage, the play of light in full and half tones, a landscape shrouded in the gathering gloom of night—these are among the features of nature he has represented with truth and sympathy.

He has, of course, his own methods and mannerisms, as all strong artists have. With Lhermitte, and unlike Alloué, he prefers to employ for his fusains the grained paper, the "papier vergé," that from this association has come to be known by his own name, "papier Lalanne."

Lalanne is a successful teacher, and among his pupils are many of the best charcoal draughtsmen of to-day. I need mention the names of only Boquet, Vignal, Velly, Dornois, and Madame Grunbride, who have owed their instruction to him. In his teaching, he bids his pupils learn first the appreciation and knowledge of effect. To begin with, they must endeavour to render, roughly but truthfully, the general appearance of the object they wish to represent, and then, on the effect obtained en masse, work out the detail of form. He believes that to try to draw precisely on the blank paper forms of which no previous rough sketch has been laid down is to grope in the dark and waste labour and patience. As an oil painter, Lalanne is not so well known. Of late, however, he has been working more in this medium, and his found in his native district, where he spends many months of every year, subjects that he has rendered with delicate artistic feeling.

Our illustration is from a charcoal drawing by Lalanne of his native town, and has been engraved by Clément Bellenger, of Paris. Bordeaux, with its cathedral dedicated to Saint André, its bustling quays, and its old world associations, is one of the most interesting and important towns in Southern France, and has been the birthplace of many, Montagne among the number, whom France and the world hold in honour. To the ranks of artists yet alive, it has given Rosa Bonheur as well as Maxime Lalanne.

PETROLEUM

The Light of the West

By THE RIGHT HON SIR LYON PLAYFAIR K.C.B., M.P., F.R.S.

PETROLEUM (Petr: oleum, rock oil) has, within the last generation, been the chief source of light to the poorer classes in many countries, and soon may compete with coal as a source of power in steam ships and railways. It may therefore, be interesting to the readers of GOOD WORDS to know some facts in regard to it from a writer who had some influence in bringing petroleum and its products into economic use in this country.

Petroleum has been known in some parts of the earth where it occurs native, from the earliest periods of human history. The sacred fires of the sun worshippers were fed by the gases which issue from it. The asphaltic left by its evaporation was the basis of the mortar with which Nineveh and Babylon were built. It seems to be frequently referred to in the Bible, though biblical chemistry is much obscured by bad translation. As an instance of this, carbonate of soda, when referred to is translated nitre, and is made to do things impossible to that substance. Thus Solomon tells us that as vinegar upon nitre, so is he that singeth songs to a heavy heart. This has no meaning, for vinegar does nothing to nitre, but it causes a lively and unpleasant commotion when poured upon soda (natron). So also when Jeremiah speaks of washing with nitre and soap, there is no meaning, though soda and soap are used constantly in this relation. It is thus that petroleum in the Bible is concealed under the general word "salt." That word is both generic and specific in all countries. In the latter limited sense it is set or kitchen salt. In the more general sense it includes a vast number of substances, of which Epsom salt and Glauber salt are familiar examples. The connection of salt with petroleum, in biblical language, begins early in Genesis, when the Dead Sea, or Lake of Sodom, is called the Salt Sea. That sea abounds in petroleum springs, and has asphaltic on its ancient shores. Accordingly it has also been called the Lake Asphaltites. Many things become comprehensible if we take the generic term salt and apply it to petroleum and its residue, asphaltic. Lot's wife, if converted into a pillar of common salt, would have been washed away by the first shower of rain, but a pillar of asphaltic, even as a memorial of her, would have been an enduring monument, and might have been seen by Josephus and his contemporary, Clement of Rome both of whom declare that they saw it. So also when we are told by Mulk that "every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt," I see meaning only, when I recollect that, in regions containing petroleum, sacrificial fires were fed with this fuel and the burning, in like manner, when Matthew likens the blessed, first to salt, and immediately afterwards to a lighted torch (for candles, as translated, were then unknown), I see the connection in his mind. He had just said that salt which had lost its savour was only fit to be trodden under foot of men. Now salt never does lose its savour, and is never fit to be trodden under foot. But petroleum does lose its essence by exposure, and, out of the residue, the ancients used to make asphaltic pavements, as they do at the present day. I only give some reasons for my belief that the salt of the Bible, in its generic sense, was often applied to petroleum, but I admit at the same time that the readers of GOOD WORDS ought not to attach much importance to my opinions on any subject of biblical criticism.

Petroleum occurs as a greenish or dark coloured fluid in many countries. In small quantity it occasionally occurs in England. I found a well of it in Derbyshire many years ago, and induced the late Mr Young to establish a manufactory of burning oil, and ultimately of paraffin candles. This suggestion led gradually, in his energetic hands, to the great petroleum industry which has carried cheap light into the houses of the poor. The small supply of native petroleum of Derbyshire soon became exhausted, but the discovery that it could be distilled out in Boghead coal and bituminous shales gave a great impulse to its manufacture. In 1859, America began to introduce native petroleum from Pennsylvania wells. During that year eighty thousand barrels were supplied to commerce, and that quantity was thought to be immense, though it was insignificant with the present supply, which reached thirty-seven million barrels in 1883. Other copious supplies of native petroleum have been found in India, Barmah, and the Caucasian lands about the Caspian Sea. The last source of supply is of such extraordinary magnitude that I will refer to it more in detail in a later part of this article. I may mention, how ever, that at Surakhani on the western shore of the Caspian, sacred fires have been burning probably longer than recorded history. The priests allege that the fires in their temple, fed by gas issuing from the petroleum below, have burned without cessation since four hundred years before Christ.

Before, however, describing the uses of petroleum, I ought to say something as to its probable origin. This is not thoroughly understood. When we prepare artificial petroleum, we distil a low acid heat the remains of organic substances such as highly bituminous coals or shales. We know that coal has been produced by plant life, so, when we extract petroleum from it, we naturally look to organic matter as its ultimate source. Nevertheless, petroleum occurs in many geological formations where organic life has only sparsely existed. If petroleum be a result of a slow distillation of organic matter, where are the residues of distillation? They are never found in the borings for wells. Nor does petroleum when examined by the microscope exhibit the least traces of organized structures.

The range of geological formations in which petroleum is found is considerable. In the Caspian Sea it is found in tertiary sands, having a comparatively modern origin in a geological sense. But, in Canada, it occurs as low down as the Silurian formation and in the lower parts of the Devonian, while in Pennsylvania it is in the upper series of the Devonian below the coal measures. An elementary knowledge of geology shows that these facts render it difficult to connect petroleum with pre-existing organic deposits. Ordinary rocks result from the waste of pre-existing systems, or are pushed up by volcanic energy from central depths. Neptune's could not explain the formation of petroleum by aqueous action, for it is so light that it would float on the top of water, and would not be buried by deposit. Vulcanists of the old school would be equally perplexed, because petroleum is so volatile that heat would convert it into vapour, and it would be dissipated. Indeed, I recollect an instance of this kind in a quarry near Dysart, in Fife-shire, where every fragment of stone freshly broken smelt of petroleum.

Is then petroleum cosmic? Perhaps the question is not so absurd as it appears. Recent observations on the tail of the great comet which adorned the heavens not long since showed that it contained hydrocarbons very similar to petroleum. I do not mean to indicate that the comet was a huge petroleum lamp rushing through space, still the detection of hydrocarbons in it is a significant fact. It lends considerable support to the idea that petroleum is being continually formed anew in the deeper parts of the earth. In all petroleum wells water is also found. In the depths of the earth there is probably a large abundance of compounds of the metals with carbon, for we find them in basaltic and other rocks. When the crust of the earth becomes fissured, water would reach these at a high temperature, and be decomposed its oxygen passing over to the metals, while the carbon and hydrogen would unite to produce hydrocarbons, the most common form of which is petroleum. The gaseous hydrocarbons formed by the same action, are pent up in these cavities, and, when a boring is made for a well, force up the petroleum frequently to high fountains. Wells of this substance are generally found at the base of mountain ranges as of the Alleghenies in America, or of the Caucasus in Russia. These elevations indicate cravities, fissures, or crevices below, and into these, as into a receiver, the hydrocarbons may have been distilled and become condensed. This is only a theory, but it is the one which is the most satisfactory to my mind, and if it be true, it is a comforting one, for while we find forests disappearing from the earth, and coal being exhausted without being replaced, petroleum, which as fuel has about twice the value of coal, is being constantly formed and deposited in nature's reservoirs. I have admitted that this is nothing more than a theory, and as such, the practical mind is accustomed to look upon it with contempt. But theories are the leaves of the tree of knowledge, nourishing it while they survive, and even when they fall they give new nutriment to the parent stem. We probably may soon have a better theory, and when it comes I will embrace it.

If I am asked to define petroleum, I should have to answer by giving a general chemical formula which, at first sight, might look puzzling. It belongs to the series of hydrocarbons, $C^x H^{x+2}$, or to a group of bodies containing double the atoms of hydrogen to those of carbon, with two more of hydrogen in addition. It contains rather more hydrogen than olefant gas the chief illuminating agent of coal gas, for that and its numerous congeners have the general formula $C^x H^{2x}$. I believe need of such a general formula as I have given for the complex fluid called petroleum is manifest when I state that it contains members of the same family as hydrocarbons, varying from the solid paraffine, with which all ordinary candles are now made, to the most volatile liquids nearly resembling gases. Here I cannot help interpolating an anecdote as to how paraffine candles were thought of. This solid wax from tar had been discovered by Reichenbach, but was so rare when I first became Professor of Chemistry that I was proud in having a quarter of an ounce in a bottle ■ show my students. One cold day Mr. Young called upon me with some Derbyshire petroleum, and asked me what I thought the solid crystals floating in it could be. I answered that they must be paraffine, and asked whether he could not prepare sufficient for me to make two candles. With these I lighted the desk on the lecture table of the Royal Institution, and pointed out that though the cost of these candles was more than twenty shillings each, yet before long they would become the common candle of the country. This wise prophecy has long since been realised, for paraffine is now manufactured in thousands of tons annually. There is an island on the eastern side of the Cape in Sea called Ichaboe, where the very cliffs are stated to be composed of crude paraffine, or "orokait," while east of Kias novodsk, on the same shore, "there are immense hills of orokait and petroleum," according to the statements of travellers. In crinoidite between the solid paraffine and burning oil there is another oil fitted for lubricating machinery. In some kinds of petroleum and paraffine oil distilled from shale this is neither important in quantity or in quality, though in the heavier kinds of petroleum, such as that of the Caucasus range, it exists in abundance. Besides this lubricating oil, there is also in the tar, at present barbarously rejected as useless, volatile benzole and certain solids known as naphthalene and anthracene. From the benzole can be made those beautiful aniline colours known as mauve and magenta, while out of the solid naphthalene and anthracene can be prepared alizarin, the red colour of madder, and also indigo, the staple blue dye. In the future development of the native petroleum industry these higher products are likely to be a very important branch of production. As competition becomes keen, these waste products may become the largest source of profit.

Thus, it will be seen how largely petroleum has become an article of industrial necessity, and how much more it will enter into manufacture when the present waste products of the heavier kinds are applied, as they are sure to be, to the preparation of staple colours, such as alizarin and indigo. Already the madder agriculture of Holland and Turkey has been seriously influenced by artificial alizarin, and, before many years, our Indian fields of indigo will suffer by that famous blue dye being made out of the products of the heavier kinds of petroleum. For the present, however, the great consumption of petroleum, whether it is found naturally, or made artificially, is in Scotland, by the distillation of bituminous shale, is for the production of light. I have explained already that though it contains a little more hydrogen than oil-gas, it is, for all practical purposes, be viewed as essentially belonging to the group of "oil-gas." Now, as oil-gas is the chief illuminating ingredient of such coal-gas, refined petroleum, as well as solid paraffine, made into candles, may be looked upon as representative of all that is illuminating in coal-gas, without being diluted or contaminated by unnecessary ingredients. A paraffine candle is in reality a portable gas machine. The twisted fibres of the wick are the tubes in which the gas is manufactured for use, just in proportion as it is wanted. A petroleum lamp is the same little gas factory, in which the oil is sucked up by the capillary attraction of the wick, and there is converted into gas just in proportion to its requirements. Unluckily ordinary refined petroleum has an offensive smell, though this is gradually disappearing as the manufacture improves. In the better varieties, now burned in good houses under the name of crystal or water oil, there is little to be desired in this respect.

In America, where the abundance of petroleum leads to considerable inventiveness in its use, I have seen applications of it which have not apparently been adopted in this country. I happened, this autumn, to visit various large houses in country districts of New England, which were lighted with beautiful white gas. On inquiring into the sources of supply, I found there was no gas in the ordinary sense, but that common air saturated with a light petroleum naphtha was being burned. A tank containing the latter was buried in the garden, while a small machine in the basement of the house, worked by falling weights, drove common air through this tank. The air, saturated with naphtha, returned from the garden to the house and burned in every room exactly like gas. Again, I stayed some weeks in a seaside watering-place called Nahant. The town, to all appearances, was well lighted with gas.

And so it was, but the gas was manufactured at each lamp. A small holder of light petroleum dropped its contents on a heated disc which converted it into gas, and this was burned, and had all the appearance of ordinary gas illumination. In fact, it was only a few days before I felt that I found out the absence of ordinary gas from the town, though I constantly passed the street lamps. This adaptability of petroleum to use as a pure white light is the cause of its singularly rapid diffusion in different countries. The prejudices of the people in India are rapidly giving way, so that the consumption of petroleum in our Indian possessions has been increasing about 200 per cent annually. In China its consumption is also rapidly increasing. Of American petroleum alone India last year consumed 94,000 tons. In 1896, 6,000 tons, and China 83,000 tons. As American oil is thus penetrating so extensively and rapidly into the rest of Asia, as well as into the European markets, it would appear to be beyond competition. Nevertheless, a formidable competition is arising in Russia. On the shores of the Caspian there are vast deposits of petroleum, and these though they have scarcely yet been opened, already amount to one sixth of the American production. The old proverb was "It is a far cry to London" and it is a much farther cry to the shores of the Caspian Sea. But if the ruler will look at the map he will see that a railway just opened between Baku on the Caspian, and London through the Black Sea, alters the geographical situation exceedingly. Baku is the centre of the Russian petroleum industry. The oil-bearing strata stretch from Baku, past the island of Ichikien 300 miles across the Caspian, through the great steppes of Turkestan, until it is lost close to the Himalayas. The bottom of the Caspian must contain much oil for myriads of years, even in that sea, and may be held by throwing a match upon the water where oil is seen floating. Baku is situated on the Apsheron peninsula with an area of 1,200 square miles, through out which there are oil-bearing strata, but as yet only three square miles have been worked. The accounts of this district given by O'Donnovan in his wonderful tale to Mrs. de Merv, by Mr. Marvin, Colonel Stewart, Mr. Arthur Arnold, and others, have made the district famous to all. Without getting so much information there, singular discoveries of formations of petroleum 300 feet high, within themselves into petroleum lakes, it is sufficient to know that there are 400 wells of oil in the small explored area Around it the hamlet of Baku has become a city of 30,000 inhabitants. The price of petroleum at these wells is less than that of water. The crude oil has been selling at 4d per barrel of 40 gallons. Still all this resource of petroleum is worthless if it cannot be purified cheaply and be transported economically. This difficulty has been solved by the ability and energy of Mr. Ludwig Nobel a practical chemist. He is of Swedish extraction, and has become the Russian oil king. Mr. Nobel has built steam fleets entirely for the quick transport of the finished oil, and these steam fleets are propelled by the refuse of the distillation. The refined oil goes by pipes to the end of a jetty, and is pumped directly into the holds. These ships, when they reach harbour pump the petroleum into specially constructed railway vans or tank-cars twenty-five of which form a train. When this arrives at its destination, the petroleum is again pumped out into distributing tanks of which there are many of various capacities throughout Russia. In this way American petroleum has been driven out of Russia, while Caucasian petroleum has taken its place. This would not affect the rest of Europe greatly, were it not that the Russian oil king is thereby pouring petroleum through the Bosphorus into Germany, and he is preparing to flood the Mediterranean and India through the Black Sea, by the railway connecting Baku with Constantinople, or to transport generally the Caspian with the Black Sea. If these ventures have a commercial success, there is, undoubtedly, petroleum in the Caucasus and lands sufficient to supply the world with that commodity for a prolonged period of its history. Already, the different parts of Russia, both seaboard and inland, are driven by burning the waste of petroleum under the boilers. It will certainly be a marvel, but one which may be before long realized, to see a petroleum fleet laden with oil from the Caspian oil pass through the Suez Canal without the aid of a coal fleet. This would be an immense gain to the sailors who have a bad time in the Red Sea out of the hottest parts of the world; for petroleum vapours require no stoking to their fuel. For my self, I should like to see such a keel in navigation of India through the Suez Canal in a peaceful industrial competition. If a trade of this kind could be established with good profit, a welcome invasion by the Hunnias would be an absurdity, for peaceful commerce with Russia would tend more to the security of our Indian Empire than all our diplomatic watchfulness in Central Asia.

EXPLORATIONS IN GREENLAND.

SECOND PAPER

Going to School

a photograph by Dr. Riis

THE distance intervening between the end of the fiord that we visited and the "inland ice" was likely to cause some trouble in the transport of our baggage, and as the natives spoke of a place to the south where the ice came right down to the sea, it seemed best to inspect it before determining to start in the other direction. With this object we again left the colony in the old whale boat on the morning of June 24th, 1867, and made for the small settlement of Claushavn, by passing through an enormous stream of icebergs, which were at that time coming out of the Jakobshavn ice fiord, the party consisting of my interpreter and another European, with five Greenlanders from Jakobshavn.

We quitted the whale boat at Claushavn and took a small umiak, on account of weight, as our route proved to go overland by a pass between some of the neighbouring hills. Five extra men came to assist, and presently transported the umiak in the manner shown in the illustration in the first paper. At the summit of our pass the boat was paddled round a small freshwater lake, which on June 25th was still mostly covered with ice ten inches thick. Then came another portage, down a steep little col, and finally our craft was launched upon a large backwater arm of the great Jakobshavn fiord, which led up to the inland ice. The sea, smooth as glass, was bordered by sheer precipices of a pleasant rose colour, and the vistas in almost all directions were terminated by glittering pinnacles of brilliant ice. For scenery this was a most enticing neighbourhood, though useless as a starting point for the interior. On ascending hills on the outskirts I again had extensive views to the east, finding the land, as before, absolutely covered by glaciers. From the nearest parts ■ the farthest distance that could be seen the whole of the ice was broken up into seracs. It was almost everywhere riven and fissured in a most extreme manner, and it was obviously totally impracticable for sledges. We therefore determined ■ try to get inland from the direction of the first excursion, and made our way back as quickly as possible to Jakobshavn, arriving there after an absence of four days. On this occasion my points of view must have commanded almost the exact line taken by Professor Nordenskiöld in 1870, for, as given in his map, its distance ■ the south of my stations was barely thirty miles.

Our troubles commenced ■ we were ■ turning. One of our crew became ill, and could neither drink schnapps nor eat seal meat—a convincing proof that he was not shamming—and he had to ■ assisted ashore when we arrived ■ Jakobshavn. He died two days later. On landing we found that the sickness to which I have already referred when speaking of Egedesminde had spread northwards, and had now a firm hold at other colonies. At Jakobshavn there were nearly sixty ill out of a total population of three hundred, and before long the doctor had a hundred patients on his hands, all of whom sent for him though none would follow his advice. The sickness was something like an epidemic of inflammation of the lungs, and alike carried off young and old. Two of our late crew died of it, then another lad whom I was employing and then the colony carpenter lost two of his children. It was a dismal time for us for the coffins were made directly under our windows, and corpses, sewn up in canvas, mummy-fashion, with projecting feet, were brought by boat and over the rocks to them. The church bell tolled duly just over our heads, and the muttering of the priest as he went through the services for the dead were distinctly heard through the cracks in the boards. Progress for a time was completely paralyzed.

It was not yet been said that we intended to travel over the inland ice with dog-sledges. Before leaving England I had resolved to employ this method, because it was currently reported that the interior was covered with snow, and because dog-sledging affords the readiest and most expeditious manner of getting over good snow. Every one knows that for sledge-travelling the article called pemmican is much resorted to, though all are not aware that there are various descriptions of pemmican, of widely different characters. For example, the pemmican supplied to our Government Arctic expeditions has been a luxurious viand, compounded out of the choicest meat, curants, and various other eatables. It has been specially prepared with great care in Government establishments, and its cost price has, I believe, amounted to half-a-crown a pound. I had neither the opportunity nor the means for purchasing this sumptuous article, and had to content myself with a much humbler material, namely, Hudson Bay pemmican. By the kind assistance of Dr John Rae I imported about 400 lbs. of this from Hudson Bay in 1866. It was sent over in massive slabs, weighing 50 to 60 lbs. a piece, covered with hide. No ordinary knives would make the least impression upon these solid masses, and they had to be sawn up before they could be subdivided and eaten. As an article of diet a little of it went a long way—not so much from its nutritious qualities as from the invincible repugnance of my people. The nice sight of it was sufficient to appease the cravings of hunger. In appearance it was an interesting combination of coarse fat, dried buffalo meat, and a large percentage of sinew. Speaking for myself I should call it a very satisfying diet, though unsatisfactory to persons with bad teeth, but as a large proportion of it was intended for the sledge dogs, and we could select the choicer morsels for ourselves, it seemed sufficiently good for our purpose, until it was found that the Greenland dogs turned up their noses at it and refused to eat it, and then the matter began to look serious. But they would eat it ultimately, when nothing else could be had, I did not doubt, yet it would not do to commence by starving them, and so we were forced to collect a stock of dried seal fish, which is then established and favourite food.

It happened, just then, that this was easier said than done. The Greenlanders are at all times careful not to try in a stock of food beforehand, and the qajaqs, by procrastination, many of the most skilful catchers, had almost caused a famine. At length, after scouring the country, the requisite four or five hundred weights were collected, and it was put for safety into our store—the church-loft. Unfortunately the weather was hot, and remained there too long and became maggoty, and the worms from above fell through the cracks in the ceiling on to the congregation below, and the matter was a great outcry. The meat was peremptorily ordered to be removed, and we had no sooner thrown it outside than the dogs of the place swarmed down upon it. There was a little, in which the dogs were worsted, but then the children, exceedingly hungry, came down upon it like locusts, and were worse than the dogs.

It was a slow business collecting the teams of dogs. The dogs, diverse which broke out some years before the most northern of the settlements had gradually worked southwards, and had well-nigh annihilated the teams at Jacobshavn. The dogs prowling about were casual animals, remnants of teams, which would not work together. The diverse had not penetrated farther south, and at Clavshavn, Christianshavn, and other places there were numerous teams, which were well appreciated by their owners, who would not sell them outright on any terms, as in winter they are extremely valuable, and not easily replaced. At last, after much negotiation, I obtained the loan of three teams (amounting to twenty dogs) from Clavshavn, upon the condition that they were not to be landed in the infected districts, except on islands, and taken anywhere except on the ice, or, if circumstances forced us to come to land, the dogs were to be slain at my cost.

After the dogs, the sledges were the matter which gave most concern. By the advice of my interpreter, who had lived for several years at various settlements, wood was brought out from Europe to be made into sledges in Greenland, and we now found that the only persons in the country who were capable of making sledges had their time fully occupied by the manufacture of collars, so we were forced to employ the sledges ordinarily used in the country, which were made of very indifferent wood, and were not fitted for the rough work to which they were afterwards put. A representation of one of those which were actually used is given at the end of the first paper. The two long side-pieces, known technically as "rimacs," are cut from ordinary inch deal plank, and are shod with hoop-iron. The cross-pieces, which form the platform on which the goods are stowed, are cut out of seven eighth-inch plank and are attached to the runners by hide-thongs which pass through holes, these fastenings being bound round and round until they are quite tant, though not so perfectly equal as to prevent a certain amount of lateral play. The two arms at the end are used partly as a sort of rudder, and partly for assisting the skilge over difficult places, and we also bound down like the rest. It is clear that such a skilge is not ill adapted for travelling over snow or any reasonably smooth surface, and obvious that the runners are liable to be twisted either inwards or outwards if they have to pass over numerous inequalities. After repeated twists the runners very commonly split longitudinally, and the skilge, of course, is rendered useless until the fractures can be repaired in some fashion. With these crude affairs, so inferior to the admirable sledges which have been produced by Sir Leopold McClintock for our Arctic expeditions, we had, perforce, to be content.

In the month of July all these various matters were arranged, and we started in a couple of boats, one mainly filled by the dogs, and the other with the big game. The party for the ice consisted of three drivers and sledgers, and two others, besides myself. In addition natives also came to assist. The occupants of the boat with the dogs enjoyed a very lively time, for our teams were mostly composed of fine, powerful animals, as large as small mastiffs, and they one and all did their best to worry each other or their keepers. Arrived at the end of the herd, there was the business of disposition, our chief to the edge of the ice, which occupied the whole party a couple of days. This done, our adventurous Greenlanders went home in one of the boats, leaving us heavily laden as they moved off, leaving us encumbered, waiting for a favourable change in the weather, which had become very windy just as all was ready.

Three days passed in waiting, encamped against some overhanging rocks, the sleds heavily loaded and drawn up in line on the margin of the ice and the teams picketed round about. During this time we had not a dull moment. There was perpetual music and dancing going on—our anumb friends performing the music, and keeping us in constant attendance dancing round them. After a few seconds of dead silence, several of them would lift up their voices and howl, and when the echoes returned from the neighbouring cliffs the whole pick-upped scold with sudden madness, jumping to their feet, and dashing to the full extent of their tether, moaning, growling, and gnashing their teeth, struggling to get away to attack the imaginary enemies by whom they seemed to be mocked. Finding their efforts futile, the majority would back off and have a pitched battle amongst themselves, worrying each other with paws and teeth so intricately as to compel the intervention of the whip, jumping and rolling over, twining and tangling their lines into almost imextricable knots, whilst the minority cunningly took the opportunity to gnaw their fastenings and bolt away.

During these days I climbed up an adjacent hill, little expecting what was to be seen. Just a few months of fine weather and almost perpetual day had elapsed since I had looked on the view before. On the previous occasion, it will be remembered, everything to the east was covered with a mantle of the purest, most spotless snow quite unfettered, except in the immediate foreground. The whole of this snow had been swept away, and had left exposed a veritable ocean of ice, broken up by millins of crevasses of every conceivable form and dimensions, otherwise the prospect was uniform—a boundless waste, without a rock, or sign of life, anywhere visible. The numerous depressions in the snow had now become great lakes upon the ice, in the smaller of which stood out as the crests of frozen waves. For the most part the crevasses were small and the hummocks between them only a few feet high, and upon the whole, the general character of the ice was pretty much that presented by the middle parts of the Akasia glacier, or the Mer de Glace at Chamonix towards the end of the summer. That is to say, it was well nigh impracticable for travel with dog sledges, though not for journeying on foot, and it was immediately apparent that our hopes would be wrecked.

It would not do to discourage the people prematurely, so I kept my opinions to myself, and, when the weather improved, we made a start towards the east. In a few hours, within a couple of miles, we were brought to a stand, with a runner of one of the largest sledges broken in half, with another, belonging to a smaller sledge, also split along its entire length, and with the rest weakened by the battering they received. As a matter of form, I sent three of the party ahead for a mile or two to see whether they thought the ice became easier, though knowing very well that it was all alike for many miles, and, when they came back, reporting that it was worse rather than better, we commenced our retreat, as it was evident that

NOTE: certainly the former would split sooner or later, so of course sleds were prepared for such occasions.

GOOD WORDS

persevere would be only to render our return more and more difficult, and that under any circumstances we should at the most be able to proceed merely a few miles further towards the interior. We could only take one dog back in our boat, eight more were recovered afterwards, three were found dead, one was not discovered, and the seven others came in overland one after another to Jakobshavn and were killed by order of the principal official of the northern districts.

From the repeated views of the interior which had been seen from the coast mountains, it was clear that all this part of Greenland, except the fringe of land on the Davis Straits side, was absolutely covered by snow and ice, and that the interior was not broken up in those latitudes as I had conjectured it might be. This to some extent mitigated the vexation at the collapse of the sledges for their assumed little to be gained by traveling over a barren waste, and it appeared better, anyhow as a preliminary to continue its inspection by ascending the hills on the outskirts. I followed out this idea in 1872, but, before proceeding to refer to the journey made in that year, I propose to offer a few observations upon the general features of the "inland ice."

This vast glacier is the largest continuous mass of ice at present known. All the glaciers of the Alps combined are as nothing to it, and the greatest of those in the Himalayas are mere dwarfs in comparison. At Jakobshavn, the bergs floating away were often 700 to 800 feet thick, and this is the only information at present possessed of its depth. The angle at which its surface rises towards the east is very slight, being seldom so much as 8°, and generally much less, while in some places there are considerable depressions, and lakes are formed in consequence.

The crevasses as a rule do not go to the bottom of the mass, and often do not penetrate as much as half way through. Hence the water which is produced on the surface, and which streams along in small rivulets—sometimes even in small torrents—cannot find its way to the glacier bed and run away underneath. The motion of the ice is therefore but little assisted by water finding its way to the floor of the glacier, and it follows that the torrents flowing from underneath the margin of the inland ice are remarkably small, considering the enormous extent of the mass, the perpetual day which exists in the summer, and the high mean temperature.

Although the motion of the inland ice is less assisted by water finding its way to the bed of the glacier than is the case with most glaciers in lower latitudes, it receives a powerful impulse in other ways. The water which has been melted in the crevasses freezes in the winter, and produces blue bands or veins of solid or true ice, which present a marked contrast to the imperfect, porous, white ice of the glacier. The pressure exerted both when the crevasses are filled with water in a liquid state, and when it is in the act of freezing must be enormous and the surrounding ice will be urged in the direction of least resistance, namely downwards.

These strongly marked blue veins, in the otherwise white glacier ice, are a common

V. 20 of Solid Ice in an Iceberg feature in the icebergs of the Arctic regions, and they have frequently been referred to by voyagers, who have not, I believe, hitherto pointed out their significance. The outline above is from a sketch made some in an iceberg at Jikohshavn. From the manner of their formation, I will readily be understood that they are ordinarily more or less perpendicular in an iceberg just floating away, but they are frequently inclined at various angles, and are often seen intersecting each other, both when one is upon the surface of the inland ice and in the clear, vertical sections which are exposed when icebergs are just detached from the parent mass. Sometimes several banks can be seen cutting each other in the manner shown in the annexed diagram—showing that the glacier has been given in different places on different occasions, and that fresh series of crevasses have been formed at angles different to the former ones. They present the clearest evidence that the water which collects in the crevasses (mainly during the period of all but perpetual dry) often freezes subsequently into solid ice, and it would appear, from examples which I have seen that the congelation is not always complete, and that it sometimes commences from the top and sometimes from the bottom. They can be seen in various stages—the crevasses filled with water, and partially congealed, and entirely frozen.

It has been stated that the inland ice was fissured by innumerable crevasses, and it was to me an extent that I have not observed elsewhere. There was not as much as a piece fifty feet square without its chasms, and they presented evidence which showed that the ice movements were extraordinarily complicated. It is usual to see in the glaciers of the Alps and of other mountain ranges, sets or series of crevasses following each other with a certain amount of regularity. Scarcely anything of this kind was seen in the inland ice of Greenland. Contrary to my expectations, instead of there being only schrams or great crevasses in moderate numbers, the very opposite was the case—the fissures were comparatively small and in enormous numbers. They extended up to the extreme limits of vision, and the far off horizon when viewed through a powerful glass glittered with the broken surfaces of the pinnacles, though the distance was much too great to distinguish individual chasms. It will be admitted by all those who are conversant with glaciers that, as the ice was crevassed up to the extreme visible point, it was reasonable to conclude that the country was covered with ice or snow to a considerable distance beyond our horizon for such a vast body of glacier requires an enormous snow reservoir for its production.

The interesting questions then arise what was the extreme distance visible? and what was its height? The ordinary method which are employed for measuring distances at altitudes were inapplicable in this case as there were no fixed points which could be identified from two different stations and when the lunette was covered with snow it was impossible to say whether the extreme distance was ten or a hundred miles away. When the snow was swept away, and the crevassed ice became visible, it was possible to form some (though admittedly a very imperfect) idea of distance by turning from the unknown to the known. In the west, at a known distance of sixty or seventy miles, we could see the glacier plateau on the top of the large island of Disco crevassed like the inland ice to our east. Turning then to the east it was apparent that the horizon there was at least as far away, and was probably much more distant.

This still leaves the question of altitude untouched though, respecting it, it was possible to form a fairly probable estimate of the surface of the ice rose towards the interior at a small and tolerably regular angle. In June 1867 we started at the edge of the ice from a height of 550 feet above the sea, and in the distance of six miles rose 900 feet or about 150 feet per mile. Assuming that we could see a distance of sixty miles, and that the angle remained constant the height of the extreme visible point would have been about 9000 feet; but, considering the probability that the slope eased towards the summit, it was deemed safer to estimate the height at not less than 8000 feet.

In 1872 I again went out in one of the ships of the Royal Greenland Trade, and this time travelled without Europeans, and with a boat of a rather novel description—a screw propelled canoe which was driven by slides worked by the feet. In 1867 we had often been embarrassed by the reluctance of the natives to go where and when we wanted, and our choice lay between paddling our own kayaks (the canoes), at considerable risk of drowning ourselves, or between being rowed about in a whale boat by natives, for whom it was necessary to wait until they were in the mood to travel. I took out the screw propeller to render myself less dependent on their whims, and it answered the purpose very well, and also proved a great treat to the natives, who are fond of novelties as any children. They clustered around like a swarm of bees, and criticized it freely. "So like a kayak, and yet not one!" They patted it and stroked it as you would a dog. "No, clearly not seal-skin; it is made of wood!" How strange to make a kayak of wood! They pointed to the open hatch, so large compared with theirs, and shook their heads, as if they disapproved it. "A rudder, too! when was that known before? and a queer turning thing"—(the fan) "before it. How very droll!" At this they would burst into loud fits of laughter, for the slightest thing raises their merriment. Presently we had trials of speed, and they beat me hollow, as I expected, and indeed wished, for they would not have accompanied me unless sure that they could escape when they liked. They are timidity itself, and it is easy, by a mere accidental blow or shrug, to raise their fears and cause them to desert.

My chief native assistants this year were named Frederick and Nils. The former was recommended as an interpreter, and he came to be used before he was engaged. "So, Frederick," I said, "they say you can speak English." "Yes," he replied modestly, "me speak 'em smally." "Well, what do you speak?" "Oh!" said he, "me speak ice, no, by-and-by, silly come up, never mind; pull away, this way, that way, stop a little." To tell the truth, his knowledge of English was scarcely greater than mine of the Greenlandic dialect, but he was the only interpreter whilst travelling, and we made ourselves understood sufficiently well, which was due, it should be said, very much to the kindly disposition of the natives, who do not mock and ridicule a stranger for his inability to speak their language, and, on the contrary, take much trouble to understand his wishes.

After a tedious voyage round Disco Island, I was landed with my two natives and two boats at Noursoak, a small settlement which is about 130 miles north-west of Jakobshavn,⁴ and, having engaged a sufficient number of people, we made various small journeys round about, and down the Waigat Strait, ascending several mountains on Disco Island, and on the mainland, in search of some lofty and isolated summit which should give a commanding view of the interior. But although the mountains on both sides of the strait were considerably loftier than those in the neighbourhood of Jakobshavn, they were not sufficiently elevated for the purpose, and we ultimately went north of Noursoak round into the Umenak Fiord, which is bordered by the most considerable mountains at present known in Greenland. I crossed the Waigat Strait in the Expedient (the name of the screw-propeller), in company with an umiak, and in returning, when getting into a fog, delighted my attendants by showing them how truly the little boat could be steered by compass when they were bewildered. Their shyness was overcome, and we generally travelled afterwards in one and the same boat, they towing the Expedient astern.

The inland ice cannot be seen from the settlement of Umenak, which is situated on a small island about five miles from the mainland, in one of the largest fiords on the West Greenland coast, having numerous branches and ramifications, which are almost everywhere surrounded by mountains 5,000 to 7,000 feet high, some bearing glaciers streaming from their summits right down to the sea. To gain a view of the inland ice, it is necessary to mount to a considerable elevation, as the nearest point of it in this latitude is some forty miles away, and the intervening distance is occupied by mountainous country, and it was all important to select a summit which, by overlooking the others, should have an unimpeded view to the east. Intuitively I picked out one on the mainland, called Kelertungout, which was well isolated, and apparently lofty, intending to measure it, and to get a theodolite to the top to sweep the horizon, for in this way a better notion of the height of the inland-ice could be obtained than by any other method, and we left Umenak on August 17, with several additional natives, in a whale-boat lent by an amiable young man of the name of Kilberg, assistant trader at the settlement, who also volunteered his services.

A six miles' row brought us to the base of Kelertungout, where we encamped. The mountain was of volcanic origin, and was ultimately found to be composed of volcanic rocks right up to its summit. The seaward face was far too difficult for my party, and the next morning, at 2.30 A.M., we went inland for some miles, continually ascending, until we got round to its southern side. At that part there were immense slopes of ba-salutic debris, piled up to the maximum angle at which they would repose, apparently affording a simple route, and we steered a course over them, finding, however, that it would be easy to start an avalanche. The ship inclines, continually rolling round, cut up the skin soles of the natives' boots, and one footore man after another lagged behind and disappeared. Then came some walls of columnar basalt, interrupting the slopes, and again a few more were brought to a halt. At last I was reduced to the better of the theodolite stand, and finally, when arrived on the summit, I found myself alone.

⁴ I worked towards the north in preference to the south, because Nordenskiöld had, in 1879, made his journey to the south of my present district, and had found only an ice-covered interior. It does not appear from his narrative that he ascended any of the hills on the outskirts. He seems to have viewed the interior from the inland-ice itself, consequently could not have had a very extensive prospect so far as he did see, the interior was, in general features, precisely the same as I have described it.

EDWARD IRVING.

WHEN Carlyle came to London "prospecting" some time in 1824, I think, Irving was almost the only man there to whom he could look for any help towards that literary life which was, ever more and more clearly, becoming his appointed lot. Nor did he look to him in vain. The Kirk in Hatton Garden was still the haunt of the fashionable world, but its minister did not hang about Belsham's drawing rooms, nor did he take his cynical friend—"the injured peasant"—into those quatuors which would have done him no sort of good. But he introduced him to David Montague, to Charles Lamb, to Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and other men of letters, speaking of him warmly as one who was sure to take his place among the foremost of them soon. He had entire belief in his friend's genius, and, indeed, all his relation to Carlyle is very beautiful, generous, and full of noble admiration.

But that somewhat bitter philosopher took his own measure of those celebrities to whom he was now introduced, and was not very careful to spue the down on their wings, and leave their glory unimpaired. Nor was he without thermal forebodings as to Irving's own position, but had always a wet blanket handy to cool his friend's enthusiasm. Popular preachers were never much in favour with him, and indeed, not having yet won popularity for himself, it was rather against any one, preacher or writer, if he had gained the ear of the multitude. Especially he thought he had no belief in the fashionable world, or the kind of religion it might run after, though he rather changed his tone, in later years, when that same world was hanging on his own lips. So he became very anxious about Irving, as to what might be the end of these things, and what might come of the preacher if the fashion should change, as it was apt to do among that fickle part of the human race. Even thus early, he thought of his friend as one who was living on the breath of popular favour, and likely to spend his strength in grasping at it, and to sink to the bottom if it failed him. Nor was this idea shaken off when he finally left Cranputtock, and settled down to his own grim battle in Chelsea, though, by that time, the tide of fashion had ebbed away from Hatton Garden, and returned to its own natural channels. What might not Irving do to whistle back the fine ladies to his pews? As yet he was tolerably sober-minded, but he will be driven to arts, and tricks, and novelties, like other popular preachers, and end in mere chaos and mud. Nay, are there not already clear signs that he is taking to those shallow artifices—signs which, by and by, grow so threatening that one must, as a friend, warn him that he is rushing down to perdition? Who could stand quietly by, and see this really fine and lovable soul wrecking himself for the sake of that lightest of social froth which glitters on the top of the wave? So he discharged his conscience, one day, to Irving who took it in prudent silence as the rebuke of a friend, which is wiser, on good authority, to be "a pleasant ointment." Yet I fancy him mainly silent, because rather at a loss to know why Carlyle should use this peculiar ointment on him. Such was the view which the philosopher took of the preacher, and there was a hollowness in it which one does not look for in the man who claimed to have a special insight into the nobler kind of minds. But, indeed, spite of the eloquent and touching memorial—the wreath of immortalities—which Carlyle laid on his friend's grave, it is only too clear, from the Reminiscences, that no did no more justice to him than he did. Wordsworth, Coleridge, or Charles Lamb.

To my mind, Carlyle's estimate of the motive which led to those changes in Irving's teaching, which we have now to notice, is as inadequate as it is ungenerous. Before he came to London, Irving had thought a good deal about the question, How should the gospel be preached so that all sorts of men may be willing to listen? That question he had solved to the satisfaction of many, and especially of the trustees of his chapel, who had now built a bigger one for him. But no true man—and

Irving was a true man—can long be contented with merely thronging pews, and a full offertory, and the sweet incense that floats at the pulpit as well as about the altar. That word, "To get souls for his hire," really has a meaning for such an one, and Irving began truly to feel that, with all those listening throngs, he was not getting his proper wage. The souls were there, plenty of them, but they flowed through his church like water, much of it not over clean, and to no perceptible extent made any cleaner by coming there. This was anything but satisfactory; and instead of asking himself, as Carlyle fancied, "What shall I do to keep my Dukes and Duchesses still, or ■ whistle them back when they go after singing men and women?" the question Irving really put was, "What shall I do to save them and others while I have them in hand? That was what I was sent here for, not merely to gather a crowd, which any one may do by staring long enough at a chimney pot, but to persuade them to repent, because the kingdom of heaven ■ at hand."

This naturally led him away from his old line of thought, How he ought to preach, to the other and more vital one, What had he to preach, which was at all likely to bring about this result? And now his real theological studies began, his training in the Edinburgh Divinity Hall having been the merest pretence. Most clergymen, if they are ever to be of any real use to men's souls, come, sooner or later, to a point where they have to revise the teaching of the schools, and adjust it, if possible, to the results of their own experience. Irving had now reached that critical stage, driven to it by the simple fact that, while he had filled his church, he did not feel as if he were materially helping to fill the kingdom of heaven. Had he been content simply to pour forth eloquent periods of religious commonplace, he might have lived and died as one of the most "shining lights" the Scottish Kirk ever had in London. But he was impelled to do work of a deeper kind, and hence all the trouble and sorrow of his after days.

When we read the controversies of the earlier centuries of Church history, they leave an impression that Christians in those years concerned themselves about a very different set of ideas from those which chiefly occupy us to-day. Their wit was very subtle, and their vocabularies rather vehement, but it is the subjects they handled which are unfamiliar to us, viz. the doctrine of the Trinity, and the constitution of the person of Christ. We treat these matters now as things that were thrashed out long ago, and what of good grain was in them is supposed ■ be safely housed in the creeds and confessions, which few care to read. But, ■ first, the battle of faith raged passionately round them, for men felt that here lay the very citadel of Christian power and of spiritual life. Latterly, however, these questions had fallen into the background, especially among the Puritan or Evangelical party. They formed, of course, a recognised part of orthodox belief, but they were regarded chiefly as giving value and efficacy to a Transaction on which the saving power of the gospel was thought entirely to hinge. That is to say, the centre of faith had been transferred from the person of Christ to the Atonement which He made. There was an infinite worth in His offering, because it was the sacrifice of an infinite Person, but the sacrifice itself was the radical element.

When Irving first went up ■ London he was, like all the Evangelical school, full of this transaction for adjusting the balance between the divine righteousness and the divine mercy. But now, as he began to be dissatisfied with the spiritual results of his teaching, he was led to hark back to the earlier forms of Christian thought. How far he may have been led to this by Coleridge, it is hard now to say. But it is certain that he was a frequent visitor at Mr. Gilman's house in Highgate, where the post bags had found a haven of rest for his aching body and somewhat discursive mind. It is also certain that Coleridge was then working, or at least groping, among the same kind of ideas, as we see in his "Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit." The precise doctrine which is associated with the name of Irving does not seem ■ have originated with the author of "Christabel." But we know that he had turned away from the Puritan theology of covenants and business-like transactions, and sought the solution of the question in the nature of God himself. Had Irving been satisfied with this, he could hardly have been seriously blamed by any one. To change the centre of religious thought from faith ■ an atoning sacrifice ■ faith in an atoning person, might involve grave changes along the whole line of action, but it could hardly have been seriously objected to, as it was only going back ■ the primitive Christian idea. But Irving was a theologian of the antique type whose flowing rhetoric was always dominated by the logic of the case. If God had redeemed men not by paying the price of their transgression, ■ the Puritan held, but by taking our nature into communion with His own, that He might sanctify it; as the early fathers taught, then it followed that the human nature which was thus to be redeemed must be the human nature which needed to be redeemed. It was not Adam's original, unfallen nature, then, that Christ assumed, but his nature after it had fallen, for it was that alone which required to be saved. Jesus was, indeed, altogether sinless in thought and desire as well as in act, but not in virtue of the inherent innocence of his manhood, only because of the Holy Spirit which dwelt in Him. It was essential to the very idea of a redeeming man that He should take our present nature with all its wrong propensities, and its liability to temptation of all kinds, and yet that He should keep it holy and undefiled. In maintaining this position, Irving may have spoken unguardedly at times, I think he did. It is very difficult to expatiate on a potential sinfulness which never becomes real sin without saying things which may be readily misunderstood. But there was no question with him as to the absolute holiness of Christ, the dispute was entirely as to the origin of that holiness, whether it was inherent in His flesh, or the result of divine grace. Hence some, who thought themselves wise, treated it as a mere logo machy which none but clergymen would ever have quarrelled about. That was evidently Carlyle's opinion, with a bias, on the whole, in favour of his friend, but he speaks of it as one to whom it was a matter of perfect indifference. Superficially, it does seem to be of little moment, since all were agreed as to the main fact of our Lord's sinlessness, and only differed as to the precise cause of it. Yet viewed in its deeper relations, it involved, as we have seen, a radical change in the whole line of Christian thought, and the substitution of the Incarnation for the Atonement as the central truth of Christian theology, and faith in an atoning Person instead of an atoning action.

EDWARD IRVING.

From an Engraving in the Vestry of Regent Square Church, London.

The discourses in which this view was first given strongly commended themselves to many of his hearers, and seemed to produce higher spiritual results than his former teaching had done. This was what he had been longing for, and he accepted it as the will of God confirming the word which He spoke. He forgot that almost any flesh view of religious doctrine, be it right or wrong, has, for a time at least, more apparent effect than old familiar forms. He forgot, too, that when a preacher is thinking rather of his matter than his manner, his words have a power which does not belong to mere rhetoric. But his heart was yearning for something more than admiring crowds, and this new stir about higher concerns appeared to be a strong confirmation of the doctrine which he taught. Ere long, however, the cloud, like a man's hand, and a very dirty one too, showed itself above the far horizon. A mean fellow of the name of Cole—one of those clerics who have a keen scent for heresy, and a blunt sense of honour—intruded into his privacy one evening when he was wearied with a hard day's preaching, and questioned him as to what he had been saying. Irving, good, simple soul, instead of resenting the impertinence, gave him what explanations he could, and invited him to his house for fuller conference on the morrow. That morrow, however, was otherwise occupied by his "interviewer." It was spent in writing and getting printed a grave charge against Irving, that he taught a monstrous doctrine of "the sinfulness of Christ." One can fancy the result among those who already distrusted him—the "I told you so," and "It is only what I expected," and all the head shaking of jealous dulness. Ere long, too, there rose no small ferment in the watchful orthodoxy of the Scottish Kirk. But as yet it seemed as if no action could be taken, for when the Presbytery of London began to move in the matter, Irving and his trustees, who were at one with him on this point, declined their jurisdiction. According to the title deeds of the new Regent Square church, its minister was always to be subject only to the authorities of the Church of Scotland, which had no ecclesiastical power across the English border. The London Presbytery, therefore, had for the present to give way, but they did so with the feeling that it was purely a question of time, and that Irving and his session would be at their bar by and by. Before leaving this point, I may note here that Mrs. Olphant is highly indignant with Chalmers, that he, though urgently, even pathetically entreated by his old assistant, did not, as professor and recognised authority in such cases, pronounce any opinion as to the validity of Irving's teaching. Mrs. Olphant's long residence in England must have led her strangely to forget how little weight the opinion of a theological professor would have had with the stormy democracy of the Scottish Kirk. Besides, Chalmers was no divine of the Athanasian type. He was a strong man, but not given to nice and subtle questions. It is no disparagement of him to say that he could not, with any wisdom, have pronounced upon a doctrine which, with his make of mind, he could hardly understand. It lay quite out of his line, and had he meddled with it he would have done no good to living and I would very probably have brought trouble on his own head about a matter in which he felt no living interest.

So far, then, the storm seemed to have passed by, and perhaps if living could have stopped just where he was, no more might have been heard of it. The fire might have burnt itself out in pamphlets, and magazine articles, and occasional reports in pressy tracts. But when one has got a certain impetus on him it is not easy to stop especially if one is alone, as living now was. Being a man of large outlooks, then, he could not confine his thoughts to his own sphere and be satisfied to do his duty there. Possibly, too, he had his disappointments and his encouragements even among those who had been influenced by his new teaching. Anyhow even though all the crowds that still thronged his church were to repent and mend their ways, what were they compared to that vast London "where Satan had his seat"? And London, too, was but a trifling part of the ocean of human life, which was everywhere in a very troubled state at this time. A new French revolution seemed to be brewing, from a deleterious mixture of scepticism and radicalism, and what power was there to counteract or guide it? Of all men then in Britain living was perhaps the one least fitted to deal with practical politics. He did not know men, nor history, nor economics, and moreover, he was blinded by the intellectual theories of the "Constitution Book." Yet he must not only meddle with the thing he understood not, but he must needs approach it in the very worst way to set any competent person of it: that is to say, not by careful study of facts and principles, but by the interpretation of supposed prophetic symbols. Anxious to join living these, and sorely troubled about Catholic emigrations and extended franchise, and repeal of Test and Corporation Acts, and the general break up of class and sectarian legislation he began to ask himself, What if, after all, the gospel were a kind of future? What if the Church were only an interlude, never really meant to save the world, but only to maintain a testimony, and give a few out of the world? Revolution was at hand but what if instead of a new French revolution, it might be a new Christian dispensation that was coming, with Christ Himself as visible King over the nations, "restoring all things" which now seemed going to pieces, and drifting away into space?

While he was in this mood he was laid hold of by a man who wanted just such an one as he to interpret his thoughts to the world. Hatley Lere was one of those small but intense minds who, being once seized with an idea, have a singular power to work out details so as to fit into their form, one conclusion. Having assured himself then, that Christ was to return to the earth, and reign like other kings there by force not by persuasion, and regarding the Books of Daniel and Revelation as history written before hand in a series of hieroglyphics, he thought that he had found the key to the hieroglyphic—the Rosetta stone of sacred mysteries—and that all their secrets were now made plain. Under the guidance then, of Hatley Lere, and of clever, shrewd witty Henry Drummond who combined in a really remarkable way, the thorough man of the world and the die-hard saint, living now plunged into the study of that poetic imagery which they took to be prophetic history. Henceforth Albany conferences began to play an important part in his life and his preaching, and not so much in view of the saving of souls as to show that Christ was soon coming, to do that work Himself. He did not pretend to fix the date exactly. He was not so precise as those who can tell you, at any particular hour what particular verse of the Apocalypse is being fulfilled. But he lived in constant expectation of the coming of the bridegroom, and was quite fascinated by the way in which Lere and Drummond had laid the veil and interpreted and horns and earthquakes and falling stars and mythological beasts like the men on a chess board, through whom they played the great game of human history. When he came to Edinburgh during the sessions of the next General Assembly, and gathered vast crowds to hear him at six o'clock in the morning, it was the gospel of Daniel and the Apocalypse he preached, rather than the gospel of Christ. Despairing of the present, he looked for a new heaven and a new earth, from which Whigs and Radicals should have vanished like the moles and bats, and because he really believed this, he persuaded a good many others to believe along with him. Indeed this is the only part of his teaching, which is not from the Catholic Apostolic Church, has still a faint hold on some of his fellow countrymen. It is a faint hold, indeed, and duly growing more so, is one bubble interpretation bursts after another. Men are even beginning there to think that those mystic symbols were only contemporaneous men and events and had nothing at all to do with the future. Anyhow, for the present millennium doctrines are a discount and there is not a man living who could bring Edinburgh folk from their beds at six o'clock in the morning, to hear him discourse about the woman and the beast and the frog. WALTER C. SMITH

LIFE AND WORK AMONG THE EAST-LONDON POOR.

By MR RIV HARRY JONES M.A., PREBENDARY OF ST PAULS, LATE RICHMOND OF ST GEORGE'S IN THE EAST.

INDIFFERENCE I find is really the source of the greatest social curses wherein. Improvidence is another form of it which quickly brings misery to the poor and thus they are much relieved for it especially by the rich. Many of the working classes are excellent economists, and all in their own way, but as want of thrift tells utterly upon them every evening want of it is intolerable. This tells in evil forms. First here is the sickward of the Christy Organisation Society, which was the thirteenth without money. I was chairman of an excellent committee, dealing with a population of about 60,000 for several years, indeed, all after I came to be rector of St George's, and as I call its manifold procedure to mind I feel my head and heart pulling different ways. I was the sorrowful mouthpiece of tribulation to processions of thoughtless sufferers. First, I always tried to speak with such cheer as could be tolerated, but it was unworkable work. My colleagues were kind, but all along I felt that the Society had not an inch of bowels and lived upon mistrust. It has an unhappy name, calculated to stir up a low conception of the charity "which believeth all things, charity, or love resents rebelling and investigation. Of course it is easy to say that the greatest kindness you could do to a sinner is to show him the fruit of his errors, but probably he often sees, and always feels, them more clearly than the amateur rescuer of his brethren. Thus the kindness shown him might sometimes take a more mitigated shape than it assumes under the Society's rule. The right fixation of these requires divine delicacy and consideration. In fact, a central charity organization council ought to consist of angels and archangels. That in London does not small blame to them.

No doubt we often directed the thus of philanthropic economists wisely, gave heaps of good advice, and applied tests with shrewdness, but it was a presumptuous self-abasing business at the best and I often felt it to be a poor barrier against, or controller of, any exceptional flood of destitution. Still we moved on severely righteous lines as far as we could and our committee room was the scene of some curiously saddening revelations. Its monotony and also severity was relieved by occasional examples of sustenance. I find which I am happy to say decided several of us, sharp though we tried to be. There was one highly educated native in London, a doctor especially who thus acceded for months together. He shared it with some of our committee. I followed George Eliot's words sent back a skin he found in the pocket of a wastecost I had given him, and was at all points a finished article. It was cut us to perceive how the threads of impatience and distrust we spun over the world were centred in London, like telegraphic wires.

There is one form in which thirst is being well encouraged, and which in time will go far to revolutionise the feeling of the rich poor. I refer to Provident Dispensaries. They are slowly being appreciated, and spread. In respect to existing London Hospitals though all justly admire the surgical aid there given and the treatment of those who fill their beds, I often wonder at the faith which brings an out-patient to their doors. She—it is mostly a woman—waits perhaps for hours in a sickly queue in procession, has a hasty glimpse of a doctor and then walks off with a quart bottle of unwholesome physic, stoppered with a greasy cork. Poor people believe in "nasty" medicine, forgetting that naves were given not merely to adorn profiles, but to warn their owners against drowsiness, and draughts. The best physic is abstinence or good food, as the case may be, and whatever drugs are taken the fath of most out-patient is a chief factor in the cure, whenever that is reached. All the best and most experienced physicians, however, would gladly see the "out" work of hospitals radically reformed. While the hospital, especially in the case of accidents, does much ■ relieve distress legitimately, there is a mass of it ■ which we look aghast. It is most importunately pressing perhaps in the East of London, not because its individual cases of misery are worse than they are else where, nor because the needy beg there, but because there are so many of them. Where tens of thousands of people who all live from hand to mouth, and move on the thinnest social ice, are congregated together, the total number of sufferers, of those who have crossed the line from wages to want, or broken through into the cold water, ■ sometimes overwhelming. What shall we do that these may be fed? Stern suspension of out door relief, however it might ultimately compel more thrift—if people consented to be thus patiently taught—will not fill empty bellies now. In-door relief may deter, but degrades. Distant semi political schemes for the cultivation of waste land are cheered by crowds who do not know a shuile from a draining tile. Local benevolence does something, with its soup and tickets. The help which the poor give to the poor does more. Radical legislation will probably do most. Meanwhile we hear much of State ruled emigration. But assuming that a man is worth twice as much in the colonies as he is here, and that he is willing to go there—the only obstacle to his transportation being want of money—I cannot understand why a "National Emigration Company" ■ not started. There must surely be some machinery for the recovery of capital with good interest lent to emigrants. Financial interchange ■ incessant. Every needy respectable man, sure of good work and wages elsewhere, should be able to command means for getting there without being tarred with the "charity" brush. The money for his passage should be paid by the company on his arrival in the colony, where he might be looked sharply after. I believe a good trade might thus be as surely driven in emigrants as in timber. Of course, such emigration would specially leave more of the stupid and helpless at home, since none but the keenly enterprising would fit. But even when the feeble failures are helped out of this country by charity, they are little or none the better for the aid. Trans mare curram, and are feeble still. And that won't pay in a colony. I remember, when I first set foot into Canada from the United States some years ago, the first man I met was a carpenter. And he begged. He touched his cap, grumbled, and asked for a shilling. A company wholly devoid of sentiment, but prepared ■ carry honest labourers to their task and get ■ good dividend out of them, would, I believe, do the work needed as far as the work needs ■ be done.

Beside such means for the bettering of poor town dwellers as are provided in their removal to another atmosphere and scene, or in the erection of good houses for their shelter in the place where they have lived, much may be done by improving the air which they breathe and the things which they see. Take this last point first. We are profoundly, though often unconsciously, affected by our material surroundings. Thus, refinement may be kindled or prohibited, and thus, too, a vehicle is provided for the import of fresh and sweeter thoughts. Some, there fore, seek to raise and cheer toiling spirits by exhibitions of painting, and the like. I do not believe in the elevating influence of a picture where pagan amours are prominently framed, or shepherdesses—if there be any such pastoral office its—idly defy on canvas the tanning of the sun and wind. But as true decoration is divine, and art which is really fine promotes culture, selected displays of it have been made in some of the lowest and most crowded parts of East London, notably Whitechapel, by my old neighbour and friend, Mr. Barnett, of St. Jude's, and some of the impressions made on surtables which seemed to be coarse have been pathetically cheering. In the furtherance of influences thus imparted, concerts and oratorios have been given, window gardening has been helped, and wholesomely pleasing prints are supplied for dreary walls in schoolrooms and private dwellings. In this desire to spread decorative refinement, the Kyrle Society has been conspicuous. But, perhaps, the chief present feature of this movement may be seen in the adorning of "open spaces," such as old burial grounds. By the planting of these, and their nice equipment with arbours and seats, out door summer drawing rooms, as it were, may be provided for whole rows of poor stuffy houses which have no nooks of repose within, nor outlook, except on dust and grut. This fashion ■ horticultural furniture has grown, and ■ yearly growing stronger, whereat I rejoice. The first old churchyard thus helped towards embellishment by the Metropolitan Board of Works was, ■ believe, ours at St. George's-in-the-East. It had been closed since the Intemural Interments Act of 1851, and none but the Home Secretary could give leave for a burial there.

The process of converting it into a "recreation ground" was approached and conducted slowly, for we had no real precedent to go by. Two days were consumed in court before we could get our "faculty." But the parish, represented in Vestry, showed great public spirit and generosity. We asked for no outside help, except a loan ■ be gradually discharged, though the business cost some £5,000. This great outlay was partly caused by the purchase of a Wesleyan burial ground which adjoined our own. Herein arrived a curious effect of the present Church establishment. As rector, I was chairman of the Vestry and an official purchaser of land required for our purposes. Thus, one morning, I found myself the owner of—I think it was four hundred and seventy—dead Nonconformists. I gave instructions for the placing of a notice on the chapel door, begging any friends of the deceased to remove their monuments, if they felt so disposed. But none did. I may here say that in marking the division between so-called "consecrated" and "unconsecrated" ground, we came on the solution of a difficulty which might serve as a guide ■ others. There was a huge middle wall of partition between the two plots, thick, lofty, capped with glass, and cautiously patrolled by cats. This we pulled down. Then the Judge of the Consistory Court, who heard the application for our faculty, came to inspect. His sentence was, "You must have a line drawn between the two burial grounds. It may be a thin iron fence, but there must be some line of demarcation between the two, however slight." "How would Euclid's line do?" I ventured to ask his Honour. The notion took him, and a stone ■ set there now saying that the dividing wall went so many yards in such and such a direction from that spot. Thus we triumphed, and the lawn mower chatters without a break over the old fence between the groups of dead who were carried respectively out of the church and chapel. Though now brought and kept together closer than ever, they have had no differences ■ all.

Our "Recreation Ground" is a great success. Skilled gardeners have been hired, a hothouse built, and a succession of flowers has been yearly bedded out through the summer. Women bring their work and sit sewing out of doors, while their children play around their knees. Old and sick people, who are so many, sun themselves on the benches. This garden opens into the Ratcliff Highway, and one of the most pleasant retrospects of my sojourn there will be my work with fellow parishioners in realising the long talked of conversion of our churchyard into a "Recreation Ground." But it was an up hill business at first, and the mess made in its construction was ghastly. We had to dig foundations for several things, and there were bones. At last, however, order grew out of disorder.

Happily the action for the conversion of burial grounds into public flower gardens is now well set up and may be expected to grow. The worth of a beautified spot in the midst of repellent surroundings ■ not easily calculated, but ■ is great, and may be made far greater than many ■ first imagine, for it is not the open spaces only which are valued, but their decorations. An unfinished room is not inviting. Indeed, however water tight, it is an accepted symbol of penury. Pains are thus being taken not merely to save old plots from being built over, but to adorn and equip them as beautifully and comfortably as possible. When this is combined with downright commercial usefulness it might seem to commend itself most forcibly. But it is not always so.

In speaking of such improvements as these it must be remembered that one great standing demand has always to be met, though all the open spaces in London were duly preserved and furnished, and that is the demand for good air. It is of small use to "take the air" when it ■ tainted. Breathe it the Londoner must, whether it be good or bad. And the air which, literally, always kills the oak cannot be good. It ■ rather hard on the air which is corrupted by evil communications, but the result is mischievous. We all know that smoke is the chief offender, and that a zealous society is established for and exercised in its abatement. No doubt much of the mischief carried by the air comes from the domestic grate, which ■ not constructed to burn anthracite coal nor to consume its own smoke. But the tall chimney of the manufactory is the greatest sinner, and the hardest to be reached, conspicuous though it be. The fact is that a Public Prosecutor is wanted who shall have no bowels what ever for any neighbourhood, who shall not be attached to it, as a police constable is, but be ready to assail a "smoker" without loss of time or respect of persons. As it is, the suppression of this mischievous nuisance is left to local action, and no man likes to bear witness—however true—against his neighbour, much less against an industrious one. Again and again when I have been in the chair of the Vestry at St. George's, and complaint has arisen about the volumes of smoke from some huge neighbouring chimney, I have heard some such remarks as "Well, I'm glad to find that So-and-so is at work again," or "I don't like to see the pipe of a ratepayer put out." This is natural, and I, for one, had not, in some instances, courage enough to make official complaints about a downpour of smuts. Of course I was a coward; but then most men are social cowards. Heartless public prosecutors, specially told off for the purpose, would have small difficulty in compelling obedience to the law. The offences are such as certainly cannot be committed in secret.

In thinking about the sanitary condition of poor East Londoners I admit that, in some respects, they are better off than many who live in favoured country places. They are, e.g., provided with fever and small-pox hospitals to which a dangerous sufferer may be at once removed with assurance of skilled care. The defiant stupidity of some people is, however, almost incredible, and I have seen it at its worst among town-dwellers who are supposed to be more intelligent than rustics. Not only will a gaping crowd close sympathetically around the departing infected patient, but if he or she should be a child, I have known it to be even kissed. What is to be done with or for such kindly fools? We thought that we did what we could. Divers of us, according to the proportion of our faith and knowledge, were always preaching caution. Our sanitary officers were both intelligent and assiduous. We had systematic house-to-house visitations or hunts for infectious diseases. Printed directions were widely distributed. The excellent East-London Nursing Society, which aims at providing every parish with a thoroughly trained nurse, worked well in the spreading of sanitary knowledge—not only telling but showing people what to do. The teachers of the schools were wide awake to keep out children from infected houses, but marvellously blind and stubborn ignorance survived and survives. With all care, however, it is hard to stop contagion where the disease has such short distances to travel as in cities. Indeed, when such a malady as scarlet fever enters a poor crowded town district, the wonder is that, in spite of sedulous removals to the hospital, any escape. If the poison did not sometimes lose its power every family ought to be smitten in turn. As it is, some mystic influence seems occasionally to disarm it, and the plague dies down.

In speaking of material defects in the state of my East-London neighbours, I cannot omit reference to the scarcity of fish amongst them. Public attention is now being drawn to this. Better late than never. But it is certainly late. The very first thing, indeed, mentioned in the Old Testament about the condition of man on earth is, "Let them have dominion over the fish of the sea." That is the initial promise and assurance. Moreover, the most frequently repeated and recorded work of Christ in the New Testament is the feeding of multitudes with loaves and fishes. And yet in these days of Christian progress the multitude is, or has till quite lately been, unable to get them. I myself could not buy sixpennyworth of good sprats without sending nearly a mile for them, and there were many thousands of poor people in my immediate neighbourhood as ill off in this matter as I was. The worst of it was that few seemed to care. People could not be said to have lost their appetite for fish; they rather failed to have one. Yearsome "mus-sels," and little snicers of yellow, nauseous-looking "whelks," were no doubt sold at some stalls, grimy by day and glaring by night—though I never saw any special press of customers at them—and "fried-fish shops" sent a wonderfully penetrating smell through some close back streets; but good fresh fish was banished as a luxury above the means of our neighbours.

Of course accessible places could easily have been found for its landing and distribution. Shadwell, e.g., presented itself at a most convenient turn in the river. Some of the fish-laden ships might well have discharged their cargo there. But no, they all sailed or steamed by up to Billingsgate, with its crowded approaches and jealous "ring," which kept up an exclusive price of the article to be sold, so it was said. Chiefly encouraged by a hard-headed North Countryman, Mr. Willey—a great friend of mine—who lives in Ratcliff Highway, we persisted, by private complaint, public meeting, correspondence in the local press, and municipal remonstrance, in protesting against this iniquity. There was small doubt about our opponent. I shall not easily forget a protesting deputation which I accompanied, and which "waited upon" divers magnates at the Guildhall. There is a narrow pier which juts out into their room, about three feet wide. It is closed by the end by a sliding brass bar. Here the spokesman stands and addresses the assemblage. It was ruled that one only of the deputation should be allowed to open his mouth. I intended ■ have had my fling, but of course the business now fell into the hands of Mr. Ritchie, one of the Members for the Tower Hamlets, who headed us. I stood close behind him, holding his hat and umbrella, and looking irresistibly sympathetic, though ■ is a strong Conservative, and some of my friends are not content with calling me a Liberal. Anyhow, here we were radically agreed. Mr. Ritchie did his work with pluck and tact, but the angry facial and verbal waves were a sight to see and hear. I came away with a profound mental prayer for municipal reform, and with such a perception of the mischief which monopolies can effect as made me feel sure that this outcome of it at any rate could not long survive any public unveiling. The "loaves" have been freed, and the "fishes" are following suit.

In setting down these material reminiscences, while I recall some features of the commissariat of East London I must say that which many will hardly believe, viz. that there was an abundant supply of fair milk. The dweller in the fields, the peasant, frequently cannot get milk at all. It is the most perfect food, and more needed than any other in building up the frames of young children, and yet in many country parishes, with plenty of cows to be seen, the poor have so long been unable to get milk that they have almost lost their taste for it, and hardly know its value. It is all converted into butter and cheese for the large markets, or goes to towns in those tall tin vessels which display the survival of the fittest milk canner, and may be seen at almost any station. This is all the worse for country children, though better for such as live in towns. The poorest there can get fair milk. Indeed, I remember some, in an intensely crowded neighbourhood, which was so good that H.M. Inspector of Schools used to take a bottle of it away with him when he paid us his annual visit.

The minute distribution, however, of some food ■ needlessly costly to the poor. Too many take a bite out of it before it reaches the mouth. There are shops in unexpected ends and corners of slums and blind courts which might be supposed to exhibit the last sparks in the conflagration of expiring commerce. The returns of some of them, though the display in their windows is not great, are hardly so small as might be imagined. I think of those which sell "sweets." These last come cheap to the merchant, and are always dear to the child. I must here repeat the record of a discovery. One day I was crossing a sugar house in the docks and saw a dozen casks filled with the nasty scrapings of the floor, which was greasy with escaped molasses. "What are these for?" I asked. "Oh, they goes to make lollipops, sir," was the reply.

A not unfrequent form of request for assistance was that for capital, say 5s., to set up a "sweet stuff shop," and though I once made a careful calculation from trustworthy data, I am afraid to say what income this was supposed to be capable of producing. But, apart from these small fringes of luxury, the mode of distribution which has hitherto prevailed is very expensive to the consumer. Somehow, London working people have not apprehended the value of genuine co-operation. They have been like a heap of sand, in coherence as well as multitude, and have seldom made the most legitimate combination for the supply of their own necessities and the disposal of their produce. There ■ a change now. Some such action is set up which promises to grow. But the seed is small at present. Provincial towns have shown what can be done by co-operation, though the London millions have been slow to move.

It seems to me that they suffer from a careless spirit of acquiescence. They have made no great protests. The "Bitter Cry of Outcast London" we have heard so much of has come from those who have seen the suffering rather than from those who are feeling it. It would be more hopeful if they did intelligently cry. And then, as a shrewd friend said to me, they are not the "outcast," but rather such as "come in," who suffer most and cause most suffering. The steady influx from the provinces piles up the heap of human sand, and chokes the ranks of the local artisan. In the East this ■ most conspicuous, since the incompetent flock to the docks, which give some squalid employment. All the most shuffling gravitate there, many tramping in daily from a distance.

The question is often asked, What brings these crowds to London? The real reply which has been given by several, and advanced elsewhere by myself, I believe to ■ this. It is not so much their love for the place itself or hope of higher wages, as the independence and possible fixity or, at least, choice of tenure ■ be got there. Most come not because they like the town, but because they dislike the social and political position hitherto held by the labourer in the country. No wonder.

SONGS SENT SOUTH.

By M M M

MY Love, beside the Southern sea,
Of busy streets as fain to tne,
Up to those hills that shine on me
She stretches arms of vain desire

Tired of the billowy thunder made
When the sou'-wester calls so loud,
Tired of the glittering long Parade,
And all the changeful restless crowd

She sees the Grampians' heathery blue,
The snow fed river rushing by,
The Ochils, steeped in emerald hue,
Kinnoul, dark-stemmed against the sky,

And far above, the briar bush sweet,
That only passing airs betray
To lovers who, with tardy feet,
Are lingering on their homeward way

'Tis these she loves O constant hills!
I cannot all forsaken be Something of her from you distils,
Some of her heart you give to me

Chafed by these swaddling bands of fate,
'Tis ours to see, and not attain
The spirit oft but meets its mate
To drift apart, and lose again

One day stands out o'er other days
In vision as the "might have been"
The vision flies, the hard world strays,
And rears its wall of brass between

They two had climbed the mountain's brow
Higher than morning mists have built
Life seemed one endless wondrous "Now",
They were alone in all the earth.

Above them but the solemn blue
Whose hush of noon no motion stirred,
And as their hearts together grew
Between them was no need of word.

O that the soul on such fair height
Could linger! There 'twere good to dwell!
I transformed by something of that light
That first on love in Eden fell.

Soft western breezes o'er us creep,
Faint-sweet, from hills of whin in flower,
With strange sad cries the pee-wits sweep—
And now it is the sunset hour.

No words can tell that glow of gold,
Those tender mauves, those peaks fir-stained,
That pure translucence, heaven unrolled,
That when all else was past remained

Blue bells and primroses emboss
The turf, the little ferns scarce stir.

She laid her head upon the moss,
And let her soul go out from her

And thou wast there, poor heart! Thine own

Beats feared to break the silence through,
So darkly deep her eyes had grown,
So strong the spell her presence threw.

Her thoughts were far away from thee,
Yet by her side she let thee stay.
He who the shrine may never see
Will gladly watch its door all day.

The long June sun could hardly bear
To leave the North he loves so well
All night the soft glow hovered there
As of his swift return to tell

But now he hurries down the sky
Ere half the afternoon be o'er,
And bare and brown the hedgerows lie
Where roses blushed through green before.

Spring will return, but if she stays,
Who is the crown of Spring's delight,

Without her, what are lengthening days,
Or balmer softness of the nights?

And yet such hope is in the air,
Such stir of promise in the trees
The rooks glad tales are telling there,
And whispers come upon the breeze—

"The world's year has its June of mirth,
And time shall not ■ winter be,
God gives the flowers back ■ the earth,
And He will give thy Love to thee."

EARTH SHAKINGS, THEIR CAUSE AND WORK.

By RICHARD A. PROCTOR.

DURING the last half year we have had terrible evidence of the energy of those internal forces which indicate the inherent vitality of the earth. Destructive locally, significant of death rather than of life in their direct working, these forces tell us in reality that the time of our earth's decay and death is yet far off. Thousands, nay, hundreds of thousands of years must pass before the internal forces of the earth cease to model and remodel its surface, and so to keep it ■■■ be the abode of living creatures. When those forces die out—as in fulness of time they must—the beginning of the end will be at hand. Apart from catastrophic events which science sees no reason to apprehend, the earth will be fit, it would seem, ■■■ be inhabited by multitudinous forms of life, vegetable and animal, so long as any part of its solid crust remains above the level of the sea. But forces are continually at work which tend to reduce the amount of land surface. In periods far shorter than have elapsed since first the present crust was fashioned those forces would have wrought the destruction of every continent and of every island. As Sir John Herschel said, when as yet the full evidence of the long duration of the earth's past history had not been garnered—"Had the primeval world been constructed ■■■ it now exists, time enough has elapsed, and force enough directed to that end has been in activity, to have long ago destroyed every vestige of land."

■ ■■ considering the evidence of the earth's internal activity, it may be well briefly to inquire what probably ■■■ the state of things beneath the surface, and certain relations which must certainly exist.

The common idea about the parts of the earth's crust which lie deep below the visible surface is, that they are necessarily very firm and rigid. This idea is also commonly associated with the belief that inside the firm and rigid crust there may be a region of intensely hot, imprisoned gases, the material substance of the earth's interior being raised by heat ■■■ the vaporous form. One of the best reasoners of our time, and in some respects its foremost philosopher, has adopted this theory of an interior vaporous region, presumably ■■■ low density (seeing that even in experiments by which oxygen and hydrogen have been liquefied under pressure the density attained has never approached that of water), as the explanation of the low density of the giant planets.

It may ■■■ well to dwell, then, for a moment on the effect of internal pressure within even a solid globe of the earth's size, that we may see how far the frame ■■■ such a globe would be from a state of rigidity. The word rigidity must here be carefully distinguished from the word solidity. Rigidity is ordinarily, but not necessarily, a characteristic of solidity. And deep down below the surface of a solid globe as massive as the earth, rigidity ■■■ a quality which would be entirely absent. The common idea that under great pressure solid matter becomes more firm and unyielding, ■■■ erroneous. On the contrary, Tresca's experiments on the behaviour of hard steel under high pressure show that if our earth were made of a solid material as hard as steel, the substance of this solid globe at a depth of less than twenty miles would be absolutely plastic under the enormous pressure to which it would be subjected. With every mile of descent the pressure would increase, and ■■■ the centre it would attain its maximum amount. To many, indeed, this seems inconsistent with the fact that the force of gravity grows less and less as the centre of the earth is approached, until it vanishes there altogether. The pressures existing at different points within a globe like the earth, are not proportional to the force of gravity, but to the total weight of superincumbent matter. It is strange that when familiar experiences show this ■■■ be the case, the mistake should still be so often made of confounding gravity with pressure. Gravity at the bottom of the deep sea is almost exactly equal (but slightly less) to gravity at the surface, yet every one who has ever dived knows that the pressure of the water increases with every foot of descent. At great depths it becomes so enormous that hollow vessels made of strong materials are crushed by its action. The same principle must obviously hold true with the solid crust so soon as we pass below those depths at which the rigidity of the earth's substance suffices to resist the pressure resulting from the superincumbent mass. We see in lofty mountains, for example, how granite and other rock substances can resist the pressures due to heights of four, five, or six miles. There might, perhaps, ■■■ mountains ten miles in height—so great is the rigidity of some rocks.

But Tresca's experiments prove that a moon ¹tain twenty miles in height is simply an impossibility, because all the lower parts of such a mass would be plastic under the superincumbent weight. So must it be in the earth's interior. Instead of the crust being more and more rigid with every mile of descent, it must become more and more plastic, more and more ready to yield to changing directions or intensities of forces at work upon it.

Now if the earth's interior were exposed to no disturbing action, or to disturbing forces small by comparison with the pressures which produce the plasticity above described, there would be all but perfect stillness in the earth's interior (supposed for the moment to be wholly, or almost wholly, solid). The depths of the great sea are perfectly fluid, yet are they at almost perfect rest. But, within the depths of even an entirely solid earth like ours, forces are at work which are of the same order as those which make the solid frame, plastic throughout, all but a mere surface film of partially rigid structure. The forces exerted by sun and moon in raising tides on the ocean act energetically on every part of the earth's frame, and always with those variations of intensity which tend to produce displacements. The force of the moon, for instance, on the globe of the earth, being exerted on each part of the earth's interior in degree and direction corresponding to the position of that part, necessarily tends to deform the plastic interior, and with it the but partially rigid crust. The sun acts in like manner. The way in which the mighty globe of the earth is made to reel, in the long precessional period of 25,900 years, shows how effective are these influences. It is only because the very vastness of the pressures, producing internal plasticity, limits the range in the effective variation of pressures in direction and degree, that the deformations which would result in the case of an absolutely solid globe are comparatively slight, when the dimensions of the earth's globe, as a whole, are considered. But such deformations must be taken into account in any theoretical discussion of the earth's movements as a whole, or of the movements of her crust. Whatever view we take of the earth's interior, whether we admit or reject the possibility that large parts may be liquid or vaporous, we must always consider the external deforming forces on the globe of the earth, regarded as a whole.

Now what may be the actual condition of the earth's internal regions science has not yet been able to determine with certainty. Mr. Hopkins, from investigations of the precessional motion of the earth, inferred that the solid crust must be at least 800 miles thick. Sir W. Thomson, from the observed height of the water-tide, which of course would be affected if the solid globe were influenced by a tidal deformation, infers that the frame of the earth is as rigid as though the whole mass were of solid steel. Mr. O. Fisher, in his "Physics of the Earth's Crust," gives good reason for rejecting the idea of absolute solidity, for he shows that the irregularities of the surface of a solid globe cooling, would be much less than those which actually exist on the earth's surface. He infers from observed temperatures in Alpine travelling, that the solid crust is about twenty five miles thick, but the central portions he assumes may or rather must be solid, so that we have a central solid mass separated from a moderately thick crust by a shell of unknown thickness, chiefly liquid, but partly perhaps gaseous, despite the enormous pressure to which it is subjected. Mr Herbert Spencer's theory that the greater portion of the interior of our earth is gaseous, seems open to very serious objections to say the least, especially when we consider the indications of greatly increased density towards the centre.

But that the actual surface of the earth is in a state of continual movement is after all what chiefly concerns us in considering great subterranean disturbances. On this point there is no longer room for doubt. The pendulum researches of Professor G. Darwin—started with another purpose in view, viz to determine what change there may be in the action of terrestrial gravity—have shown that the whole crust of the earth is in a state of constant tremor. Whatever the actual condition of the interior regarded as a whole, there must be large regions partly liquid and partly vaporous, the crust above which undulates and vibrates continually under the varying forces to which it is exposed, communicating to more stable portions minor movements of undulation and vibration.

Apart of course from the action of external forces on the earth's mass, we must consider internal processes which are certainly taking place, let their interpretation be what it may.

It is clear that the waters of the earth play a very important part in disturbing the earth's interior. It is only necessary to note the distribution of active volcanoes and volcanic regions to see that this is so for with scarcely any exceptions (and those readily explained) the regions of active disturbance are near the sea shore. And again, while observation thus points to the sea as closely connected with subterranean disturbance, reasoning shows that the relation might have been expected.

The water which forms our seas and oceans, and their offspring lakes and rivers, is the most variable part of the earth's globe regarded as a whole. When the frame of the earth was intensely hot to its very surface the seas could have existed only in the form of a mighty atmosphere of steam, in which immense masses of cloud constantly floated. For water could not have rested on the fiery hot surface. But while in that early stage of the earth's history the material of the future ocean was outside the earth's crust and in an atmospheric form, there is good reason for believing, with Saemann, Le Meunier, Frankland, and Sterry Hunt, that in the remote future of the earth the waters of the sea will be withdrawn into her interior. The process of withdrawal is in reality taking place even now. Enter any cavern, such as Kent's Hole in Devonshire, on the driest and hottest day, or even after weeks of dry weather, and you shall find the roof wet with the waters which have been slowly making their way from the surface, where they fell in the form of rain months before. Throughout the whole crust of the earth, except in a few spots where rain never falls, the same process is going on all the time. Only a portion of the water, which thus falls on the earth, ever returns to the surface in the form of springs. Artesian wells show how slowly some of the strata of the earth permit water which has thus reached them to pass through, but they show also how large a portion of the earth's waters are already beneath the surface.

Of course the greater part of the water which reaches the surface in the form of rain is presently restored either to the sea in the form of river water, or to the air in the form of aqueous vapour. Were it otherwise a few years would show a measurable change in the sea level. It may well be that the amount actually withdrawn from the sea surface in this way, and not restored, does not produce a change of level of more than a foot in a thousand years. Still even that would involve a very important alteration in the aspect of the earth in such periods of time as belong to a planet's history. A million years would reduce the sea level by a thousand feet, and in a period of time, which cannot be reckoned long when compared with the vast periods of which the heavens and the earth speak to us, every trace of water would have disappeared from the surface of the earth.

However, we are not concerned with the question whether the seas, once outside the earth in the form of a steam atmosphere, will, while the earth is still a planet, pass wholly into its interior, as in the case of the moon they seem to have done. That the waters of the sea are slowly finding their way into the earth's interior is certain the rate at which they are so passing inwards is as yet entirely uncertain.

Now beneath the actual floor of the sea, and beneath the central regions of large continents (one should, perhaps, say beneath nearly the whole land surface of the earth), the process of withdrawal would usually take place quietly. From the laws of the conduction of heat we know that the thickness of comparatively cool crust beneath the sea must be very much greater than where there is no sea. The constant pressure of enormous masses of ice cold water (kept cold, be it noted, in the process of oceanic circulation) must have withdrawn heat from depths of the solid crust lying far down below the sea floor. Consequently the process of slow withdrawal, which is really taking place beneath the sea, usually causes little tendency to interior disturbance. It may even be that there is an almost exact balance between the two processes necessarily at work in those parts of the earth's crust which lie beneath the sea—the gradual loss of heat on the one hand, and the increase in the quantity of internal water. Were the water which is withdrawn in a thousand years beneath the sea, taken down at one movement to the regions of intense heat far below the sea-floor, and turned, as it would necessarily be, into superheated steam, there would, no doubt, arise great increase of pressure, and perhaps tremendous disturbance. But the region of great temperature must slowly descend, or in other words, the temperature at given depths below the sea must very gradually become lower and lower, and though the change may be exceedingly slow, it cannot be much slower than the indrawing of water below the sea floor.

Again, in parts of the earth's surface far from the sea, and, indeed, long by far the greater proportion of the range of coast, the quantity of water taken into the interior is so small that here again there must usually be a balanced action between the two processes. The cooling of the crust, gradually extending to greater and greater depths, and the indrawing of water, will be converted into steam when it has reached a sufficient depth.

But at certain parts of the coast line, the rate at which water finds its way towards the interior is too great to be thus always balanced by the effects of lowering temperature, or deepening of the layers of given average temperature.

In the first place there are much greater variations of pressure in the sea-coast than elsewhere, and though usually the crust beneath the sea shore may be able to withstand such changes, yet there may not be sufficient strength in certain places to prevent the occasional formation of openings through which water may find its way into the interior. Consider, for instance, the effect of the alternate inflow and outflow of water along a shore-line, the enormous added pressure when the waters rise, and the reduction of pressure when they sink again. This would not operate over a large region, when the whole of it is affected, as, for instance, the portion of the sea-floor that is always under water. But along a shore, a portion of the crust comes under the effect of this alternation of tidal pressure, while the neighbouring parts of the crust are not at all affected. Thus taking a strip of surface square to the shore-line, and one-half below one-half above the mean sea-level—at high tide, the portion of this strip of earth crust which lies seaward is subjected to much greater pressure than when the sea is at its mean level; at low tide it is subjected to much less pressure. It is clear that this constant variation of pressure on one half of the region must have a tendency to produce openings or cracks running parallel to the coast-line, and that though the strength of the crust might usually be able to withstand the effects of this constantly varying strain, there must be certain of the many thousands of miles of coast-line on the earth's surface, where the changes of strain would at times become too great to be resisted, and submarine fractures would issue.

Again, the action of wind on the sea must at times affect in a very marked degree the pressure on the crust of the earth near the coast. Add to this the circumstance that the coasts of islands and continents are regions of precipitation. There the moisture-laden air from the sea discharges relatively the largest portion of its moisture. When we consider further that along many parts of the shore the very shape of the coast line indicates the comparative weakness of the crust, which has yielded alike on one side to pressure from below thrusting it upwards above the sea-level, and on the other side to the pressure of the water forcing it down, and we can readily understand that along some parts of the coast-line the waters of the sea find readier and more rapid entrance than elsewhere. Moreover they find their way into regions where there is readier access for the internal heat. Throughout internal cavities of large extent and of varied structure, the water penetrates until it finds its way to regions so hot that it is turned into steam, at great pressure with the increase of this pressure, and probable increase of heat due to mechanical displacements, the resistance of the superincumbent crust is at length overcome, or else a way is forced for the escape of the imprisoned vapours through some neighbouring outlet.

Thus viewing the relation between subterranean disturbances and the sea we must somewhat modify the teleological interpretation which had been somewhat hastily assigned to the distribution of volcanic regions along shore lines. A modern writer has said that, "it would seem as if nature had provided against the inroads of the ocean by setting the earth's upheaving forces just where they were most wanted." It might as correctly be said that, Nature had so provided that the inroads of the ocean should occur just where the upheaving forces are prepared to resist them. But in reality the two conditions are related as cause and effect. Because the crust has yielded along particular lines, there lie the shores of the great deep, and there the sea waves beat upon the capes, headlands, and cliffs which mark where the crust of the earth gave way. It has been because of the weakness of that part of the surface that the sea makes inroads there, but the same weakness tends to render the regions thus encroached upon those also where the subterranean energies necessary to repel the attacks of the sea are most readily developed.

In the great disturbances, then, which have occurred during the past half year we see evidence of the progress of that continual contest between sea and land which will not cease so long as the earth's vitality remains. When the earth's internal forces no longer upheave the crust, life must soon cease to exist on the earth's surface. So long as the sun pours light and heat, and with them life, on the members of his family of worlds, wind and storm will rouse the sea to fresh attacks on the shore lines of continents and islands. Rest on either side can only come through the cessation either of solar action on the one hand or of earth action on the other.

We may see also in the terrible earth quakes in Ischia, the East Indies, and Asia Minor, evidences of the earth's repulsive forces rather than of destructive energies, though unfortunately the working of these restorative processes involves the loss of many lives. As Sir Charles Lyell has well pointed out, "The general tendency of subterranean movements when their effects are considered for a sufficient lapse of ages, is eminently beneficial and they constitute an essential part of that mechanism by which the integrity of the habitable surface is preserved. Why the working of this same machinery should be attended with so much evil ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ mystery far beyond the reach of our philosophy, and must probably remain so until we are permitted to investigate, not our planet alone and its inhabitants, but other parts of the moral and material universe with which they may be connected. Could our survey embrace other worlds, and the events, not of a few centuries only, but of periods as indefinite as those with which geology renders us familiar, some apparent contradictions might ■ reconciled, and some difficulties would doubtless be cleared up." But we can never hope to understand the mystery which lies at the back of all these mysteries. We see but part of the scheme of the universe, and may well believe that if we saw more, much that now perplexes us would seem clear, yet all that we can see must be but a small part of that which is. A few links here and there of the mechanism of the universe we may detect, and please ourselves with the thought of the aptness with which these, at least, seem adjusted to their purposes. But the parts we do not see, the parts we may never see, are as important as those we see, nay, being infinitely vaster, they are infinitely more important. Doubtless did we know all, we might say with knowledge what we can now only say through faith, that all which is, ■ well. The forces which to our short-sighted vision seem destructive are in reality preservative, and in the widest sense of the words the saying of the great Goethe ■ true, that "Everywhere diffused is Harmony unending."

JANET HAMILTON,

The Poetess of England

SCOTLAND is especially rich in instances of men who have risen from lowly and apparently unfavourable circumstances to influence, if not always to personal recognition, in the realm of poetry. Not to speak of so great a master as Burns, or even of Leyden, Hogg, or Tannahill, we have only to refer to the body of the older minstrelsy, and to the floating ballads and songs of the country known for many generations, ■ see how naturally the national soul expresses itself in verse, untutored, yet simple, melodious, and tender. The excellent collections of Mr. Grant Wilson and of Mr. Edwards of Brechin show how far back the spring of Scottish song took its rise, how well even now the flow of genuine poetic feeling and expression ■ sustained, and how little it has really depended on the accident of education and what might have been regarded as favouring circumstances. As was to be expected, the men who have thus risen ■ genuine poetic expression have been greatly more numerous than the women. The daily household toil, the motherly cares are exhausting, and against the chances of uneducated women rising above their circumstances. Our Scottish songstresses have, as a rule, been women of good social position and education, such as Lady Anne Burnard, Lady Grizel Bullie, Miss Elliot, Mrs. Cockburn, Lady Nairne, and others. But names of women of the humbler ranks are not wholly absent from the beaumont, and in these times it is to be added to ■ the honoured name of Janet Hamilton, who, without what is technically known as education, and in the face of daily toil and depressing circumstances, rose as naturally to the position of a genuine poetess, as an iron genius unpeels. I should not seek ■ place her in the very foremost rank of our Scottish bards, yet, in virtue of her pure spontaneous power, the force of assiduous self-culture, a fine sensibility for outward nature, and a noble human-heartedness, she has risen to the rank of a true and tender poetess, and added largely to the unparelleled treasure of our national song. Janet Hamilton is, indeed, one of the most striking instances of self-culture on record. Never at school, taught to read by her mother at home, but not able to write until she was fifty years of age, when she formed a peculiar caligraphy of her own, she yet shows a power of expression, a mastery of verse and of English prose, which might well be the envy of writers with the best opportunities of what is commonly called education.

Janet Thomson, afterwards Hamilton, was the daughter of a shoemaker, and was born in the clachan of Carhill, in the moorland parish of Shotts, in October, 1795. That district had been remarkable in the previous century for the fervour of its Covenanting spirit, and some of Janet's ancestors, both on the mother and father's side, had strongly shared this feeling. An especially touching and inspiring memory of one of her forebears had come down in the family. She was fifth in descent from John Whitelaw, farmer at Stand, near Monkland. He was Bothwell Brig, and, after the defeat of his party, swam the Clyde on his horse and escaped. After four years' hiding and privation on the moorland, he was taken, tied up under a horse, carried to Edinburgh, and there, before the old Tolbooth, suffered a martyr's death. Janet's maternal grandfather, William Brownlie, and her own mother, were deeply imbued with the spirit which had animated their Bothwell Brig ancestor. Hence the nature of Janet's home upbringing. Her mother was a woman of strong character, intense religious convictions of the old Scottish and Calvinistic type, and impressed with the duty of training up her family in strict accordance with her own views, especially in the matter of Church going and rigid Sabbath observance. She was, withal, a kindly, human-hearted woman, with a love of the old songs, ballads, and legendary lore of the country. Janet's warm and life-long affection for her shows how good a woman and mother she was. There are indications, however, that even at an early age the precocious and fervid Janet felt in her soul some mild revolt against the rigidity of her domestic training. Occasionally, on the Sabbath, during the long study of the Catechism, Watts' Divine Hymns, the Pilgrim's Progress, and kindred books, she would, as she tells us, cast a longing eye on the sunlight as it lay on the "kail yard," and its beds of marigold and tansy, and listen yearningly while "the lark was singing high in the heavens above the gowany lee."

■ ■ very creditable ■ her good sense and moderation of character that she was not driven to any extreme by the narrowness and rigidity of her early training, but retained through life the best part of it. Thus she showed in her reverence for all that was high-minded and pure, her ardent aspiration to help in improving the tone of feeling of the men and women of her own rank in life her passionate appeals, especially to the mothers of the land, as ■ the necessity of domestic teaching and example, and the unestimable value of a good mother in the working man's home.

Her father removed from Carhill to the town of Hamilton when Janet was between two and three years old. Early, when his child was seven, he settled in the village of Langloan, parish of Old Monkland. Here Janet passed the whole of her subsequent long life. Situated on the high road to Glasgow, Langloan was then a small and comparatively sequestered village, inhabited chiefly by hand-loom weavers, of whose character and habits Janet has given us much graphic portraiture. The country around was still natural moorland. It had not been dug all over for coal and iron, and made hideous by repulsive heaps of blackness—dross and slag. Hand-loom weaving had not given place to mining, and the people were of the simple, old-fashioned Scottish type. The Calder and its tributary, the Luggie, were still untouched streams. Janet as a girl was a great wanderer by the streams and on the moorland, the moment she got rid of her daily task of spinning, to which she had been set at nine years of age. Now she was unconsciously nursing the genius that was in her, educating herself in that loving observation of flower, and stream, and bird, which in later years burst forth in simple, truthful, beautiful song.—

I see my dear village—yet back in the sun
And the sweetest children that tumble and run
O'er the grassy—this isle of looms—and the way
Of the water, that oozed the summer day long.

Constantly and fondly does she recur to the scenes, limited ■ they were, of her youthful wanderings in the neighbourhood of the lowly village.—

"A lonely lock a mountain's room,
A well o' whins and heather
Where at whill was young Istrated,
The berries frae the gather
The bonnie flowers the gowans bloom,
O'er green the feathery bracken,
And the flower dear to my eye,
Laid I down them for aken."

Janet's education in the ordinary sense of the word was nothing. She seems never to have been at school. Her mother, however, taught her to read, and familiarised her mind with Bible stories, ere she was five years old. She did not learn to write, as has been said, until she was about fifty. At the age of eight she found a copy of "Paradise Lost," and one of Allan Ramsay's poems on an intelligent weaver's loom in the village, on "the breast beam," evidently lying beside him to be conned at intervals of leisure. These first touched and quickened her fancy. Then, with a perfect ardour for books, she seems to have exhausted her own and the neighbouring village libraries. She read Rollin, Plutarch's Lives, Ancient Universal History, Raynal's India, Pitscottie's Scotland, The Spectator Rambler, Fergusson's Burns, Mac Neil. All this time she was working first at the spinning wheel, throwing off her allotted task of two hanks of sale yarn a day, and afterwards at the tambour frame.

This precocious girl married very early, in her fourteenth year. The lad of her choice was her father's journeyman, John Hamilton, whom she describes as "a very respectable young man," and who proved an excellent husband, wondering, admiring and gentle towards a wife with a soul quite beyond him. She tells us, with honourable pride, that when they married their household plimishing was all paid for. Her husband had a Spanish dollar and on that and their two pair of hands they started in life, and through many battles and bustles managed always to keep the wolf from the door. Of the marriage there were ten children. Janet continued to work at the tambour frame, as she had done before marriage, attending at the same time to the education of her children. Between seventeen and nineteen years of age, she wrote, or rather dictated, some twenty pieces in rhyme of a religious character, but, curiously enough, from this date until she was about fifty-four she ceased to compose verses being all the while an assiduous reader. From fifty-four until her death at seventy-eight (October, 1873), she produced the very considerable amount of poetry and prose which she has left behind her. The best of her writings are to be found in the memorial volume, entitled, "Poems, Essays, and Sketches," by Janet Hamilton. Glasgow, 1880.

It was not until after her marriage that she became acquainted with Shakespeare. This was the opening of a new world to her. But she had read him stealthily. In her rank in Scotland at the time, Shakespeare was somewhat in the Index Expurgatorius of popular judgment. But "I was drawn to him," she tells us, "as if by a special instinct." She read him by snatches as she held her child in her arms, or rocked it in the cradle, and when a neighbour chanced to look in on her, she quietly put the "profane author" in a hole of the wall, conveniently near at hand. Thus "special instinct" of which she speaks, is the key to the whole of what is called self-education. There is a preparedness in a likeness of soul which enables a man or woman to profit, through assimilation, with the best authors. Without this, no profit of any true or quickening kind is ever got. Janet Hamilton thus drew from this "well of English undefiled," drew both diction and grammatical form. The influence is seen in the purity of her style, the strength and simplicity of her Saxon words, which fitted so well with her excellent vernacular Scottish sprung from a common source. It is seen further in the almost uniform absence not only in her verse, but in her prose, of that stilted and pedantic verbalism, from which self-taught writers, even such as Burns and Hogg, are seldom free.

The other influence which served to mould Janet's early mental life was that which has been at work on every characteristically national Scottish poet—the ballad lore of the country. In her youth the printed ballads were much more numerous and common than now, and many of the more ancient ones which Scott was only gathering together, were widespread on the memories of the older people of the pastoral and upland districts of the south of Scotland. Janet's grandmother knew them well, knew also the old weird world stories and legends, and she would recite the ballad or tell the story to Janet and the group of youngsters seated entranced round her spinning wheel of an evening.

The special strain of pathos in Janet Hamilton's poems has a distinct trace of that of the older ballads. It is direct from the life, is as simply put as the simple fact, with just that touch which idealises it for all time. And the weird element in her verse, which is not so common as other features, may be seen to run back to the same origin.

"Scotland's spinning wheel!" she exclaims—"speaking of thee, a thousand tender emotions stir my heart. Not a tale of green coated faires, do matted browns, witches, 'as' wits black, white, and grey, but is associated in my mind with memories of the spinning wheel and the white hure! venerable spinner, from whose legendary story I had drew my ideal treasures of the spirit land."

The pieces in verse in the memorial volume are far from being of equal merit. Some of them do not rise beyond mediocrity, others, especially when they are the echo of reading, or in any way imitative, are too full of general epithets, and thus indistinct in picturing. But when she sings of what she sees in the moorland, in the glen, by the stream, or of disappointed love and broken hope in the humble world she lived in, she shows pure feeling for nature, an unborn, genuine love, fine selective delineation, and a pathos which flows direct from the heart to the heart. The various pieces on the Calder and on October illustrate her power of dealing with natural scenery, and "Conan Bell" and "Effie" are among the best of her delineations, unadorned yet powerful, of simple yet touching sorrow, while a "Lay of the Tambour Frame" shows her sympathy with struggling poverty, and burning denunciation of social wrong.

In the verses entitled "The Lowly Song of a Lowly Bard," she has struck the key-note of her life and poetry.

'We are lowly, very lowly,
Low the bird and I
Why thou my dear fellow,
Lowly thou I dwell among

From my lowly home of childhood
I saw sweet you as Till my drooping lids grow heavy
With the weight of tender love

Low in station low in life,
Low in all that worldlings prize,
Till the voice of
'Come up hither'
To a mansion in the skies

From that lowly cot the sacred
Moss from earth's low care and want,
From that lowly couch my mother
To her home in heaven went

In that cot so lone and lowly (Childhood's hand might reach the thatch),
God was felt, and o'er the dwelling
Angel eyes kept loving watch—

Lowly heart, and lowly bearing,
Heaven and earth will best approve
Jesus! Thou wert weak and lowly,
Low on earth, but Lord above

Yet not low my aspirations,
High and strong my soul's desire,
To assist my toiling brothers
Upward, onwards, to aspire

Upward to the heaven above us,
Onward in the march of man,

Upward to the slum of freedom,
Onward, working for our kind

Thus to you, my working brothers,
I subscribe may nothing low
Dwell in mind, in heart or in life
Upward to it, and onward go

One cannot mistake the reference to herself in these stanzas from "Pictures of Memory"—

'A small thatched cottage, moss grown old,
A low browed weather beaten door,
Two windows small that dimly light
The dusky walls and carthen floor

From rafters, graced with smoke, and old,
Hung bunch'd up herbs a triple row

Shedding their strong-ly
ly scented breath
Through all the dingy room below

Wounds the southern casement sun,
Within his cage a linnets grey,
Perched upon the wire low-sat
A pet with flowing hair and gay

A matron pines her spinning wheel
With dancing feet her little daughter Trips to her side her dark brown eyes
And dimpled cheeks are bright with laughter

In fairy tales and belled lore
The little maid had wondrous pleasure
In the tiny volume in her hand
The last address to her treasure

With grave kind look the mother gazed,
Into her darling's beaming eyes
'My child, such reading may remove
But will not make you good and wise

Oh you shall hear'
The child replies,
Then warbled clear an old Scotch ditty

The mother's heart was moved her voice
Was hushing o'er with tender pity

She smiled, and softly laid her hand
Upon the fair child's shining hair
'Beh, like a dancing amber pane
Away into the summer air'

Nothing is more remarkable in these poems than her passion for nature in certain of its aspects. Her experience was limited, but her feeling was thus the more intense. She was never more than twenty miles from her dwelling. She was not familiar with mountains, except possibly the shadowy form of some distant hill or hill range. She never saw the sea, nor any river but the Clyde.

The glen of the Calder Water, a tributary of the Clyde, and the Luggie, a small but picturesque stream whose banks and nooks showed the primrose, the hyacinth, and the blue-bell, in spring and summer, and were golden with bracken in autumn, were all that was open to her, but they were frequently haunted and intensely loved.

With the true poetic instinct that yearns for the wild and the free, she preferred the flowers of the glens and the moorland, "the wildings of nature" and the heather bloom, the finest nurslings of horticultural art. She loved the former, as she says, and admired the latter. Sweetly she sings of "Wild Flowers."

"The fragrant dewy rose,
The lily pure and pale,
Each flower the garden shows
To charm my spirit full;
Their beauties I admire,
Their fragrance I inhale—
Flowers of my land I love,
Ye bloom in wood and vale!"

"I love the tender bloom
On Nature's blushing face;
The violet's soft perfume,
The cowslip's drooping grace,
The hyacinth's azure bells,
Primrose in paley gold,
Shining the woody dells,
And peering thence and wild."

The following stanzas from verses descriptive of an early morning walk in the latter end of April, 1830, illustrate her feeling for spring, and show an eye and soul for truthful, original, and loving delineation, and in several of the lines, a felicity of idealising expression which is characteristic of the true poet, and which comes only from the unconscious flow of imagination into the world of the senses:—

"The blithe voice of spring through the meadows was ringing;
True her note among the gowans the lavender was singing;
The breeze was asleep, but the breeze was singing,
And clays blith o' dew frae ilk green blade was singing."

Grew pale, for young day her bright primrose had shown;
And ere she grew paler still, dim and far away,
She sank in the red clouds that herald the morn;
Then a rich gowden stream frae the fountain o' light
Gush'd out—an' the mist that had hapt the night
Rov'd up frae the glens and war gane out o' sight.
As the green earth lay smilin' sae low and sae bright.
The peat fire are lustin'—too fragrant the smells,
This hab o' the heather an' bonnie blue-bells,
This twig o' green hick—oh, I canna wae tell
How the night and the morn gart my fa' bosom swell."

Her feeling for October, her natal month, was very strong and tender. Again and again does she recur to it, in some nine different poems. Her picturing of it is direct, almost literally faithful, with just enough of that suggestion of pathos and under-current of appropriate suggestion, to make the picture for the eye also an object for the heart to brood upon. In "October Thoughts" (1862), we have the following lines:—

"A solemn, tender melancholy,
A soft emotion, sweet and holy;
A sense of silence and repose,
O'er my worn heart and spirit flows.
I feel the breathing calm that lies
On earth and sea and sleeping thine,
Upon the yellow moulden woods.
Where fading nature mournful broods;
The stubble field, brown, silent, bare—
Not even a gleaner wandering there.
I seem by the death couch to stand
O'er some gray father of the land,
And hark! and twilight shadows dim
The robin chants his funeral hymn
Now, o'er the landscape slowly sailing,
Robes of mist around her trailing;
Come the night, bright, mild, and gracious;
I through the blue ethereal spaces,
Walk the full-orbed moon in splendour,
Chaste, serene, and meekly tender."

Her pathos, tenderness, and sympathy with the struggling human lives around her, are marked and noble features in her verse. The sorrows, the joys, the temptations of the men and women among whom she lived, are always finely touched. Her picturing of these is simple, and thoroughly realistic, but the instinct with which she notes the human element, and the intense loving sympathy which it excites in her, and which is woven so naturally into the narrative, make her verses appeal to all true human-heartedness.

In "A Lay of the Tambour-Frame," she sings:—

"Dreading with straining eyes
O'er the tambour-frame,
Nervy a change in her woody posture—
Save in all but the name.
Tambour, ever tambour,
Tambour the wretched lime
O'er wonder'd silk, till beauty's robe
In rainbow levers shines.
There with colourless chink,
I here with blue tugging hair,
Still bending low o'er the maky frame,
Sneak, ye will find her there.
Tambour, ever tambour,
With fingers cramped and chill;
The paces are shattered, and cold the wind
Flows over the eastern hill."

In "Winter" occur the following stanzas:—

"Oh! wae's me for the folk that dream
Could poverty, for my weary wam,
Who seldom, o'er in winter time,
Are hilt wi' meat, or hilt wi' rice;
Hae scarce a speck o' fire to warm
Their chitties' bearnies' fingers red,
Hae na' or a shoe to fend their feet,
And scarce a blanket on the bed;
A wee drop parritch, nothing mair,
But tatum and a pickle saut;
A wee bit bread at o'ra times,
But nae bit that comes o' heat or meat.
Oh! I hae hae'd, I ken o'm now,
O' hames to whilk a mother's care
Hae bracht contentment wi' ae lot,
For mother's love and God's war there!"

"The Old Churchyard" and "The Auld Kirkyard," are powerful pieces of pathos.

But she is never more at home or more expressive than when dealing with broken hopes, or disappointed love, or misplaced affection. "Cousin Bell," "Effie," "Mary Muiren," "Sheepie Knowe," "Mary Lee," "Liddy May," are all very touching stories of the simplest incidents. The picture of Effie, stricken hearted, pale, calm, tearless, is one of the finest and most pathetic in verse.

There are a good many pieces on political freedom, the struggles of Poland and Italy, and on intemperance, which show a burning and creditable moral enthusiasm.

The best and most interesting of her prose writings are "Sketches of Village Life and Character." They are very well written, and show shrewdness of observation, discrimination of character, strong common sense, and a certain marked independence in judging of prevailing social customs, and traditional opinions in society and the religious world. A quaint, fine flavoured old Scottish piety suffuses the whole.

The following touching incident, touchingly told, will illustrate her prose writing.

"I will record," she says, "an incident in the life of one of my paternal ancestors who suffered much for conscience' sake during the days of episcopal tyranny in Scotland. He had been under hiding for some time, and so strict was the search made for him that he dared not visit his home, although his wife lay on her death-bed, pining and praying for her husband's presence. She died without that consolation, when a woman who had attended her in her last moments undertook to inform him of the bereavement, warning him at the same time that advantage would be taken of his expected presence at the funeral to apprehend him. Hearing this, he contrived to come, under cloud of night, to a neighbouring moor, from whence he saw the mournful procession issuing from the door. As it approached, not daring to stand upright, he lay down, and dragging himself like a reptile through the long heather, as near to the road as he could with safety, wept that farewell to the cold clay as it was earned past, which could not be spoken by the bedside of his dying wife."

For the last eighteen years of her life, Janet Hamilton was blind. Her assiduity in reading by the dim oil lamp, or even the flickering light of the cottage fire, had contributed to this result. In any case, the world of darkness behind the sightless orbs is a painful thing to think of. In the case of Janet Hamilton, the deprivation was especially severe, for she was shut out from that world of light, colour, and form, the glow of flower, the gleam of leaf, the sparkle of the stream, which she loved with a poet's love. One compensation she had, and that was the singular force of her power of picturing the past. So closely and lovingly had she observed, and so intensely had she felt the sights and scenes of the outward world, so readily and vividly could she represent them, that the imagery of the past was almost as powerful as the real world of the present could have been. Her contentment under the loss of vision was unbroken.

In an interview with her in her later years, the Rev. Dr. Wallace, of Glasgow, tells us, "It was very touching when Mirren, her daughter, read some of the ballads in the volume, in which there are beautiful allusions to nature, to hear the blind old mother say again and again, as she sat bent forward eagerly listening, in her arm chair, 'I see it! I see it! It's like a crystal o' light set in my very heart.' On expressing our surprise that she could so vividly recall past scenes, and speak with rapture of the wild flowers which she could see no more, she said, 'They're a' in my heart. I loved them too well ever to forget them.'"

Or as she sings —

"The days o' langsyne oh! the days o' langsyne!
Sweet thoughts o' the bygone I never a' lye
The darkin' I set in my weelie arm chair
A' places, a' faces, I see them a' there
Oh! lassy Blackthorn! nae picture can gie
So faithfu' a picture as I hae o' thee.
It was in ee when the sun o' young mem'ries was bricht,
And set in my heart in a crystal o' licht."

She makes several touching and exquisite references to her blindness, but finest of all probably is—"A Ballad of Memory."

"Nae mair ah! nae mair I'll see Young mornin' a' golden hae Spread over the linn—the dawning when
O' summer mornin' fair
Nae mair the heathery knowe I'll speak,
A' the gairns the gairns I'll speak,
Like fire-flaughts, over the loch a lane breast,
Over which the breeze is dancin'."

"Nae mair I'll wander over the heath,
Or thro' the birken shaw
An' pu' the wild wud flowers an' sing
O' lassy glens, Rosalind!
How white the haw how red the rose,
How blue the hyacinth bell
Whae fairy thim'les wor the loes
In Linnach a' bracken dell."

"Nae mair when kummae the bu ge
His garlands on the tree
And hazy breath o' the ether he'll Come gladin' us the breeze
Nae mair the burnin' birken buds
And sweetly scented dew
Gae out their sweets nae power they hae
My downy heart to cheer."

"Nae mair I'll hear the cuckoo, dee
We've voices o' tender wail
Fare out her pie at nae luv, rock's sang,
Up mang the w' to clouds a' win'
The lapp o' waves that kiss the shore
The murmur o' the stream
I'll hear but in my dream."

"When a' the hours are gane to sleep
I set my head to loun,
A' mair till fancy streaks her wings,
An' I am young again."

Agua I wanner thro' the weeds,
 Again I seem to sing
 Some warful auld-warld ballad strain,
 Lill a' the echoes ring.

"Again the snaw-white howlet's wing
 O'er my head in flapping
 When frae her nest 'mang Caklet Craig
 I hey't her wi' my dafin,
 An' keekin in the way it' nest,
 O' naked scoddlies fa',
 I feed wi' nookies out my pouch
 Yik gaps' hungry mon."

"Again I wanner ower the h 2,
 An' pu' the gowans fine,
 Again I puddle in the burn,
 But, oh! it's lang-mn-syne!
 Again I see faces blythe I see,
 Your gladsome voices hear—
 Free's o' my youth—'a' gae, o' gae!
 An' I at blinlies here."

"The star o' memory lights the past;
 But there's a licht above,
 To cheer the darkness o' a life
 That saun be credit some,
 An' aft I think the gowden morn,
 The purple glowin' in,
 Will shine as bright, an' to' as soft,
 When I hae gae awa'."

Everyone must be struck with the contrast between the lowly circumstances of this woman's outward life—humble and poor—and the wealth of thought, feeling, and fancy of her inner life, the life of her soul and heart. Poor and lowly as she was, no one could more appropriately have adopted the line:—

"My mind to me a Languish is."

Her story shows what a continuous store of happiness, lying in pure and elevating thoughts, is to be found apart altogether from external circumstances; that, in fact, the true life of a man or woman is the heart life.

Janet Hamilton was an instance of the gentlewoman whom we not unfrequently find among the humbler class of Scottish women. Simplicity, inborn delicacy of feeling, and a certain self-respecting dignity, are the core of the character—form its reliance, its strength, its grace. To these were added in her case "the burning thochts within," as her husband put it, "that wadna let her rest;" and the outcome was that while she lived almost wholly unnoticed and unknown to the world of mouthing noise and bustling action, she was framing for herself, in a great measure unconsciously, the imperishable coronet of a Songstress of Scotland.

Janet Hamilton passed her lifetime without public recognition of any sort, save the yearnings to her of a few kindred and sympathetic hearts in her own sphere of life—yearnings responsive to the noble utterances of the woman. After her death, a few friends gathered together and subscribed for a fountain to be erected to her memory, in the village of Langloan, nearly opposite to the humble cottage where she had lived and sung. There the fountain now stands, her memorial, the free, pure, spontaneous flow of its waters aptly symbolizing the natural upwelling, the freedom, the purity of her song.

"IS ALL WELL WITH THE CHILD?"

Written on the death of the Infant Prince of Meppa Darmstadt, by a girl, 14th May, 1872.

ROCKED in thine airy nest, in leafy elm,
 Sheltered from gaze beneath the mother's wing,
 Who would have dreamed a blow to throne and realm
 Could fall upon them through so fair a thing?

So drops the lamb upon the bleak hill-side,
 So falls the blossom in the vernal frost;
 Ah! happy flock, where such can ne'er betide!
 Ah! happy garden, where no fruit is lost!

Brave hearts were round thee, steel'd through deadly strife
 To face a danger or defend a throne
 A word of peril to that sweet young life
 Had armed a host to shield it with their own.

A whisper on the wire, and England's love
 Had sent her best of science and of skill,
 And England's prayers had thronged the shrine above
 For gifts of healing—won by supplicants still.

Or, might the Tempter whisper, as of old,
 The poison lingers still in sorrow's cup—
 "The angels, who thy Father's face behold, Did He not give them charge to bear thee up?"

Ab! was there not an hour, when He who gave,
 With legions waiting at His word to fly,
 Held back the mighty arms that burned to save,
 And left for us His only Son to die?

For us—for thee! Yea, so His will be done,
 All with the child is "well" for evermore.
 And well with them who to their home press on,
 Led by the children who have gone before!

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST.

A Modern Romance

By SARAH TYTLER, AUTHOR OF "CITIZEN JACQUELINE," "LADY BEET," ETC

CHAPTER VI.—BEAUTY

LADY FERMOR was a bad woman, she had been a bad daughter and sister, a bad wife, mother, and grandmother. She had been weighed and found wanting in every relation. Lord Fermor was not her first husband, nor was she his first wife. It had only been after passing through the divorce court that she had attained her present position. But that was half a century ago, years prior to the birth of Iris Compton's mother, Lady Fermor's only child to Lord Fermor.

For many a long day the respectable world refused absolutely to condone the heinous offence. But time will serve to obliterate the blackest stains, and two facts were in Lady Fermor's favour. The sunnier had for a period which was equivalent to a moderately long life time refrained from her old sins against moral and social laws and she was now an aged woman. These facts upheld self-interest, easy-minded tolerance, and charity, in granting some renewal of the lady's passport to mix with other than the utterly reckless of her sex. Though Eastham was largely conservative, and its population by comparison stationary, Lady Fermor had neighbours nowadays who knew nothing further of the mistresses of Lambford than that there had been something wrong where she was concerned, long, long ago, something which was better kept out of hearing, and gradually lost sight of.

Lady Fermor was too wise a woman not to avail herself of the slow, shy relenting, though she felt more contemptuous of it than grateful for it. She had never cared for the members of her own sex, while she had always been able to "on" "hail fellow, well-met" terms with a wide circle of men, so long as she was young enough to love company and enjoy her part in it. Nevertheless there was a small triumph in surmounting what she considered milk-and-water and bread-and-butter scruples. Besides, ■ was desirable for Iris, her grand-daughter, for whom her guardian had some consideration though little affection, that she should have the entrance to respectable houses presided over by women on whose reputations suspicion had not so much as breathed.

Lady Fermor had not secured the last boon for her daughter, Iris's mother; she had moved chiefly in Bohemian sets, and as a natural result had married ill, in every light save a worldly one, ■ her mother's instigation. She had led a wretched life. She had not possessed either spirit or power to rebel against her fate. Both she and her husband had died young, and she had left a helpless child, another girl, to the care of her mother's nearest relatives, who had made shipwreck of her fortunes.

Hard, heartless, coarse, and corrupted as Lady Fermor's career had left her, she felt that she owed some reparation to her unhappy daughter's child, and she did not mean that Iris's history should resemble that of her mother. Lady Fermor put herself to the pains ■ secure an excellent governess—who did not refuse ■ enter the family at Lambford—and placed the pupil entirely under the teacher's charge.

The mistress of the house did not interfere; unless it can be called interference, that in the early days of Miss Burrage's domestication, Lady Fermor did not consider it any breach of the contract or source of peril to her scheme, to encourage the little girl when she came to the drawing room to mimic the small peculiarities and gaucheries of her schoolmistress, and to reward these exhibitions of talent by herself furnishing lessons in this histrionic display. She was a well-qualified professor, and showed up poor Miss Burrage's weaknesses so as not only to cause the child Iris to dance with delight, but to awaken universal laughter among the drawing-room groups, made up of the fastest men and women in that corner of the kingdom.

Iris used to cry bitterly, a little later in her life, over her share in the game, and she would wonder in her troubled mind whether the hard, flippant, or affectedly languid laughter was that crackling of thorns under a pot of which the psalmist wrote ■ was not any direct word or act of Miss Burrage's which aroused the remorse and suggested the smile. On the contrary, when the poor lady could not help learning the extent ■ which so modest and retiring a person as she was had contributed to the entertainment of the drawing-room, she contented herself with discharging a delicate duty faithfully. She was forced for conscience' sake, and in Iris's interest to say to the weeping girl, insisting in an agony of contrition on confessing her falseness to the obligations of friendship, "Very true, my dear, it is not right or kind to mock at your friends behind their backs, especially for such physical misfortunes as a lisp, or short sight, or a queer gait. But don't worry about it, only don't do it again. I am sure you never will. Do you think I cannot say all my absurdities off by heart at my age, or that I mind much other people's noticing them, especially as many persons have a strong sense of the ridiculous which they cannot easily curb? You must remember jesting and laughter break no bones, though the fun might sometimes be suppressed with a good grace, and the suppression, strange to say, rather tend to increase true merriment."

Miss Burrage was a very remarkable woman, though she could ■ guilty of lipping and blinking and stalking as she walked. She was not merely well informed and accomplished, a capital teacher with a high character for uprightness, steadiness, and kindness to her pupils. She had come to Lambford well aware of what she was doing without saying anything to anybody—not even to herself, unless in the vaguest way, untempted by the salary her employers offered, undazzled by their rank—much as she would have gone into a sanatorium or a lazaret-house.

"I shall take no harm," she told herself, "and while I know I have not ten years' more work left in me, I should like to do something apart from earning my bread, for love's sake."

Miss Burrage did more than give Iris a new experience, she brought to her a revelation. In that intensely worldly house, where there was hardly a law save that of wayward inclination, Iris came into closest contact with a woman to whom the divine command of duty was the ruling, well-nigh the sole power. At Lambford the pursuit of pleasure, though it had cooled from its passion and fever, and was now more of a hard, hackneyed round than a headlong race, continued to ■ the entire business of life. But Iris heard of work, not as the degrading curse, but as the enabling blessing of man's earthly sphere.

Miss Burrage, somewhat homely and dowdy in those points of personal appearance and dress which were extravagantly valued at Lambford, did not hesitate ■ believe that from no material throne but from the blue sky, high as heaven above her, God saw her and loved her, and held blessed communion with her as in the old-world Hebrew stories, when the same God walked among the trees of the Garden of Eden and spoke with the first man, Adam, and called the patriarch Abraham His friend.

It was not in Lady Fermor's bargain, as she had read it, ■ allow her grand-daughter to be reared an enthusiast, with a vocation for religion and virtue quite out of the common, and a troublesome, impracticable forte for righteousness. Lady Fermor considered that, with all her slips and stumbles, she had not been a bad churchwoman on the whole; she had always stuck to mother church as "good form" to say the least, and she had her reward. She was willing that Iris should go farther and be more consistent in her walk; but as to her becoming over-pious and over-upright, a benevolent platform scold, or a meek martyr, Lady Fermor would sooner have Iris a lunatic at once and dispose of her ■ the safe seclusion of an asylum.

As soon as Lady Fermor perceived the mischief which was at work—and it was her thorough scepticism which rendered her blind to ■ in the beginning—she did her best to stop the evil by dismissing Miss Burrage summarily, and taking Iris, who was then a girl of sixteen, into her own charge, to be cured by a course of such knowledge of the world and unrestricted gaiety as Lady Fermor could administer to her. But the harm was done; rather the bent was given to the twig and the inscription carved on the grain, which not all the king's horses and all the king's men could untwist or efface. There had been a seal set on Iris Compton's modest forehead, which Lady Compton's brow, at its smoothest, least guileful stage, had never borne. Iris was not wax, though she had proved pliant to the highest culture. She could not unlearn all she had been taught; she would not if she could.

Lady Fermor did not believe ■ supernatural aid, but she found in her grand-daughter a quiet power of endurance and passive resistance which ended by baffling her. For she was a shrewd old woman. Her wickedness had destroyed many a faculty of mind and quality of taste, but it had not interfered much with her native shrewdness. She could submit, after a struggle, to the inevitable. She had no notion in those days of persecuting the girl, or driving her to greater folly or madness, or breaking her spirit. Nay, there was a degree of respect along with the eternal grudge of evil against good, bred ■ the veteran, by the staunchness of the recruit to the marching orders which the miserable marplot Burrage had given. ■ Iris's mother could have had as clear an aim and been as constant to it, she need not have come to such irreparable grief.

Happily for all concerned, the sinner, Miss Burrage, had implanted the principle in Iris that goodness was not a charm confined to any sacred place, or solemn routine of daily engagements. The first binding debt the girl must pay was that rudimentary obligation which Lady Fermor had never dreamt of acknowledging in her day or contemplated transmitting to her successors, unless in the sense of a superior force or a convenient form. It was that primitive call to reverence, obey, and be tender to every elder and ruler who is the ordinance of God, unless the homage defies and outrages the unassailable majesty of truth, purity, and that beauty of goodness which can know no decay.

All these encounters were things of four or five years back. Iris had not seen Miss Burrage from the hour they were parted. The pupil had heard of the governess's death. Then Iris had shut her eyes and seen a lonely ill-trained little girl and a good woman striving with kind patience to win the child ■ ■ that was honest and lovely. "And I have done nothing for her in return," cried Iris with the tears bursting forth; but after a while she admitted, with tender magnanimity, "She was getting feeble before she left. I know she dreaded to be dependent, and shrank a little from a lonely old age. I wish, oh! I wish I could have cared for her; but since that was not to be, shall I, of all people, grudge to her the 'Well done, good and faithful servant,' when we shall not miss each other at last?" Lady Fermor had come to let Iris alone. The old woman was not fond of her grand-daughter. Occasionally she showed herself spiteful to her with a spite which might increase on provocation to a formidable malice. But as a rule the venerable matron, with so little to be revered in her, alas! was reasonable, with a sort of masculine bonhomie about her which saved her from being guilty of petty tyranny, and caused her to like that the members of her family should be comfortable in their own way—always provided that way did not interfere with hers. Contradiction roused the demon in her.

Iris was now over twenty years of age, a tall, slender girl, with a small, well-carried head. She had auburn hair, which she had worn since childhood, anticipating the fashion, in little clustering waves and rings, low on her forehead. The mode had been her grandmother's decree when she discovered the chief defect in the little face, which was the disproportion of the broad, full forehead to what lay beneath it.

"Good gracious, child! who ever saw such a top to a Queen Anne's sixpence of a face? You only want spectacles to grow up like Miss Cornelia—I forget her name—that schoolmistress of Dickens. Every man will be frightened away by such a brow, unless he imagines he can save himself trouble by using ■ for a dictionary. Bid Woods take cringing tongues or a wet brush and cover over that huge overhanging promontory as much as possible."

Thus the defect was veiled, and Iris happened to be one of the very few women improved by borrowing a hint from her cousins the monkeys.

In spite of the ominous indication, nature had not destined Iris for a prodigy of brains, and Miss Burrage had not completed her pupil's demoralisation in this respect. The girl was quick and intelligent, and had received a solid foundation to her education, that was all. As she grew up she proved enthusiastic in an age which has invented a new application for the adjective "gushing," and sympathetic in a dry and parched atmosphere which would have withered all save keen sympathies. She was fertile in resource. She had a natural gift of working skilfully in womanly fashion with her hands. The little face under the softly masked brow remained small, and when the hazel eyes were clear, the mouth rosy, while the cheeks too had their roses, the head was a wonderful reproduction in form, colouring, and expression of the cherub head which Sir Joshua painted in so many different poses, having found the original in the head of the Honourable Isabella Gordon, the kinswoman of a bouncing beauty of a duchess and of a crazy fanatic who led a national riot. But sometimes the cherub was under a cloud, with drooping eyelids, drooping mouth, and a pale, wistful little face more suggestive of piteousness than beauty.

The last was not the normal aspect of the girl. She had a healthy constitution, physically and spiritually touched with the highest, finest influences. She had been accustomed ■ an isolated life in that most depressing atmosphere of age without the attributes which render a hoary head a crown of glory. But she was far from friendless either in her own class or among servants, working people, and poor people. In the neighbourhood of Lambford there was a great deal of feeling for Iris Compton, an orphan under bad guardianship, though she never dreamt of herself as an object of compassion. The rector of the parish and his wife, well-meaning if somewhat self-conscious people, made a pet of her without any interference from Lady Fermor. Their only son, Ludovic Acton, was like a brother to Iris; and the daughter, nearest to Iris in age, was Iris's bosom friend, exalted by her lively imagination far beyond Lucy Acton's deserts, though Lucy was a good girl.

Iris had a happy temper and a mind that was neither suspicious, nor exacting, nor foreboding. She was always busy when she was by herself, as she was to a large extent when she was at home, with her share of the club books, her music, her art needle work, her favourites among Lady Fermor's poultry, her rockery and such assistance as she was sometimes allowed ■ give Lucy Acton in the church choir and in parish work. Iris had a reserve of courage in her character, which lent an attribute of the heroic to the girlish womanhood. She had been thrown from her horse when riding with her groom near the town of Knotley, and had her collar-bone dislocated. She had been carried into a house, where she had given no trouble beyond begging her hostess to allow the doctor who attended Lord and Lady Fermor to come and set the bone and take her home in his brougham, in order to spare her grandmother the shock of hearing of the accident before she knew it was nothing and that Iris was safe back in her room at Lambford.

A painful accident occurred in the butler's pantry at Lambford, an unlucky footman in drawing the cork of a soda-water bottle wrrenched off the neck and cut his hand severely. Everybody called out a remedy, but nobody could bring himself or herself to look at the wound or touch it. Then Iris ran in from the garden, bound up the gash, kept the bandage in its place, gave brandy to the man when he grew faint, and stayed ■ help the doctor after he arrived in time to take up the severed artery, because no one else had sufficient nerve to make him or her willing to become the medical man's assistant.

Lady Fermor was very angry when she knew what had taken place, and said if she had been aware of the disgraceful chicken-heartedness of every soul about the place, she would have ordered each and all, on pain of instant dismissal with a month's wages, to stand beside the doctor and prevent Miss Compton's being taken advantage of and put to such uses.

In spite of her ladyship's indignation, from that date, whenever a misadventure happened in the household, the sufferer was sure to make a secret humble application for help to Iris, though the girl protested laughingly her inexperience, and the absence on her part even of any intention of being trained for a nurse.

While things often went wrong at Lamb-ford and in the world, Iris was as sure as she was of her own existence, that there was a Ruler over all who ordered things aright, and brought good out of evil, and light out of darkness. She believed He had work for her to do ■ His world, and would show her more and more clearly what it was, if she waited for Him and did the least thing her hand found to do, with all her might, for the good of herself and her neighbours, to His praise. And when this scene of blessing and tribulation was ended, there remained the new heavens and the new earth wherein dwelt righteousness and the Lord of righteousness.

Iris on the whole was a happy girl, as who should be if she were not? She was kept ignorant, as those nearest the sinner often are, of the worst of the iniquities of the past at Lambford. Still she heard and saw much to distress her, but while she shrank from further enlightenment, the wrong-doing fell away from her as something entirely foreign to her nature and history. She was very sorry sometimes. She could not fail ■ be grieved and shocked, but it was not for her to judge and condemn those who were far older than herself, her natural superiors. She had an inextinguishable spring of hope in these years. She was always hoping the best. This was especially true of the wound dealt to her affections by the knowledge that neither her poor old grandfather in his great infirmity, nor her grandmother in the possession of all her powers of mind, but bending under the heavy burden of an aged body, cared much for her.

"She met him at her own in the simplest, kindest manner."

Iris walked ■ the light of her innocence and rectitude in the love and fear of God, and in the honour of all men, unhurt by her harmful surroundings, one of the strange, sweet, incontestable answers to the carping, doubting question, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?"

CHAPTER VII.—BY LADY THWAITE'S WORK-TABLE.

THERE are women one of the principal objects of whose lives consists in providing themselves with fine feathers, and in pluming the feathers after the wearers have got them. There are other women among whose chief aims is that of lining their nests luxuriously and agreeably, and displaying to envious neighbours those well-furnished nests. Not unfrequently these moods show themselves in the same women, and rather mark different stages of development than contrast of inclination in one person.

Lady Thwaite had married a man old enough to be her grandfather, without entertaining for him any of the sentiments of respect, gratitude, or pity, which could by the wildest flight of fancy have stood for parallel sympathies and mutual inclinations. She was one of a family of many poor pretty daughters, belonging to the slenderly provided widow of a hunting squire-parson, or "squarson" as the type ■ sometimes entitled in Eastham. She hankered after the flesh-pots of Egypt, especially in the shape of fine feathers, and she saw no other way of procuring these than by the marriage which she made.

To do Lady Thwaite justice she was just the wife old Sir John wanted, with the signal exception of there being no heir, to live and flourish after him instead of handing over Whitehills to degenerated Thwaites. She disappointed him in nothing else, and she was reasonably contented with the result she had achieved. So having accomplished two things which the world thoroughly approved, done well for herself, and made the most of her gains, she was popular; she was regarded as a fairly fortunate woman and a highly available acquaintance. Unlike old Lady Fernor in everything else, Lady Thwaite was like her in this, that both of them had always dispensed with female friends, and been perfectly satisfied with acquaintances of their own sex. Going back so far as her girlish days, Lady Thwaite's mother and sisters had been no more to her than intimate acquaintances. The point at which the resemblance broke down was that neither had Lady Thwaite shown any need of male friends. Beyond the wide, easy bond of acquaintanceship—and no woman cultivated more acquaintances, she had been sufficient for herself.

Mr. Miles, before he left, was as good as his word, in introducing Sir William to the former mistress of Whitehills. She struck an unsophisticated stranger as a fair-haired woman with a figure inclined ■ stoutness, and a fine presence which was "stunning" to him. Her black silk and crape and white cap set off her fairness, diminished her stoutness, and caused her to look younger than she really was. She received him with ease and friendliness, which might have been still more cordial if he had been able ■ advance half-way ■ meet her. There was nothing distressing in her allusions to Sir John. She spoke of the loss she had sustained with no more than the quiet gravity and gentle sadness which the death of so old a man was calculated to excite in his kindred of the second generation. She was his widow, no doubt, as her dress indicated, but only a widow who had been his contemporary could have experienced sharp pain or keen desolation at old Sir John's having passed away before her, by ever so short a time. Very soon the conversation took a more cheerful turn, and Lady Thwaite's social gifts, as a lively woman of the world, came out to anybody capable of appreciating her.

The interview had not proved very formidable, and from the date of the introduction the gentleman found himself, ■ could hardly tell how, in frequent communication with the lady. He did not like her particularly, though she was good enough to lay herself out to please him, but he had a sense that he ought to feel obliged to her for bearing no grudge against him after he had turned her out of his house, and he had an honest wish to serve her.

Lady Thwaite approved of Sir William's intention and recognised his capabilities of usefulness. She speedily extracted from him sundry china jars, a marquetric table, and a pair of old Dutch leather screens which she considered would be acquisitions in her rooms.

Netberton was already a wonderfully cosy, pretty dowager house. Lady Thwaite had kept a careful, fostering eye on it, ever since she married Sir John, and particularly after the death of their son. She had moved in the background, but not the less successfully on that account. She had seen that the house was in perfect repair. She had bestowed unremitting attention on the improvement of the grounds. The place was not and could not be like Whitehills. It was only a smallish, nineteenth-century country house, built in the earlier years of the century, when bow windows were synonymous with light, not shade. The lawn was almost too like velvet in its pile to be spoilt—as it often was, to the mortification of the one adult gardener—by tennis. There was a carriage-drive in the perfection of order, and a belt of rare, though younger shrubs and trees than any at Whitehills. Altogether ■ was a very different establishment from the ill-kept, run-out, over-crowded house from which Lady Thwaite had been led ■ Sir John.

The lady, like Mr Miles, was gratified to find the representative of the family, whom she had elected to make her protégé, hopefully docile and tolerably presentable. Yet she felt a pang in connection with the thing which had gone nearest her heart, in the whole course of the deliberately planned, worldly prosperity of her life. It was the failure of the hopes with regard to her son. "To think such broad, manly shoulders and such a resolute mouth should have been given to a lout, a common soldier, while my boy, the true heir of Whitehills, was like a thread paper and had no more firmness in his poor loose lips than when he was a senseless baby," was her inaudible cry on the first peep she got at the new comer. But she swallowed the bitterness and was altogether bland and propitious, finding the subjects for conversation as became a fair, fat, well bred woman, so good natured and accessible in her circle that there sometimes crept out just the faintest suspicion of lady like wheedling and cajoing in her attitude.

It was that fresh season of the year when spring is still glad, and not yet growing languid as it passes into the heat of summer. Chiquers of sunshine and shade were woven on the floor of the pleasant room, where the fire, still gleaming on the tiles, was tempered by the open door, into the little conservatory, bringing wafts of fragrance from violets, lilies of the valley, and jonquils. A far away window open to the garden admitted the full throated singing of blackbirds and thrushes in the early joy of mating. The silvery light, crossing the soft gloom, knidled up here and there in chair covers, portières, and cushions, admirably blended lines of cool blue and white creton, mellow olive velvet and dead gold plush. There was an effect like the wavering motion of leaves on the dull reds, and blues, and greens of the Turkey carpet, an ivory tinted softness and delicacy in the revived satin wood with its fine hand painting of flowers and fruit, contrasted with the rich black of ebony in the framework of the piano, chairs, and settees. Of the pictures on the sober grey walls, that old Sir John, padded, buttoned up, and looking as if he had just come from successive visits to his barber and his tailor, was in the merciful shadow, while Lady Thwaite's likeness, in the light, showed her considerably crowned with a small cap, and draped in a shawl so as not to look younger than her husband's daughter. There was also a careful representation of a baby shrouded in a cloak, not to be superseded by a bluff or prim little boy sitting on his pony or standing by his dog, the ordinary style for the heirs of the family as preserved at Whitehills.

Though April days invite to dawdling idleness out of doors, the April sun shone on manifold signs of busy idleness within the house. The temperate beams scattered themselves freely on newspapers and books, a well-filled music stand, the paraphernalia of easel and colour boxes, and a dainty work-table containing half a dozen pieces of pretty work—all of which were necessities of life to Lady Thwaite.

Sir William, late private in one of her Majesty's infantry regiments, remained an incongruous figure, not at home in such an entourage. ■ must be confessed that he was not in himself entertaining, so Lady Thwaite had ensconced him in one of those torturing, retreating, subsiding seats of the second last fashion, in which no man who was not to the manner born could have settled himself otherwise than uncomfortably and awkwardly. She was talking to him in her smiling, fluent manner on subjects of which he could know nothing. If he answered at all, he must either express the most refreshing ignorance, or perpetrate the most grotesque mistakes. She asked him to help her with the arrangement of some of her silks and wools, and he did not see how he could refuse to oblige her, by declining to comply with her demurely put request. But his proceedings, while she would take care that they did no harm to her property, must be more ludicrous than those of Hercules with Omphale's spinning gear, for Hercules had the unfettered mien of a demi god, while Omphale's establishment was sure to have been simplicity itself. Sir William's spasmodic actions in the Netherberton drawing room bore more resemblance to the uncouth demonstrations of a bail in a china shop.

"Ah! there is somebody coming," Lady Thwaite cried, interrupting her little game, as a shadow crossed the window. "I believe it is Mrs Compton. Don't go, Sir William,"—detaining him when ■ sought to accomplish a shame-faced retreat. "You may rise if you will, that is if you can. Let me give you my hand. Dear! dear! I must bid Charles take away these low chairs with their sloping backs. They are a snare to half the people who sit down in them. Miss Compton ought to be one of the belles of the neighbourhood, though her fine figure is rather slight even for a girl." She favoured him with a preparatory criticism, sitting serene in her own becoming maternally bountifulness.

■ outline. "There is certainly a suspicion of red in her hair—all-natured people call it red—and her face is too small, it is even inclined to ■ chubby. But in spite of trifling defects she would be one of the county beauties if she were properly seen. She goes out very little, however, her relations are very old and don't live in the world, all the same you must know her like everybody else some day, and I am charmed that the encounter should take place here. I am fond of young people meeting and making themselves at home at Netherton. It is not so very long since I was young myself, but my youth passed soon," remarked Lady Thwaite with an echo of pensiveness in the reflection, pausing as if she expected to be contradicted, and then going on with a furtive smile, faintly acidulated, at the omission of any contradiction, "Poor dear Sir John liked the society of his contemporaries, naturally, and I was only too happy to accommodate myself to his tastes. It was no less my pleasure than my duty, and you cannot think the comfort it ■ to me to remember that now. Ah! here she comes."

Sir William recollected perfectly what he had heard of Miss Compton and her grandmother, Lady Ferrer. He had struggled out of the cramping chair, and, as he stood stiffly, feeling very much in the way, he glanced up, expecting to see a woman like Lady Thwaite, but younger. His eyes fell on the tall, erect figure of a girl like a straight, slim sapling. She wore a dark blue velvet gown and jacket, with a little cap of the same colour. Beneath it was the loveliest silken tatch of hair, not unlike his own in hue, but how different in texture, as it strayed and curled at its own sweet will! Beneath the tatch was a line of white forehead and fine brows, with the rest of a little face lit up by hazel eyes, half eager, half wise. The round cheeks were rosy, still rosy was the delicate mouth, which had no inherent weakness in the curve that broke its straight line. She was smiling upon him, and going through her part of the introduction as ■ she liked it, and wished him well.

He had not seen, he had not so much as conceived of a beautiful, simply refined girl like this, with so much of the child in her that she gave him the sense of being open and frank as the day. Yet there was something in her which daunted him, more than he was impressed by anything in the mature woman of the world beside him, though when he was beside Lady Thwaite she had him in her power, and caused him to do her behests.

In the presence of a third person Lady Thwaite was doubly bound to refrain from the faintest approach ■ making game of her kinsman and guest. But she imagined Sir William did not see what she was about. Mrs Compton was not much of a third person, while her company enhanced the fun of the thing to such an extent that Lady Thwaite could not resist prolonging the joke, were it only to watch its effect on Mrs, and how far her gravity would stand the strain to which it was subjected.

Lady Thwaite sought ■ inveigle Sir William back into the hollow of the detestable cavernous chair. She gravely asked his opinion of the genuineness of her old Chelsea. She said Miss Compton would excuse them if they went on winding their silk, after a scene in a great English classic which Sir William must recall.

Mrs's caution cheeks flushed a rarer red. She started up, as when she ran to the aid of the unfortunate footman with the gash across his palm. It was a mental wound which at this moment called for her aid, and she could no more withhold it from the second than from the first sufferer. To be art and part in hurting anybody's feelings, wilfully and wantonly, was about as impossible to Mrs Compton, as to conspire in dealing a stab with a knife, or to refrain from seeking to stem the flow of the life blood. Nay, she went further in her sensitiveness, her own feelings were hurt in the hurt feelings of her neighbour, with a keenness which was positively painful. In addition, she endured uncalled-for remorse and affront as if she were accessory to the offence.

Mrs protested quickly, "No, no, Lady Thwaite, I can help you far better—Sir William will forgive me for saying so. Besides, what has become of the ingenious winding machine you showed me the last time I was here? Ah! I see it on the table in the corner. If you have tired of using it let me try it."

She sat down, made the machine fast to the table, and twirled it round with her light fingers. She kept up the other half of small talk with Lady Thwaite, making it turn upon the weather, about which anybody surely could venture an observation. Then she referred tentatively to the meteorological signals from America transmitted across the ocean. At last diverging adventurously to sea voyages, she said pleasantly that she believed Sir William Thwaite was the only person present who had any experience in that respect. The manœuvre was as prettily ingenious as the winding machine, without containing a grain of affability or patronage.

He could not help answering the bright appeal. He said he had made two voyages, the one in rough and the other in fine weather, and he could not help thinking she—the ladies before him, would have liked the sea and the great steamer after they had grown accustomed to the motion of the vessel.

Lady Thwaite, restored to her good behaviour, professed an ardent interest in porpoises, albatrosses, and flying fish, as if each belonged by right to the other, jumbling the whole together in a somewhat astounding fashion for so clever and fully-equipped a woman.

Then more visitors came in whom Lady Thwaite went to entertain, while Miss Compton stayed for a few minutes talking to Sir William. She set him at his ease in the simplest, kindest manner. She made him feel that he was the conveyer to her of some unsophistically, graphically given descriptions of wonderful places where she had never been and was never likely to be. He was able to tell her particulars worth hearing of the Hooghly and the Sunderbunds, the Ganges and the Ghauts, Delhi and Benares, and far-away Afghanistan.

Suddenly he broke off and startled her with the mute eloquence of those dark blue eyes of his, before he began to speak on a totally different theme. He was so stirred and roused by her sweetness and fellow-feeling that he was moved to confide in her.

"I have not read much," he said modestly, "mostly travels and histories of campaigns such as they provide for fellows in barracks, but I have been turning over some of the Whitehills books since I came here—stories and that kind of stuff. I think I know the book and picture Lady Thwaite referred to. But if I am like that nabob fellow—though I have not brought home shawls and muslins and fine stones, how can she compare herself to the woman who tried to take him in?"

"Oh, she did not mean to carry out the comparison, she was not in earnest," said Iris, colouring and very much in earnest herself, to reassure him and to withdraw if possible the sting from the absurd simile. "Thackeray is so popular that a trifle recalls his famous scenes, don't you see?"

He did see that she was good to him. Was she one of those fine young ladies—as good as she was fine—of whom Jen had spoken? But if so she was only the farther removed from him. Whatever her grandmother might be, these lips of hers looked as if they had never spoken an unbecoming word, while his had been soiled by the coarse language of the barrack yard and the ale-house. He was surprised that he could have taken it upon him to speak to her, yet here again she was in her innocent ignorance asking him more questions about punkahs and howdahs, elephants and tigers, and pretending interest in his answers, so that he could not reply shortly and evasively.

"Can that girl be making a dead set at my Sir William? Did I ruffle the gentleman? Has he got on so fast that his pride has to be studied? My humblest apologies to him, my bear is learning to dance. It is the first time she has seen him. If it were any one else I should know what to think, but Iris Compton is half a goose, half a saint, and she may just as well leave her settlement in life to that formidable grandmother of hers, who will never suffer another finger—not that of the person principally concerned—in the pie."

He rode home, wondering if he should ever see Iris Compton again, and assuring himself that it did not signify in the very least whether he did or not. She was a creature made of another clay. He was a fallen spirit beside her. In her beauty, which he compared to that of an angel, and her tenderness of heart, she could feel compassion for his degradation and for his miserably false position, but as to drawing nearer to her, the step was impossible, and he would die sooner than take advantage of her. Yet, apart from so gross an abuse of her charity, he had a notion that he could have gone on speaking to her, enticed by her gentle encouragement—even telling her of Jen and Lawrie and beseeching her forgiveness as if he had sinned against her in his sins against them, and in his rough falls—begging for counsel and guidance in the troubled life which lay before him.

Iris Compton drove back to Lambford and went to her grandmother with the scrap of news she would care to hear.

"I have met Sir William Thwaite, grand-mamma. He was with Lady Thwaite at Netherpton when I called," she addressed a wizened mummy in an envelope of sealskin drawn over a quilted woollen dressing gown, hugging her dressing room fire, but turning on the speaker a pair of the keenest, most undimmed, cat-like eyes that were ever sunk in the puckered, fallen-in face of a human being who had seen more than eighty summers and winters.

"You were in luck, child," said the old lady, propitiated by the offering. "What was the ogre like?"

"He was not very big," answered Iris with momentarily stupid literalness, puzzled at the same time to give a description that would satisfy her grandmother. "He seemed a good sort of young man. He was homespun certainly, but he did not assume anything I rather liked him." Then she went on with a great deal more animation. "I don't think Lady Thwaite was behaving well to him. She was amusing herself at his expense when I went in, and she wished me to join in the amusement. From what he said afterwards, I think he saw what she was about. I hope it was not officious in me to try and stop it, but I could not stay and look on and laugh in my sleeve, as she meant me to do."

Lady Fermor did not care either for what her grand-daughter had thought or done, though these were exactly the points which would have bulked largely in the minds of most mothers and grandmothers. She was only interested in Lady Thwaite and Sir William. "Just like Ada Thwaite," she began, with an impatient snort, "always taking her own in the way of diversion when she cannot take it in more solid coin, pecking the parsons's pockets, no doubt, and in the act showing him up to the polite world."

"But she is very good-natured," remonstrated Iris, beginning to repeat of her own censure, "she put herself about to chaperon me to the hunt-ball before Sir John's death, and she drove all round by Cavesham the other day, to ask at the station for your parcel, which was supposed to have been left there."

"She is as fond of company as the youngest child she professes to take care of, and she wanted an excuse to call and hear what I had to say about the bumpkin baronet. She thought I might remember something of wild Dicky Thwaite, but though I have met one of his nephews, he had done for himself and left this part of the country long before I came to it. I suppose she will imagine I saw Noah go into the ark next. You have never told me what the man is like?"

"He seemed a good sort of young man," repeated Iris not very clearly.

Lady Fermor gave another snort. "That is nothing to the purpose, unless you thought of engaging him for a footman," she said ironically. "I conclude you know a man when you see him. Is he a fine-looking fellow under his rough rearing? or is he a cut below being polished? I have known the day when I should not have had to take at second hand the report of any young spark in my neighbourhood."

"I think he is rather nice-looking—I should say so—yes, I am sure, he has good eyes," hesitated Iris, growing confused under the cross examination and the certainty of giving fresh offence. Conscious, too, alas! that, though she had shared in the lively curiosity in the neighbourhood, still after the first glance, she had not bestowed the most careful inspection on Sir William's outer man.

"You will tell me next that he has a nose and mouth like other people," cried Lady Fermor scornfully, "and that he speaks when he is spoken to. But I will judge Sir William Thwaite for myself. I shall drive over and leave Lord Fermor's card, and then invite the man to a family dinner. He is our nearest neighbour, and we have not too many available neighbours, only old fogies and young scamps out at elbows, and long faced hypocrites. I don't know what has become of all the honest, open hearted, open-handed fellows I knew when I was young."

CHAPTER VIII.—SIR WILLIAM'S FIRST FAMILY DINNER

LADY FER MOR was as good as her word. She left Lord Fermor's card, she invited Sir William, and, although he had refused other invitations, he accepted this, drawn by an attraction he sought against in vain.

"The old woman may not be too particular," Sir William brooded, "if all is true that is said of her, she ought not to be. But Miss Compton will not look twice at a clod-hopper—at worse than a clod hopper, a wild, senseless brute when I was drunk. By George, if she heard of what happened at Nhulpoor—that I rubbed shoulders with the lash, the next thing to rubbing shoulders with the gallows! How dare I go where she is? What if I were found out, and kicked out, as I deserve to be?"

He went, however, committing the presumption and braving the risk.

Lambford had been an old house not unlike Whitechall, but, in an evil hour for architectural harmony, Lord Fermor had built an addition to the house in the utmost discordance with the original, and in the worst possible taste. He had tacked on a new wing twice as high and half-a-dozen times as ornamental as the main body of the building. The entrance, by a great flight of stairs, penetrated this wing, and in this favourite quarter were the public rooms, with their ceilings so high that the size of the apartments did not keep them from looking like telescopes.

As much light as the season permitted poured between the curtains of rows of great windows extending from floor almost to ceiling. Huge heavy marble chimney-pieces surmounted the great grates of polished steel. When Lady Fermor came to Lambford she had caused the principal rooms to be re-furnished according to her theory. This was, if a man wanted a handsome dining room and drawing-room—and if they were not handsome, what were they?—had him go in for good bright colours, massiveness of form, and plenty of carving. Above all, don't let him grudge plate-glass and gilding. She hated the dim, dirty tints that people pretended to admire nowadays. And as for lattice panes of green glass, worm-eaten chests and cupboards, rickety rush-bottom chairs, and blinking wax candles instead of paraffin lamps, she would not harbour such trash in her garrets. Lambford had been a place to strike the eye when she ordered its upholstery. It had been as magnificent as some of the saloons she had seen in Paris. She admitted the gilding had become tarnished, and the gorgeous colours in the big patterns had parted with much of their splendour, but the solid mahogany, walnut, and rosewood, and the colossal mirrors had worn well, and would last her time. For true superfluities of style recommend her to the era which reflected the influence of the first gentleman in Europe, George, Prince Regent.

Sir William Thwaite was certainly impressed when he was shown into the loud, loaded, once-costly drawing-rooms, where there was not a particle of evidence of culture beyond an appetite for barbaric weight and glitter, and where the worn, smudged traces of age brought no kindly air of family use and wont—no sense of domestic charities. Lady Fermor had presided with spirit all her own over a great house, but she had never made it a home. Lord Fermor, who had been born and spent his youth there, had no home-like feeling attached to the place, except what belonged to a shut-up portion of the older half of the house, to his private sitting room and the billiard room, and to the stables and the kennels, when he was still able to frequent them. Iris was the single member of the household, out of the servants' hall, who had found a home at Lambford, but her home was centred in the old schoolroom, which she was allowed to keep for her morning and working room, and her white, dumpy-lung bedroom.

To Sir William's uninitiated eyes Lambford looked as grand as a palace—not so far removed in its atmosphere from some of the marvellous Indian palaces which he had visited, but it was not in a palace like this that he would have expected to meet a princess like Iris Compton. On the whole, mock palace as it was till Iris came in, he knew himself less out of his old element than he had been conscious of feeling in Lady Thwaite's drawing-room. Lady Fermor, with her strong passions unbridled in the violence of their prime, her long ex-patriation from any save the fastest and shadiest society, had forfeited in a large measure any claims she had ever possessed to gentle bearing. She was not very different, except in accent and phrase, from the coarse, untrammelled queens of some of the baggage waggons.

But to do Lady Fermor justice there were other reasons why Sir William should feel at ease with her. All that was most honest and least vindictive in her nature, came out, when she encountered simple youthful manhood, as the best in many bad women is shown where little children are in question. Men had always exercised far more influence over Lady Fermor than women, and it is just possible that if she had come in contact with better men when she began her career, if she had even borne a son in her younger days, she might have been a very imperfect but a far less guilty woman than she had lived to prove herself.

She had Sir William brought up to her sofa, where she sat by the side of a blazing fire, with her Indian shawl wrapped round the bent, shrunk figure which had once been that of a tall woman, while the yellow old lace of her ruffles and head dress flapped about her shrivelled hands and creased and crumpled face. She looked him through as he came up to her, and then she rose with the slow stiffness of her years, but there was no stiffness in the cordial tones of the cracked but still resounding voice with which she greeted him, as her young neighbour and friend.

She bade him sit down beside her and began to talk of horses and dogs, of which in truth he did not know much. But as most young men have at their command some sort of vocabulary where these interesting lower animals are concerned, and as she led the conversation, the circumscribed character of his information did not become conspicuously apparent. She went on to farming, of which Mr Miles had been talking to the squire of Whitehills, and on which his mind had been naturally dwelling a good deal since he came to the place. Lady Fermor in ruling for her lord had done a considerable amount of high handed farming for him. She was quite competent to speak on the rotation of crops, on short horns, South Downs, and Berkshire pigs. And her listener would have followed her vigorous, if one sided details, with comprehension and tolerable interest, if his attention had not been distracted by the obligation of listening for a coming footstep, varied by an aroused disturbed apprehension—since he was not acquainted with the habits of the dwellers in these regions—that Miss Compton might not appear or dine with him and her grandmother as he had counted upon her doing.

At last his came in, advanced straight to him, and with an outstretched hand and eyes raised in his face, and without the slightest semblance of insincerity, that she was very glad to see him. At that moment he felt as if it would have been a relief if she had stayed away, he was so dazzled by the vision before him, and mingled with the dazzling there was so little self assurance and so much trepidation—approaching to discomfort. He had seen ladies in full dress, as he had seen feasts before, but both had been at a distance and he had never seen any lady like Mrs Compton.

His were an Indian maslin with a little bunch of blue field hyacinths at her throat, agreeing with the turquoise brooch that fastened them, the turquoise earrings and bracelets, and the turquoises set in the handle of her ivory fan.

Sir William felt abashed by the fair sight. He shrank secretly from the notion that he might be "paired with her, which seemed to him not unlikely from their similarity in age, and because there were no other young people present. He was not aware that his rank and importance as a stranger awaited Lady Fermor to him, and that his was destined, as a matter of course, to be the only other guest present a middle aged Major Pollock from Knotley.

Lord Fermor, though in fact younger in years than his wife, was too feeble to take his place at table. The company formed a parle d'inter, somebody said, which was a statement as mysterious as any sentence in a Chaldean manuscript to Sir William, but he swallowed it with courageous stolidity, as he did many more things. He sat at the right hand of Lady Fermor, and continued to hear her opinions on farm stock and the grum markets. He was not asked to carve. Her ladyship had accepted a fashion which chimed in with the disqualifications that had long been invading the powers of the host and hostess of Lambford. Everything was carved at the sideboard. There was actually nothing to disturb the guest, whom her ladyship delighted to honour, in his proper business of dining and listening to his companion, unless he let his eyes and thoughts stray to the couple opposite. He had conceived an instant aversion to Major Pollock, which subsequent inquiries justified. He was a gentleman of decidedly objectionable antecedents, whose only merit, if it could be called a merit was that when a young man he had stood by Lady Fermor in the miserable crisis of her history. She boasted that she never forgot an old friend, therefore Pollock continued an habitué of the house, though in this instance the wicked had not flourished like a green bay tree. The Major had played what might have been a pleasant, but what had also been an unmistakably loving game throughout the greater part of his life. His ungilded sins were not of such a remote date as to have sunk into partial oblivion like Lady Fermor's one especially—an affair at a London club, which his fellow men had decided to be of an aggravated character and had insisted on regarding with righteous indignation—had very nearly done for the gentleman. This was true even in the wilds of Latham, to which he had returned with his fallen fortunes, setting up a bachelor's household—fastidious only on the grand questions of meat and drink—in a house which belonged to his family in the market town of Knotley.

All these parings of biography Sir William picked up and fitted together later. His dislike to his as a rule with his burly person, exceedingly black hair, twisted moustache, and crow's toes, was purely instinctive. Sir William had not even the excuse of finding Major Pollock on a detestably friendly footing with Miss Compton, such as the gentleman's freedom of the house, and the unceremonious terms he was on with Lady Fermor, might have warranted. It was clear that even Miss Compton's unsophisticatedness and good nature rebelled against the mingled leer and sneer which constituted Major Pollock's odious expression where women were concerned. She looked as if she had an uneasy sense—similar to the old picking of the thumbs—of something evil, beyond her power to cope with and remedy, in her vicinity. Even a neophyte could not mistake the constrained civility of her bearing to her partner at table. He submitted to take his cue from her, probably with the sullen, cowed notion that Lady Fermor, who kept all that remained of her graceless satellites well in hand, approved of her grand-daughter's conduct in this particular, and did not choose that a notorious black sheep should approach too closely to the girl.

The contradébut of the evening occurred when Sir William drew back his glass, a third time, as ■ was about ■ be filled.

"What ■ it, Sir William?" cried the old woman of the world, puzzled, through all her accumulated knowledge, at this marked instance of abstinence. "If you will not have Château Margeaux, try Madeira, or do you prefer dry Champagne? We must have some brand that will suit you. Let me help you myself."

"Thank you, my lady," said the incorrigible Sir William, not troubled by the form of address, but showing symptoms of agitation at the hospitable contention which he foresaw awaited him, and which was inexcessibly painful to him, "I don't drink anything except water, I never do."

"Not drink anything except water!" exclaimed Lady Fermor, in so high a key as to have attracted the attention of the whole party if it had been otherwise engaged, and not lying in wait for any general discussion, "I have heard that the old, under-bred temperance movement is spreading in odd quarters, and making the noise in the world which empty tomfoolery always makes. Acton," naming her rector, "has taken it up—Bonds of Hope, coffee houses and all, 'for the good of his working men,' he says, as if his working women never enter an ale-house, or as if his claret has anything to do with their beer. But you are not a parson, there is no earthly call for you to serve as an example."

"It is not that, it is my own look out," he stammered bluntly, fidgeting and crimsoning, thinking that he was badgered, and conscious that his temper was rising, but striving to bridle it in such a presence, "a friend made me promise."

"Oh, bother such promises!" interrupted Lady Fermor, with impatient scorn, "I wonder you pay heed to such stuff. Some officious idiot has taken advantage of you."

While he listened—amidst what seemed to him the splendour of the Lambford dining-table, with its blaze of lights, its glittering silver and crystal, its sweet flowers and dainty cheer—there rose up before him the interior of a soldier's hut, and the spectacle of Jen worn out by her efforts to save him, pleading with her last gasp that he might redeem himself from destruction.

His manners had not that repose which stamps the caste of Vere de Vere. He lost command over himself. His blue eyes sparkled like steel. "I will do as I choose in what is nobody's business save my own," he shouted, looking round him fiercely, "and whatever you or other gentlefolks may think of promises, I will keep mine."

He brought down his clenched hand with violence on the table.

The effect of a sudden thunderclap so loud as to warrant the suspicion that the house had been struck, might have borne some resemblance to the shock Sir William produced. Lady Fermor, possibly for the first time in her long life, sat open mouthed, with her shaking hand—arrested on its road to a bottle, which a servant was presenting to her, lying orthodoxly on its side.

Major Pollock swore a private oath, which had to do with a "canting brute," champed his moustache to prevent an audible "Haw! haw!" or a snailing reminder of his warning of what might come of ladies having anything to do with the scum of a barrack yard such as he had known, even though this man had been discovered to represent a baronet and squire.

Ins looked half frightened, but her eyes shone.

The servants, not unaccustomed to extraordinary demonstrations at Lambford, preserved their composure, though they were posed by a novelty.

Sir William, who had become as pale as he had been red, rose to his feet. "I have to beg every one's pardon if I have given offence and been insufferably rude," he said, with proud humility, inadvertently glancing across at Ins. "Everybody knows what I am come from, that I have grown up a rough chap, unfit for such company."

Lady Fermor interrupted him. She had been looking him through again, and now she put her weak hand, with an imperative gesture, on his arm, as a signal to him to sit down again. "My dear boy—you will suffer the word from an old woman," she said, a little hoarsely, "let the matter rest. You shall never be interfered with again, though you should take it into your head to eat pulse as well as to drink water. I could have washed, for your own sake, you had not adopted this freak, for it will be against your making your way in the county. You see I speak plainly in defence of my opinions, though plenty of people will tell you they are not worth defending. But the affair is your own, as you say. If anybody is called on to apologise for getting up a row, I think I ought to figure as the guilty person. But I have lived more than eighty years a summer instead of a winter, so what would you have?"

"Nothing, nothing," he protested incoherently, "you can't suppose that I want you to excuse yourself, that I did not guess you meant kindly by me, or that I sought to dictate—save the mark!—to anybody."

"Well, then, we'll let the argument drop and the dinner go on in peace," said Lady Fernor, with the quickly restored philosophy of a once-practised judge of appeal in dinner and card-table squabbles.

CHAPTER IX—THE CARD TABLE

LADY FERNOR showed no diminution of favour to Sir William because of the sharp skirmish that had followed his introduction to her house. She would never have forgiven a woman for persistent opposition to her will, and the consequent outrage on conventional good manners. But her estimate of men had always been as far apart as the poles from her judgment of women. She liked men to have wills of their own.

When she rose from the table she took Sir William's arm, availing herself of his support instead of her old ally's aid, or her grand daughter's shoulder, or her own stick, to help her to reach the drawing room, where she still kept her new friend by her side. She improved on her lectures on agriculture by presenting him with sketches—pungent, though kept within bounds—drawn from her circle of neighbours.

Once Major Pollock tried to strike in with a malicious inquiry whether Sir William still interested himself in military matters. The public found men in every branch of the service favouring it with their experience nowadays. It might be worth while to get Sir William's opinion on recruits, or rabons, or the like. Major Pollock felt sure he would weigh in and would receive all the attention he deserved.

Sir William had from the first looked askance at the half-pay officer—who, by the way, had never seen more distant regimental quarters than were to be found in Ireland—and now knit his brows in perplexity and annoyance. But Lady Fernor promptly interposed and put a stop to the cross examination. She was more than a match for a creature like Pollock, and she would show him what he should have for his impertinence in daring to plague any person she protected. "We will have no shop talked here, Pollock," she said with grim decision. "Indeed, your theories should be so antiquated, and, if I am not mistaken, some of your recollections of your old regiment so disagreeable, that I recommend you not to attempt to compare notes with Sir William here or anywhere," a significant reminder which caused the gentleman to retreat with a scowl.

Tea and coffee were brought in. Major Pollock read the newspapers sulkily. Mrs. fitted like a white butterfly through the great gorgeous room.

"Play or sing something, child," cried her grandmother, and then from the grand piano, massive like the rest of the furniture, though the murch of time had reached the instrument in its corner, there issued for the intruder not the bravura strains which the once strong fingers of Lady Fernor had forced from the cracking strings, but the music of the spheres wistfully rising and softly falling and dying away, songs with words and without words, by Schubert and Mendelssohn, Chopin's passionate, pathetic Polish mazurkas, quaint tender ballads by unknown singers in the far off, misty past. He on whose ear every note thrilled, would sooner have faced the cannon's mouth hot with the death warrants of battle, than approached uninvited the gulfish figure behind the heavy barricade, even though he had been freed from Lady Fernor's detention.

Though Lord Fernor could no longer take the foot of his table at dinner, he tottered into the drawing room on the arm of his valet. The peer was a bent wreck of a man, with lack lustre eyes, and a tongue which still wagged at intervals, no doubt, but had ceased to be under the sure control of the brain. He looked so pitiable an object, that Sir William sprang up, as if he, a young man in his strength, were fain to salute age in its last mournful decay.

"Come along, Fernor," cried Lady Fernor in what had been her view halloo voice, "you are as fresh as a daisy this night. We'll have you following the hounds again, one of these fine days."

"If you say so, my lady," piped Lord Fernor in his thin treble, showing his toothless gums, with the ghost of a smile for the woman who had been his ruin and was his last stay, "then it must be all right. But where are the card tables?"

Cards were the sole means of excitement remaining to the couple, and to do the two justice, it was more for a necessary stimulant, than from an unholy greed of gam, that Lambford had acquired its last bad name for play. Lord Fernor's encumbered rent-roll was still more than enough for their fast diminishing expenses, and would last their time, while Ins was the only descendant of the two to profit by their acquisitions. There was an heir to the barony and entailed estate who was a nephew of the present Lord Fermor, his first wife having died childless. But though the reigning peer and his second wife consented to accept Mr. Mildmay's tardy overtures, the master and mistress of Lambford cared nothing for their successor, naturally. They regarded him as looking out for their deaths, and taking stock of what was to come to him, every time ■ showed his face at his future place.

Major Pollock had thrown down his paper to be ready for action, though ■ received no further encouragement from his host than a peevish, scantily civil, "Dear me, Pollock, have you ventured out in this east wind? I rather wonder at you, but since you are here, you'll help us with some game or other."

"All of us have not your privileges, Lord Fermor," said Major Pollock dryly, "but it is always something to be of use."

"I am afraid to ask if you play cards, Sir William," said Lady Fermor, with the drollest suspicion of timidity, which was yet perfectly sincere, in her voice and manner, as she spoke to her next neighbour in a tone half doubtful, half insinuating.

"I have played," he admitted, "but I may not know any of your games."

"Nonsense, mon cher, I will teach you," she said gayly.

"No, Pollock, you are to have nothing to do with the lesson," she interposed peremptorily, to prevent a quick movement of the Major in their direction, "Sir William is to be my pupil, and my opponent when he has learnt his lesson, do you hear? I don't want any interference with the course of instruction which I propose to give him."

"Very well, Lady Fermor, you shall make your little game," said Major Pollock, retreating with a shrug and the beginning of a snarl worked off by the relief of delivering an unpleasant double entendre, "I may as well take myself off, and face the east wind which has incurred Fermor's displeasure, since I cannot even have the comfort of finding myself useful."

"Boah, Pollock," exclaimed the old lady, who belonged to the generation of women that had taken delight in addressing men freely by their surnames. In fact she was even now dropping the formal "Sir William," and, somewhat to his surprise, calling her newest fancy "Thwaite," as his old commander's wives had done. She was not out of humour. She had just been gratified by Sir William's concession to card-playing. She desired to make amends to her old ally. "You are not going to set up being thin-skinned ■ this time of the day," she rallied him, "you know I don't like my lord to play without me at his elbow, since he is not able for too much excitement, and wants me to keep him in order, don't you, Fermor? But there, you may tackle him to-night, and Ins will help him with his cards."

"Thanks," said Major Pollock. "It will be an unequal match, I shall have to put forth all my skill against the combined forces of Lord Fermor and Miss Compton. Besides, don't you think"—he passed behind her chair and dropped the words into her ear—"it is late in the day for me to begin ■ play the parts of dry nurse and keeper?"

She frowned with rising wrath, but she shook her fan at him the next moment, "You are a queer creature. You have gone on finding fault with the ~~fact~~ on which your bread was buttered, ever since I have known you, and as that is neither to-day nor yesterday, I fancy I must put up with you to the end."

Sir William ran the most imminent risk of convincing Lady Fermor, against her will, that he was a blockhead of the first water, for the same couple that had threatened to play ducks and drakes with his powers of attention and response during dinner, now formed part of a trio, with only two little tables between him and them. Major Pollock, whose sight was failing, sat turned to one side in order to catch the full light from the lamp on its stand just behind him. He did not serve as a screen to shut out the view of Miss Compton and her grandfather from the furtive gaze. Dewy youth and decrepit age sat side by side, as Ins marshalled her grandfather's cards, put them into his fumbling hands to play out in their order, and marked his numbers for him. She devoted all her care ■ Lord Fermor, as if she would look as little as possible at their antagonist.

Major Pollock did not play with the scornful, reckless indifference that he might have displayed, had there not been golden stakes on which his eyes gloated; for he was a broken down gentleman, up to the neck in difficulties, as everybody knew. But Ins did not wish him to have her grandfather's money. Major Pollock made her very angry by the want of feeling and reverence with which he took ~~off~~ ~~now~~ and then, the scarcely conscious old man's pitiable weaknesses, turning them almost openly into merciless ridicule. She believed he dared not have done it, if Lady Fermor had been disengaged enough to see what he was about, but he dared to do it before her—Iris, in mean revenge for being set down ■ play this poor little game of bérigue instead of being allowed to play a higher game.

As a rule Iris was not called on to assist at any of the Lambford card tables unless her grandfather and grandmother were alone, when they strictly limited their necessarily tame diversion to taking from Peter to give ■ Paul. It was the first battle she had fought on her own—that is on her grandfather's account against an unscrupulous adversary. She regarded the field as unworthy, but she stood by her guns and showed no want of courage and determination. Young as she was the protective instinct was already strong in her. All that Sir William understood of the pantomime was that Iris's hostile face was flushed and her lovely bow of a mouth straightened and compressed. If he could only have seen beneath the soft fine rings curling like a child's hair on her forehead, he would have discovered that the big brow which ought to have been smooth as ivory, was ruffled and rumped with intentness and vexation.

The young man could not imagine that the girl cared any more than he did for the little heap of sovereigns with which, at Lady Fermor's suggestion, he and she had also adorned their table. Any former experience he had enjoyed in this line had been in trials of chance of a nature little better than pitch and toss, and in betting on such races as some of his officers had managed to get up even in India. His losses had never been so deadly as ■ imbue either himself or Jen with a horror of the propensity. But he could see that Miss Compton had enough to try her. Not merely was her grandfather inclined to be aimlessly restive and to remonstrate without any distinct notion of what he objected to, with regard to every card she sought out, and number she marked. Between the deals, Lord Fermor clouded memory invariably reverted to an awkward subject of inquiry. "Who is the youngster playing with your grandmother, girl?" he demanded irritably, over and over again. He spoke as if the knowledge had been wilfully and injuriously withheld from him, and Iris had to hasten to reply in a succession of explanations delivered, with regard to Lord Fermor's deafness, in full ear-shot of the object of his curiosity. She bit her lips and looked in an opposite direction as she kept saying every time, 'It is Sir William Thwarte, grandpapa.'

'And who the mischief is Sir William Thwarte? never heard of him in all my days, grumbled the instable questioner.

'Oh Sir William who has succeeded ol' Sir John, and his little come ■ Whittchills.

"What! Is Sir John dead? Why have I never heard of it? Who the dickens will ■ next I wonder?"

She would not laugh because Major Pollock was grim, maliciously without scruple or disguise. And if that grin were observed either by Lord Fermor or Sir William, it might be enough to exasperate the innocent offender into a frenzy, or ■ cover the still more innocent victim with confusion of face. She bore the results on her patience and temper wonderfully, but it lost her girlish gravity give way, yet even in yielding to the irresistible provocation, she did not join in Major Pollock's laugh. She looked across with half-shy fineness and laughed a deprecating appeal to Sir William who coloured to the roots of his hair as he smiled slowly back to her. She was like an angel, Sir William vowed, with a swelling heart and he was inspired and emboldened to take a step on which he would not have ventured earlier. When the game was finished and everybody rose, he happened to be standing near Iris for a moment. In that moment he had "the impudence," as ■ called it afterwards, to speak to her for a second time aside, to beg her pardon specially.

"I am sorry for what took place during dinner," he muttered. "Lady Fermor has been good enough ■ look over it, but I behaved like a sulky brute."

She glanced up at him with a light kindling in her hazel eyes, her face grew grave, but it was very gentle and sweet in its womanly gravity. She spoke with generous impulsiveness, "Don't apologise, I am sure you did quite right."

The Greek Iris was said to cut the last strand of human destiny, ■ refresh the parched earth by pouring down rivers of waters from the lowering clouds, and then to glorify them with all the colours of the rainbow. But this English Iris unwittingly knotted instead of cutting a terrible tangle in a poor mortal's career, poured out the beginning of a flood of trouble and sorrow on his devoted head, and then shone above him in incomparable radiance, ■ if that could have brought any balm to his woes.

Revelation 21:1-27, and 1 Cor. v

CHARACTER is always determined by the affections. When we know what a man loves, we can decide what the man is. Let a man's religious "views" be what they may, yet if he loves money supremely, or if ambition, appetite or vanity sways his motives, then we pronounce him covetous, ambitious, sensual, or vain. In like manner as we characterize the scholar by his learning, and the patriot by his devotion to his country, so when we hear St. Paul say, "the love of Jesus Christ constraineth us," we can recognize the secret of his Christian heroism. And so it is that God seeks our hearts—for when the heart is given, all is given.

There are two methods by which sin can be prevented. It can be suppressed by force, as is done when a criminal is confined under lock and key, or it can be driven out by the introduction of another and more powerful affection. It is obvious that God could suppress evil by force, for He could turn into lunacy the intellect which has been made the base instrument of wickedness, or paralyze the drunkard or sensualist, who makes himself a curse to all who know him. But thus to deal with men by force would be destructive of the grand purpose which is being accomplished in the education of the world through freedom. It would render void the work of leading men possessed of the knowledge of evil, intelligently and willingly to choose the good. Therefore, it is not by external force that evil is to be vanquished, but by the higher and surer method of winning sympathy for the right, by winning the heart for God.

Again, there is only one way by which love to God can be produced and, with it, the God-like character. No one can be made to love another through any mere command. The most potent monarch earth ever beheld, though armed with instruments of torture that could terrify, or holding all the wealth of empire for his bribe, could not by the arbitrary exercise of such powers force the love of the weakest child. The little world of a human heart cannot be controlled at will. Its laws defy external pressure. Neither the thunders of Sinai nor the offer of the joys of heaven could of themselves produce love for the good, the pure and the holy. There is but one way of approach to man's sympathies:

his heart must be won by that which appeals to his affections. Love must constrain love.

And it was thus—(oh, Mystery of Divine Goodness!)—that God sought us. We may falter as we utter it, so ineffably strange does it seem so to speak of the Infinite in relation to the Finite. Yet if the greatness of the Infinite God is not to be measured as we measure space or time by magnitudes of extent, but is rather to be reckoned by the scale of moral goodness, then let us pause as we realize the meaning of the Incarnation. For it was not by startling us through a display of material glory and of irresistible force, nor by thrusting an abstract system of truth on our obedience, that He approached us. But He sent His own Son who came in that form which could best appeal to our humanity. He came as a man to men, and through human speech, human thoughts and affections, He whispered the tale of Divine Mercy. He emptied Himself of all those tokens of Divinity which, in dazzling us, might have kept us back in astonishment and awe. He came "without form or comeliness" and raked everything (if I may hazard the expression) upon the power of love to win love, and on the force of goodness and truth to create a response in each man's conscience to the will of the Father. Love uttering itself in deeds, looks, words—in the grand eloquence of joy and sorrow, keeping nothing back, but sacrificing self in order to bless, thus has been the power of God to bring us home to Himself. When threats of law fail, Incarnate goodness touches us. A life lived in the flesh constrains us. The will is yielded because it is won.

Let us beware of looking for some other kind of compulsion. It was thus the Jews asked Christ for a sign from heaven to compel their faith. But Jesus answered, "An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign—but no sign shall be given them." If they would not receive truth because they saw it to be true, if they would not love goodness because appreciating its excellence, then a lightning flash might terrify or astonish, but it could not make truth or goodness worthy of acceptance. So was it that Abraham, when asked by Dives to send Lazarus to his five brethren, is represented as replying, "If they hear not Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." An apparition might startle, but it could not make holiness more beautiful. And we also may ignorantly wait for signs from heaven—for some feeling of peace or assurance, while every day we reject Him who is reasoning with us of goodness and truth. Or we may seek the constraint of some external authority, rather than open the heart to spiritual conviction. But there can be no sign higher than that of the Son of man living and dying for us. Nor can there be any authority so divine as that of His love and mercy and truth commending themselves to our heart and conscience in the sight of God.

Read Isaiah 43: 1-8 1 Peter 1: 3-11

There is an obvious distinction between the existence of a moral quality and its manifestation. The brave or patient man is not made brave or patient by trial, for the rush of battle or the weight of suffering only draw out and make apparent the heroic qualities which had always been there.

This distinction may teach us some lessons regarding God Himself. Scripture often speaks of the greatness of the love of God never having been fully manifested to the intelligent universe until it was revealed in the gift of Jesus Christ. It does not represent God as having then loved for the first time, but it asserts that not till then was it made apparent that He "so loved the world." Let us see in what sense this can be true.

Every moral quality has its own appropriate form of manifestation, and each one has a particular kind of trial whereby its special strength is proved. The circumstances which bring forth bravery are different from those which are appropriate to purity or truth. The trial of Job was not the same as that of Abraham, because patience and faith, while akin, necessitate different conditions for their display. Now, just as danger is the kind of trial suitable for revealing bravery, or as patience answers suffering, so sacrifice is what is appropriate to love, and which can alone make manifest its greatness. It is when it is called to give forth that the depths of love are revealed. We can therefore assert with all reverence that while the love of God was displayed in numberless methods from all eternity, yet the greatness of His love was proved by a new measure when to principles and power, there appeared that which showed not only that God loves, but that He so loves as not to spare His own Son.

The manifestation of the glory of God is, indeed, the mighty end for which all things have been created. The material universe may thus be regarded as an unrolling of the nches of His wisdom and power and goodness before the eye of the intelligent beings whom He has made for fellowship with Himself. The very creation of such beings, endowed with the capacity of entering into His own blessed thoughts of order and beauty, of the same nature as that love, which is the back of all regulating laws and all loveliness of form and colour. And thus it would be wrong to live in this world. God's, with its roof of changing splendour and its infinite store of things far and beautiful, without recognising His love. Nevertheless, while all things visible, the vastest and the minutest, speak of love, yet these belong to a different plane from that of sacrifice. In the grandeur and beauty of the outer world we see the glory of Him "Who spoke and it was done," "Who sendeth forth His spirit and they are created," "Who reneweth the face of the earth," "Who looketh on the earth and it trembleth," "Who toucheth the hills and they smoke." But in redemption angels and principalities and powers see the opening of the Father's heart in sacrifice. The highest manifestation of this glory was therefore not through the dazzling wonders of Him who possesseth and sustineth all things, "Who clothes Himself with light as with a garment," and "Who measureth the ocean in the hollow of His hand," but in Him Who, while thus possessing all things, "yet for our sake became poor," "Who thought thus high yet "made Himself of no reputation," that by a love which humbled itself, even unto death, He might redeem man to eternal fellowship with Himself.

But even to speak of sacrifice in connection with Deity must, however scriptural, strike many minds as derogatory if not irreverent. "What can this earth," they may ask with no small show of reason, "be to the Maker of things? Is it not less than a speck in an illimitable universe of worlds? What can the troubles and sufferings of this feeble race of mankind be to the Almighty One? When we measure humanity by the awful magnitudes that surround us, are we not forced to recognise that we are nothing and can be nothing in His sight?"

But it may be urged in reply that this objection is founded on a pagan rather than a Christian conception of the greatness of Deity. There is surely something nobler than callous power, something more divine than unfeeling magnitude. The majesty of power unapproachable and indifferent is not so worthy of adoration as the majesty of power governed by a love which can humble itself to behold and care for the things that are in heaven and on earth Goodness that is infinite in its intensity must always appear loftier and more awing to moral beings than the mystery of a bare self-existent self-centred Deity And if to win an intelligent response to His all holy all loving will from creatures endowed by Him with freedom of choice, and whose sympathies must accordingly be led back from evil to righteousness if this is a more God-like result than the creating of mere things by a stroke of omnipotence, then in the unfolding of the mind of the Father in the gift of Jesus Christ methinks we have the sublimest measure and manifestation of Divine character and glory Truly, 'in this was manifested the love of God towards us, because that God sent His only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through Him'

Read Job xx 1-13

When St John says "There is no fear in love perfect love casteth out fear He that feareth is not made perfect in love We love Him, because he first loved us, he practically solves many of the difficulties connected with the much disputed doctrine of assurance of faith This evening we shall consider chiefly that part of St John's statement which characterises the fear which is cast out by love.

It is described as a "fear that hath torment" There is a fear which love only deepens—for it is that fear of reverence which springs from ever profounder views being entertained of the infinite glory of God Any form of confidence that is destitute of such reverence, must be the result either of presumption or of ignorance The angels who veil their faces as they adore, represent the attitude of all devout beings Their holy awe is the consequence of their deep and wondering apprehension of the Divine Majesty But the fear which is taken away by love is of another kind It is that tormenting dread which is connected with anxiety regarding our personal relationship to God Most persons can recall some experience of its power, and the instances are only too frequent in which its influence has led to terrible extremes of religious melancholy and despair

Now if we consider the character of "the fear that hath torment" we notice that (1) It is better than indifference Some sign of life, albeit a sigh of pain, is better than the passionless apathy of death However distressing the anxiety may be, it is better to be in earnest about the solemn questions of existence than to pass through life like "dumb driven cattle" (2) Again, under certain circumstances this tormenting fear is natural There are assuredly many persons, who under the sweet influences of godly training in a Christian home, grow up in such happy confidence towards God their Father, as never to experience the difficulties which beset the awakening of religious thought in others And I recognise such self-unconscious Christian growth as what would be the rule instead of the exception were Christian baptism followed up by its proper fruit in Christian training But there are too many differently circumstanced, whom the experience of painful religious anxiety is natural When for the first time they stand face to face with the questions of existence, and when the sense of responsibility to the unseen God presses upon the conscience, and they find no solid ground for confidence, then is it to be expected that their first impressions should be of the character of the fear that hath torment (3) But if this fear is natural, it must be looked upon as the symptom of a feeble spiritual condition As physical pain betokens the presence of weakness or disease, so does this terror indicate an unhealthy state of Christian life God does not wish His children to be afraid of Him He does not give them 'the spirit of fear, but of power and of love and of a sound mind' (4) This tormenting fear is essentially selfish It is not so much God that it seeks as a sense of safety It deals with the work of Christ, not so much as a revelation of the unsearchable riches of the divine goodness, evoking the response of love and obedience but as a ground of personal security The desire is to feel safe, rather than simply to know God, and to love Him with self-forgetful gladness And accordingly out of this miserable selfishness of desire springs a correspondingly selfish theology of calculated securities, and arbitrary beliefs, as if the whole question of salvation were nothing more than confidence in the validity of a commercial transaction Christian life ought to be delivered at once from this selfish terror, and from this no less selfish creed It is quite true that even the lowest type of religious terror, met by the declaration of a gospel which proclaims nothing higher than a mercantile view of the atonement, may gradually lead through the confidence that is inspired to a higher and purer love, but they are in themselves ignorant, and often morbid True assurance of faith should arise in another manner. The "fear that hath torment" should be cast out, not through an appeal to what is selfish, but by enthroning love on the conscience and heart. The gospel gives confidence not by giving such an answer to the selfish cry for safety, as may be no better than an echo of our own selfishness, but by revealing that "perfect love which casts out fear," and evokes the response of love. "We love Him because He first loved us."

FEBRUARY 24TH.

Read Isaiah xxxi. 1-5, and 1 John iii. 23 to end.

There are few subjects on which greater confusion of thought prevails than that of Assurance of Faith. It has often been the watchword of much fanaticism, and it has also been the object of as fanatical a dislike. The truth appears to lie between two extremes.

1. Assurance of faith seems to be put in a wrong position when it is made a necessary sign of a state of salvation. There have been periods of religious excitement when an exaggerated emphasis has been laid on its necessity; and the result of such teaching has been most dangerous to sensitive minds, leading them to search for this sign of their security rather than to look to Christ and such truths as are of themselves peace-inspiring. The wish, in such cases, is to feel sure of one's self rather than to have the sureness of Christ, and presumption or despair has been frequently the bitter consequence. But assurance of faith is not taught in Scripture as being necessary to salvation. When St. John speaks of "the fear that hath torment," he does not say, "He that feareth is lost," but "He that feareth is not made perfect in love." So, too, when he speaks elsewhere of the possibility of "our own hearts condemning us," he adds, "God is greater than our hearts and knoweth all things;" teaching us that God may have far more loving thoughts about us than we ourselves entertain. Our Lord, in like manner, at once answered the request of the man who could not say "I believe" without the prayer, "Help thou mine unbelief." I am certain that there is a large proportion of the humblest and best Christians, to whom it would be as death to be separated from the God they love, who yet shrink from indulging in the language of assured confidence because savouring of a certain tone of self-assertion.

2. But while this may be all true, we must also remember that assurance of faith is not only possible, but is commanded in Scripture. St. Peter exhorts believers to "make their calling and election sure." St. Paul blames the Corinthians because they did not "know their own selves how that Jesus Christ was in them." "The Spirit itself," he says elsewhere, "bears witness with our spirit that we are the children of God." The apostles had this assurance themselves. "I am persuaded that nothing can separate me from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord." "I know Him whom I have trusted, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed to Him against that day." St. John's Epistles are full of his own confidence and of that of the believers he addresses as to their "having passed from death unto life." If an assured sense of personal salvation is, on the one hand, not necessary to salvation, nor to be urged as a condition of acceptance with God, it ought, on the other hand, to be recognised as a possible, even natural experience for all those who have truly "known and believed the great love wherewith He hath loved us."

3. And this leads us to the one source of all assurance of faith. "Perfect love casteth out fear. . . . We love Him because He first loved us." The history is brief and plain. The interchange of love with love destroys all tormenting fear. The process is just the reverse of that fanaticism which primarily directs attention to some consciousness of an assured faith, rather than to the grace and goodness of God revealed in Jesus Christ. Whatever dread may have been experienced by the Prodigal as he left the far country, all such terror must have been banished when he felt his father's arms round him, and recognised the love that had met him even "when he was a great way off." All fears about self or security would then give way to the joy of restored filial affection. And it is thus that God would have us brought back to Himself. If our assurance of faith be real it must be founded on no calculations made at a distance from God, weighing merit against demerit, or punishment against punishment, but must arise from frank surrender to the love and goodness which has sought us in our forgetfulness and sin. It would be a bad sign of a child were he to be ever puzzling himself whether he is safe with his father. The interchanges of loving friendship should cause all such distrust to vanish. Confidence can never come from processes of self-examination and morbid introspection. As is light which can alone banish darkness, so it is love which can alone banish fear. When we "acquaint ourselves with God," then we are "at peace." Instead of becoming the plaything of our own shifting "feelings" and "experiences," we then learn to forget ourselves, and to think most of Him who is our reconciled Father in Jesus Christ.

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST.

A Modern Romance

By SARAH FYLLER, AUTHOR OF "CROLYNNE JACQUELINE," "LADY BELL," ETC

CHAPTER X.—LADY FERMOR'S NEIGHBOURLY WAYS.

THE squire of Eastham did their part by Sir William Thwaite. They all paid their respects to him and held out the right hand of fellowship, declaring that he was not nearly so bad as they had expected, and that now he was "in William and all that," the past had better be forgotten and he should be treated as if he had been born, cradled, and schooled in the purple. It would be hard to say exactly what the squire had expected, or what they thought of themselves. Some of them were clownish enough and not without wild ways of their own in their out-of-the-way retreats, though they had worn pink coats, sworn over grouse, handled old plate, swaggered in dining rooms and dozed in drawing rooms, ever since the middle aged men were boys.

But of Sir William's fellow squire and nearest neighbour, every one was too old to be a natural companion for him. The way of the modern world and the poverty of Eastham rendered it impossible that the county should support a population of young men of the higher rank. These lads, including the heirs of estates, were all drafted off betimes into regiments or ships, to eat their dinners in the Temple, to wear white surplices and be potted or pined as curates, even to figure in the upper walks of trade in the larger mercantile towns, or to make shift in the colonies. The absentees who could turn up at set seasons only fluttered home like the birds the young men came to shoot in September, or like the children and schoolboys at Christmas, or on any private emergency or demonstration in the visitors' respective families. What remained permanently was a small residue of half-payers, pretenders to a better position than they were entitled to, scampish young fellows of whom nothing could be made, who took their cue from Mayor Pollock when they were within hail of Knotley. Some of these promising young people were supposed to be trying better class farming or brewing, since there was a great brewery in Knotley, while they plagued the hearts out of their unfortunate parents or all who were responsible for the delinquents.

With both the old and the young sets representing the squirearchy, Sir William Thwaite's total abstinence, in drinking only water or tea, was, as Lady Fermor had easily prognosticated, a great stumbling block to familiar intercourse and social intimacy. A rumour spread abroad that Sir William had made a vulgar clamour in refusing to drink wine at Lady Fermor's table, where the choicest vintages had been wont to flow in bucketfuls. Lady Fermor had condoned the offence for her own ends, but her neighbours, who might not have the same inducement, did not feel inclined to excuse the outrage. The most sober of the elder men did not scruple to declare that total abstinence was suspicious and ominous, not to say bad form. The fellow must have suffered from D.T. Depend upon it there would be reaction and an outbreak sooner or later. There was nothing like moderation in all things. The young men in great disgust voted Sir William at once a low prig, a dissenting minister in disguise, a wet blanket, a beastly interloper. The favour of the last mentioned critics would not have been particularly desirable for the man whom they sent to Coventry. Poor Jan's prevision was prophetic where they were concerned.

But Sir William was lonely in his new estate, and he would have been still lonelier had not Lady Fermor proved faithful to her fancy and approached him as she knew how, in a variety of neighbourly ways. He had touched some softer chord in the hard, cynical old heart. Whether he recalled an honest young brother who had believed in her when she was still deserving belief, with whom she had been hand and glove in her early girlhood, or a lover for whom she had felt the dawn of fervent respect and regard, though she had tortured and tried him, till for his honour and happiness he had parted from her for ever, or the boy she might have borne instead of weak and whimpering girls, who could perhaps have saved her from the depths which had left her what she was, there was no question of the kindly feeling for Sir William which underlay her mocking defiance of the neighbourhood, her determination to appropriate the new corner, and the rapid formation in her mind of certain worldly schemes where he was concerned.

Lady Fermor kept up briskly the acquaintance which had been begun. She invited Sir William constantly over to Lambford and she returned his visits by unceremonious calls, to ask what he was doing, what he thought of the weather for the tunnies, whether his lambs were in good condition. She would disturb the absolute silence of the long, low roofed drawing-room, out of which Lady Thwaite had been wont to allow complacently — much could be made in this age of revivals. It was such a delicious place for window-seats, screens, fans and pot-pourri. As it was now, stripped of Lady Thwaite's reversion of the screens, fans and pot-pourri, and under the superintendence of an unexceptionable housekeeper like Mrs. Cray, who hated what she termed litter, the room was quickly assuming a stiff, stony and desecrated aspect. But it did not chill or daunt Lady Limer, who claimed her afternoon tea there, and looked round her on the family portraits which were hen-looms, the couple of Sir Joshua's, the fine fragments of old tapestry, with a freedom which even she had not attempted when the room owned a mistress.

Lady Limer declared without a flicker, rather with aly satisfaction, that she was a great deal too old for people to peck about her any longer, or to mind what she did, so that she could drop in on a young friend to see what he was about without making a rumour. She never took her grand daughter with her, on her "larking expeditions," but Sir William was in his Compton's company every time he went over to Lambford. He accepted the invitations. Mr. Miles's early warning proved of no avail. Will Thwaite had not been so nice in the company he had kept that he should consider himself too good for these people, one of whom was the sweetest and truest of God's creatures. So long as he did not fail in his promise to Jen, he did not see what harm could come of his going where he was made heartily welcome. He thought more of that after the first visit than of the rank of Lord and Lady Limer or the grandeur of Lambford.

Sir William did not mind losing a little money, he supposed it was the way of such houses, and he could afford it. For that matter, Lady Limer had interposed her shield, from the first evening on which Sir William had gone to Lambford, between him and wholesale plunder, as represented by Major Pollock and birds of his feather. She kept her young neighbour very much to herself, either as her antagonist or her partner at the card-table. She would consent to amuse herself by winning more or less of his guineas, but so long as she could help it there should be no turning inside out of his pockets, no inoculating him with the incurable disease of play, no instilling into him the arts of a blackleg in self-defence. He should come and go at Lambford without his being the worse for it, even if his being the worse were not likely to interfere with a half formed plan of hers.

Yet Sir William did not respond to Lady Limer's friendship without some instinctive reluctance. Whatever his youthful errors had been, his better nature was repelled by her, as by an old woman who was very far from what she should be. In spite of her gradual social whitewashing, she occasionally made revelations of herself which revolted him. He resented her lack of affection for his grand daughter, which he had been quick to notice, and felt aggrieved by it, though it was no business of his, and so far as he could judge, the indifference remained unmixed with any form of ill-will. But it also belonged to his nature, both in its strength and its weakness, that he should be touched by any kindness shown to himself. Lady Limer, be she what she might, was awfully good to him, and one day finding her alone among the tulip beds on the terrace at Lambford, tottering along by the help of her parasol, he was moved to an impulsive offer of his strong young arm, the first he had made to a lady in his life.

"Won't you lean on my arm, my lady?" he said, awkwardly enough, "if it ain't too great a freedom in me to propose it."

She took his arm instantly, and patted it with her claw of a hand, as she chatted to him.

Another day he was shown into the back drawing-room—by a bungle of the servant's, Sir William immediately concluded—when he found Lady Limer almost swallowed up in wraps, in an easy-chair, with one foot swathed as in the garments of a mummy on a stool before her, in the clutches of gout. He stopped on the threshold with a brief word of apology and regret, and was about to beat a rapid retreat when the sufferer hailed him.

"Don't go away, Thwaite," she forbade him. "Come forward, and let me see a hale and hearty fellow who has all his senses, and is neither worn out, nor deaf, nor blind—even Pollock has to use glasses in private, though the fool goes blinking without them in public. You have not had a twinge of my enemy. Ah, your day will come. Well, perhaps not, if you go on drinking ditch water, but I dare say worse will happen to you. Sit down and tell me what news is going, or read the papers to me for a bit. I am sick of that hole of a dressing room of mine, to which I have been confined for three days. I dare say I shall die some day without my friends having had the grace to inquire for me. No, I know you had not heard, but whose fault was that? Now that you are here I am going to make you useful. See there is a draught blowing from the window, draw the curtains more to my side.

He did as he was told humbly enough this time. It was one of those rough fellows who are gentle in sick-rooms. Indeed he had a greater knack at nursing even than Mrs. Compton possessed. This gift he had come to know both in and out of hospital in the course of his soldiering. He had been repeatedly told off as the orderly appointed to wait on a sick comrade or officer, but he had certainly never waited on a lady under an attack of gout before. Alas, as he said to himself, for me, for me! When he turned and saw better than his own eyes, glittering with fever and pain the pale, cold, yellow face, the constrained attitude the helpless ness, he was full of pity and of a craving to be of service to her.

"It is not a joke. Have you had your medicine? Don't give you the best thing? No, I am much sorry. I think if you would let me, I could lift you right up and set you down again more comfortably like."

"Ah! think you my dear fellow that is ever so much better. I am in the very best corner of purgatory now. How long would it have been before my hot if a servant or a doctor would have inquired it? Of course a well-meaning lady like this would only kill herself without being of any atom of use to me. There will you tell to me? For the truth is I am not up to talking. You'll find some of the morning papers on that table."

He fell into the trap it trap it was, instantly. He brought the paper, and read fluently in a stentorian but peculiarly distinct voice, which had lost its self-consciousness for the moment. He picked out carefully the paragraphs relating to Russia and war and the last report of the Moscow Express. Then he courageously attacked the columns that set forth a trail for murder. He was satisfied that these were the portions of the paper in which she would take most interest.

Sir William read till Lady Farnham, growing drowsy, dismissed him with thanks and praise.

"I don't know what I owe you, since you are sending me off to sleep, which is the very best thing you could have done for me—what sawbones has tried in vain to bring about with his abominable opiates. You have read what any rational, unaffected person would like to listen to, and I have heard every word you said, for you don't chimp like a bird—mouth like a pig's trotter."

The last bit was directed at Mrs. Acton, the Rector who, in seeking, realising to be eyes to his discreditable old parishioner, had neither succeeded in affording pleasure nor conveying profit.

But to day Lady Farnham's heavy eyes were moist as they glanced after her nurse and reader. She was a good deal of a slave and wished to feel sufficient for herself but it was so long so very long since she had been served with any service she cared to accept out of pure disinterestedness. It will with some kindly cut for her at the bottom of the act.

CHAPTER XI—RIVAL CLAIMS

LADY FARNHAM soon became aware of the degree to which Lady Farnham had diverted Sir William from what, after Lady Farnham's advances on it to have been his grateful, trustful reliance on the only person near who had the most distant pretension to being connected with him by a family tie. The absence of any natural Northampton influence over him, and the fact that he could not find anything in common with the late Sir John's widow, were disappointing truths in Sir William. The conclusion might have been held a compliment to her ladyship, still it was a piece of great stupidity in the young man since Lady Farnham was so popular in the neighbourhood. She was not bluer or more esthetic than the custom of the day required. She was not stuck up or puritanical. She was a woman of society, a charming woman in most people's estimation, the secret of whose charm was that she could suit herself admirably to any commonplace, tolerable company, in her own class of course.

The cool appropriation of Sir William by Lady Farnham was a lawless interference with the rights of another and an arrogant tramping upon them which savoured of the woman's old machinations. But Lady Farnham, though she had all her life shown that she could look out for herself, was no match for her neighbour and knew it, which was a considerable proof of Lady Farnham's cleverness. Six felt provoked and aggrieved, but she did not dream of entering the lists against the successful competitor. If Sir William Farnham had the bad taste and the bad moral perception—and after all, what could be expected from him?—to accept Lady Fermor for his sponsor and to turn to Lambford for countenance and guidance, unquestionably he was at liberty to do so. Thanks to her mother's lawyer and the late Sir John his widow was not by any means dependent on the favour of his successor, though she would have liked to have done her duty by him and by the fine old place over which she had presided, which she had once hoped would have descended to her son. But if Sir William showed himself incapable of appreciating her motives and was infuriated, there remained nothing more to be said.

Lady Thwaite in her calmness and reasonableness was, as Mr Miles had vouched for, not at all difficult to get on with, up to a certain point, and if you expected nothing further, you would not be disappointed. She had at once suspected Lady Lennor of ulterior designs. "Trust the naughty old woman not to do anything without having a sufficiently selfish end to serve," said Lady Thwaite to herself. The preponderance of a certain quantity of brain over heart in her prevented her from so much as conceiving the lingering womanly regard with which Sir William had regarded his unfeared monitor. "What is it?" pondered Lady Thwaite. Does she want a fit victim for the intermittent gambling that still goes on fitfully at Lambford? I know I—who make a rule of never stiring anything save gloves—is forced into losing three guineas the first time I dine there. I did wish I had paid heed to poor Sir John and kept clear even of a decent black sheep or that I could have pled, like demure Miss Acton, that the Rector would not permit me to play for money. Is Lady Lennor bent on making a match between Sir William and his Companion? I did think, when they met here, that if it had been anybody else I should have said she seized the first opportunity of taking his homely merriment and laying herself out for him. I wonder how it would do! It would be a great improvement for a cousin, and she would not rule with a high hand. She is the style of grand simplicity who would never forget old favours and former conditions—for instance, that I had been kind to her, and had been mistress of Whitehills in my day. Ah! but nice as she is, there is that in the blood, while the association might prove a fearful risk in its utter unavailability. Beauty and the Beast, the Princess and—not the Laughly Page—the ploughman Squire."

After further thinking over the subject, Lady Thwaite saw herself called upon to attempt a talk with Sir William. She would drop a gentle hint—double barreled—against the danger of houses—of which Lambford was not the only one in Eastham—in which play was an essential element, and against the rashness of marriages which involved bad connections.

Lady Thwaite sent Sir William one of her little notes, summoning him—with the most disarming compelling confidence in his obeying the summons—to come over to Netherton either for luncheon, afternoon tea, or dinner as he felt inclined, to discuss a tenant difficulty with regard to one of the farms set apart for her jointure, about which by the way, she was a hundred times better informed than he could be. "Men like to be consulted whether they know or not," she reasoned. "Poor Sir John always did it used to put him into a good humour, and the less he knew, the better he was pleased. I am right to begin by asking Sir William's opinion, and young Sam with views about a new lease will do as well as any other subject."

Out of three evils Sir William chose the least, the slight reflection which ladies reflect at afternoon tea. Though he never drank tea then for his own part, it was not such a novelty to him as many another thing. His sister Jen, the washerwoman and her cronies, had taken tea at all hours! There was the touch of nature which seemed to make the whole of women kin. Beside he had been fortunate before on such an occasion. Who knew what graceful figure might pass the windows what flower-like blossom before his ravished eyes, what eager, gentle interposition save him from a horrible strain?

It is a curious study both for philosophy and satire, to recognise how soon a man of ordinary aptitude and fair opportunities accommodates himself outwardly to a change of circumstances. There may be a thousand things, petits soins of etiquette, tricks, turns and shades of behaviour which take years, many generations to acquire, which, when all is said, women learn sooner and better than men. But it would have been either encouraging or mortifying, according to the creed or temper of the individual, for an onlooker to have watched the way in which Sir William had accustomed himself, on the surface at least, within three or four months, to a new style of living. He now sat, or lent back, very much in his ease apparently, in one of Lady Thwaite's fauteuils, and looked round with calmly observant, she could almost have said critical eyes, on her treasures, the orchids from his own green-houses, the Banksia rose tree covering the door of the conservatory with its myriads of minute flowers. But she did not have him there that she might privately remark on the improvement in his manner and bearing, which, save for his sulkier carriage, owed little or nothing to his training. The only sign she gave of noticing his progress, was that the faultlessly well bred widow, in her faultless weeds, did not again break down by committing the solecism of converting her guest and kinsman into a butt.

Lady Thwaite discussed fluently the grievance of young Sam Withers wishing a new lease to his farm already, and settled the question without much help from Sir William, whose one idea, as yet, in such difficulties was Mr Miles. Then she glided on to general topics, chatting easily and brightly. There was not much going on in the neighbourhood just then—there was not much at any time. Eastham was a little slow, even those who loved it best—and she hoped Sir William would grow fond of his county—must own that. But it would have been a blessing if the quality of slowness had been the only old fashion which still held its own in Eastham. Was Sir William aware that a considerable—she might say a lamentable—amount of high play survived in every class, with the most distressing results in some cases? The Rector could tell him tales of its demoralising effect on many of the farmers. She trusted Sir William as a new comer would set his face against the practice, when he met it in their circle.

Sir William in his gravity was not without a sense of humour, and now that he was beginning to get over the shocks he had sustained, the humour had room to play at times. "I beg your pardon, Lady Thwaite, I think it is just because I am a new-comer that it is not for me to interfere, now, you are an old hand—"

"An old hand!" she swallowed the brutal plain speaking. "I would gladly try the little I can, but except abroad a woman has nothing to do with play."

Poor Lady Thwaite! she was an innocent woman dwelling among green fields after all. She had little suspicion of the re-appearance of the mortal malady among the grand dames of the generation. Such a relapse consumes the ruin of old historical families, brings to the hammer broad acres, and scatters art collections which have taken centuries to acquire, and have been kept together through changes of dynasties and national upheavals, to be gambled away by the turning up of a knave or the loss of an ace.

"It is a vice," continued Lady Thwaite in her simplicity, "which you men keep very much to yourselves in England. But Lady Fermor is an exception. Is it not a melancholy spectacle to see a poor old creature like Lord Fermor, and a battered, bedizened old woman like Lady Fermor—they say she came out at Almack's—cling to cards as their chief good, when one would think the couple might be turning their attention to other things?"

"To their graves or their winding-sheets, I suppose?" Sir William rose to irony. "I thought the Fermors were your friends," he said, repeating the objection he had made to Mr Miles's opinion, as if the higher Sir William rose in the world the more social hypocrisy he encountered. "They can take their choice, I fancy. If they are too stiff to walk or ride, and can't see to read, and are not able to entertain their friends in any other way, ain't cards made for them, and the like of them, to pass some of their slow creeping time?"

She hastened to explain herself. "I quite agree with you that cards, or backgammon, or chess, in moderation, are excellent resources for old people, especially if they are deaf. Don't imagine for a moment that I am so narrow or silly as to object to cards in themselves. Why, I used to play draughts with Sir John as regularly as the evenings came round. It is perfectly depressing to come across the board now. But it was play for high stakes according to people's means, that I was deploring. That has ceased at Lambford it can only be lately. Oh! Lady Fermor has been a dreadful woman," exclaimed Lady Thwaite, as if on the impulse of the moment, shading her face with a fan which lay at hand. "One cannot speak of such things, unless when an old married woman, as you rightly regard me, opens her mouth to put a stranger and kinsman on his guard. There is no end of skeletons in that house—very grisly skeletons. The first Lady Fermor died mad. A visitor staying in the house locked his room door and shot himself, after quitting the card-table. He was a young man engaged to be married, the only son of a widow, and he was a clergyman—I am sorry to say, when he yielded to the madness and could not face the disgrace and destruction store for him. Poor Iris Compton! is very sad for her, but although she is a charming girl, as good as gold, and all the horrors happened before she was born, still the reproach attaches in some measure to her—a portion of the shadow falls on her. It is grievous, but it cannot be helped."

It was a rainy afternoon in May, and he had been sitting with his long legs and his boots—not free from mud—stretched out before him, while he glanced out of the window nearest to him with a mind half-wandering from the conversation, because of her he might see among the turrets, in spite of the rain which had only begun to fall. He drew himself up with a suddenness that made Lady Thwate start, and turned upon her a frowning brow and a hot cheek. He was unused to any diplomacy in conversation; he only knew that he hated to have his friends called bad names—all the more, perhaps, if they deserved them. But it made him furious to listen to the most distant insinuation of a stain on the spotless plumage of a white dove like Miss Compton. "I have found Lambford a jolly house," he declared definitely. "Old Lady I cannot be having like a mother to me. Why do you smile and shake your head? I am sure she is old enough to be my grandmother." At that word, which slipped out inadvertently, he coloured more violently than before, and began to flounder in his speech. "You don't mean me to take up old scandals, and to distrust everybody who speaks me fair and makes me welcome, because they have not always been on the square. I am not their judge, I have no enough of my own to answer for—if you only knew. As for Miss Compton, I will not speak of her, she is not to be brought into such talk, only she is as much beyond reproach as the stars in the sky. Good bye, Lady Thwate. Oh! I am not displeased. What right has a fellow like me to be displeased or to object to any word which a woman—a lady—likes to say of her friends in her own drawing-room?" and out he marched.

She rose, went to a window, and stood looking after him as he walked fast across the sweep and down the little avenue. She laughed a little at her own dismissal. "Yes, he has dismissed me, I have not sent him away. He might have taken an umbrella, but I suppose he has stood sentinel in the wet like the man in Tennyson's verses. It is a plain spoken Sir Will, yet I am not sure that he saw my drift. It is evident he is hit by his Compton. He has not the self-control or delicacy to maintain a becoming reserve, not to say to throw dust into people's eyes. If the old witch at Lambford does incline in that direction, I dare say the match is made. Poor Lady she will have many a yawn and many a blush—though she has been accustomed to a dead alive household—to submit, and to look aside when she cannot look straight before her. She will not have everything her own way—when all is done, in spite of his present blustering worship. I could imagine that a hero from the ranks would have a prematurely passionate courtship while it lasted—to be followed by a reaction of coolness, neglect, and rudeness, even when he did not beat his wife like a coal heaver. Now Sir John was calm and deliberate in his well-bred manner, one always knew what to do with him. He did not change much, though he could be cantankerous at times, poor old soul! I don't know—she may be good enough to stand it all, and bear with him while she is making as much of a gentleman as can be made of him.

"If he is to marry somebody soon," Lady Thwate cogitated further, "I would rather a great deal have him than any of the Acton girls—only Lucy is old enough, the others are too young, and Lucy has not a soul above clown juggling, Sunday-school teaching, and poor people's clubs—in excellent eldest daughter or wife for a clergyman, but not a wife for a squire. She would have neither time nor tact for taking the lead in county society, and she might drive the squire to become dissenter or the worst of landlords, out of pure contradiction. Such things are heard of nowadays, noblemen holding forth at conventicles and squires declining to interfere between farmers and labourers, and refusing to put another foot in the village, where their wives are for ever pottering and making paupers."

"Murder and Ninny Holms might have the monster for a trick on their brothers, or a wager, but that would not do at any price," Lady Thwate pursued her musings. "If an alliance be unmistakably impending I shall throw my weight, such as it is, into Mrs Compton's scale. I suppose she would go up to town for her trousseau. I might chaperon her faut de mieux, if Lady Fernor did not choose to accompany her granddaughters. The old lady will not give in, but she cannot attempt many more journeys. I should not dislike it. It would have to make Sir William do a good deal of reforming, and I should be the best qualified person to advise the couple."

"There! I believe Lady Fernor has infected me or suborned me," the schemer ended.

"I could not have believed that I should be so easily reconciled—not to say that I should take kindly to Sir William's marriage—to another Lady Thwaite at Whitehills. Heigho! But it is natural that I should continue to take an interest in my old belongings, at the same time he and she ought to be much obliged to me, as I don't doubt they will be. If my poor boy had had the price would never have gone away entirely from me, I should have been living over there still, till he was of age, and it was his marriage which had me pinned. Oh, my little baby!" cried the woman with a momentary softening. "I thought for a brief, blessed time that you would grow up like other babies—that we should make a man of you. But it was not to be, and there is an end of it. Where is the use of idle lamentation? The Rector would say it is as unchristian as it is unwise."

Lady Fernor had often astonished—nay, astonished—the world, and she was to astonish it again, by boldly proclaiming that she was to return to it for one night. She would not put herself about to go up to town during the season, while she must have Iris present at next year, but she would have gay doings once more at Lymington—unexceptionably gay doings this time, though she did not supply the qualification. Her grand-daughter would be twenty-one in June, and Lady Fernor would have a ball in honour of Iris's birthday. There would not be a multitude—nothing like the festivities when she and Lord Fernor kept open house for a week at a time in a close run of succession, or when the hounds hunted five times in succession at the different fox-covers within twenty miles round to oblige the Duke, who was staying at Woolston Lodge. Tom Milmay, Lord Fernor's nephew, would be down about that date to look around him, carry snout with the steward, lounge through the offices, and take solitary rides over the property, picking his long ears all the time. They would see whether his wife could find an excuse for not accompanying him on this occasion. Lucy Acton would be at Iris's beck, as was her duty, and the younger girls could come, if they were required. She might count on the Hollis girls, who were never behind when any diversion, within the scope of girls, was in the wind. That meant also their father and mother. Were not those she had mentioned women enough? Very well, Lady Thwaite was to have her house full in June, and she would bring further contributions, if more partners were wanted. Leave the men to Lady Fernor, she could undertake for them, since Fernor was hors de combat. There would be Thwaite first—the ball was as much to introduce him as Iris—Lady Fernor said, with full comprehension of the sense in which the words might be taken, looking her listeners full in the face while she spoke. Any man Tom Milmay might like to bring down—they would not be much worth, still they would be men—old Hollis, and the train of fellows his girls kept at their heels, the officers from Birkett—they were a new set, but every man would jump at his card. Ludovic Acton need hardly be counted, but since he had been blown up by torpedoes he might come, and old Pollock must not be left out.

Nobody was more taken by surprise at the compliment paid to her than Iris. It was an acceptable compliment to a healthy-minded young girl, lending a singularly natural life, but any exultation she was tempted to feel became a good deal subdued after a comment of her grandmothers. It followed on Iris's expression of grateful thanks, and concerned her grandfather and grandmother should suffer from the disturbance of their usual habits. "I thought you and I don't pull in the same boat Iris," said the old lady with her usual look and tone. "You have not given me any particular reason hitherto to think so. But don't make pretences that I cannot take in. No girl that ever was born would heed the comfort of Noth and his wife when her first ball at home was mooted. Make the most of your youth and what good looks have fallen to your share, and any other good thing that comes in your way, while they last. Be sure they will not last long, and that you will have a piece to pay for them. But leave me to take care of myself and my lord. I am still fit for that and more. Pray don't waste your compassion upon us. I for one should hate it, and I think I can answer for Fernor."

Did the reader ever receive a welcome gift and a slap in the face—figuratively—from the giver at one and the same time? The process is not pleasant, especially to a sensitive, affectionate nature, and goes a long way to spoiling the gift, only, happily, custom blunts pain, and youth is elastic.

Lady Fernor chose that she should be the person to apprise Sir William of her project, making him one of her first confidants. When he received it doubtfully, rather hanging back from the promised boon than jumping at it, as she had described the action of the jubilant officers over at Birkett, she took him in hand, and pursued him with her design on his company. She had a number of tête à têtes with him on his resolution to oblige or disoblige her. These tête à têtes waxed positively mysterious to the on-lookers—of whom Major Pollock sneered the ugliest sneer, and Iris smiled without a grin of anxiety because of her grandmother's great fancy for poor, rude, sober, agitated Sir William.

Sir William's agitation increased under the pressure put upon him, and the notions deliberately and persistently introduced into a mind which though very far from weak, was at its best single rather than subtle, and was narrowed by defects of education and absence of experience. His assailant, on the contrary, was as rich in the experience that served her purpose, as she was destitute of misgivings and scruples.

Sir William, still drinking water, grew practically an intoxicated man, dazed, to begin with, in his intoxication, but at every moment liable to a violent outbreak of his disordered faculties. It was at this point that he started for London with the acknowledged intention of spending three or four weeks there, but he was pledged to return ■ Whitehills in the end of June, in time for Lady Fermor's ball.

Any one intrusted in the manoeuvre could detect that Sir William went with Lady Fermor's permission, if not at her instigation. The last conclusion was the more likely, since she had been heard to dwell with some tenderness on the stupidity of lawyers, even those in greatest repute, and their common failure in securing for clients the very advantages of which they stood most in need, which would be really available to them.

But what did Lady Fermor send Sir William ■ London for? Did she fancy that knowledge of life and the world, was imperatively called for ■ finish Sir William Thwate's hitherto education? Greenhorns of young squires were wont ■ be sent up from the country to have their eyes opened, and learn how few people they could trust, and what a "precious difficult" task it was to take care of themselves. Were rides in the park, and visits to Lord's, and running the risk of being black-balled by a West end club, judged the proper materials for lending a speedy polish to Sir William's original style? Did Lady Fermor's intention of bestowing her grand-daughter on the gentleman induce her to intrust him, or all people, with the delicate responsibility of buying a birthday andou for the heroine of the ball? Left to such taste and judgment what might ■ not be? A hideously set necklace, fit for ■ South Sea Islander, ■ brooch and ear-rings as big as a plate and a pair of cups and saucers, a new watch, which could be worn by an alderman?

CHAPTER XII—A HAND IN NEED

THE simple truth was that Lady Fermor had counselled Sir William to run up in a hurry to London, and, though it was the season, to live as quietly as he could manage it, not even calling at Messrs Miles and Dickinson's office, unless he felt bound ■ do so, for he would have little enough time for the business he had in hand, which was to take private lessons from a dancing master. Lady Fermor would furnish him, by the aid of a friend, with the address of the best man for his purpose. While he was about it, he might as well go to a riding master and get a little training from him also. With regard ■ the last obligation, Sir William had the liking for a horse which reigns in the bosom of ninety-nine out of a hundred young men. Sir John, as a matter of course, had kept up a good stud at Whitehills long after he was incapable of taking exercise on his cob, or having anything further to do with horses than being driven out for a carriage airing. It had been one of the first of his possessions of which Sir William availed himself, and ■ the credit of his courage and natural instincts, he had neither come to serious grief, nor made a notorious spectacle of himself. His seat and hand might not be all that could be desired, there might be traces of swallowing a ramrod in the saddle as elsewhere, still Sir William did not look amiss on horseback, while his attainments in this respect were deserving of cultivation.

There is no one to tell what heart Sir William carried to his studies in the freshness of early summer in London. Whether he did not attack the first, mostly with spasms of shamefacedness and self-ridicule? Whether he were not often tempted ■ abandon it, and find milder and nobler teaching in that great, wonderful world of stone and lime, which he had not known hitherto, except in the most cursory, one-sided fashion?

Only this is certain, that a strong, sweet inducement was beckoning him on ■ submit to what was like the binding and teasing of Samson by Delilah, after she had subdued the giant with the spell which he himself had put into her hands.

At the same time absence and leisure for reflection, since he was not capering in one fashion or another all day, and all night to boot, did something to dispel the fumes of the intoxication, under the influence of which Sir William had rushed off to town.

He strolled many a night with his hands in his pockets and a pipe instead of a cigar between his teeth, while not a mortal knew him, past houses in Piccadilly and Park Lane, lit up that gentlefolk might hold their revels. He pushed his way through the crowds collected to stare at the carriages, as they rolled up to the covered entrances and put down the occupants—of whose fine feathers and sparkling stones the mob had a glimpse while the guests passed into the flower-lined halls and went up the embowered stairs to the ball-rooms, from which the music of brass bands kept sounding. The fellows, who seemed still more the masters of the situation than the footmen, as they rid themselves of their crush hats and other encumbrance, and proceeded to join their partners, were perfectly at ease, and had not been condemned to undergo an absurd ordeal for a full grown man, or to feel hot and cold in such scenes, as he would feel, even after he had taken lessons in dancing. He hoped desperately Lady Fermor would not turn round and "peach," and Mrs. Compton hid him out. His heart swelled with angry despair of ever feeling on a level with born and bred jackanapes. It seemed to him that he was going on the course and entering the lists for the sweepstakes, with such a mere shred of a chance that his failure would be accompanied with the roar of ridicule and shouts of derision which he had often helped to raise on other courses. Yet there were drops of blood in his veins which gave him some title—as the squire of Eastham had long ago admitted—to enter such houses, where his acres and title put him, so far as they were concerned, on an equality with all, save those of the highest rank, in these assemblies. In the process of becoming a finished gentleman, Sir William was, to a certain extent, disillusioned and rubbed the wrong way, so that when he returned to Whitehills in good time, and found as the first thing that awaited him, a note in a shaky old hand from Lady Fermor, to tell him that Lord Fermor had been seized with one of his attacks, and been so ill, that though he was now better, the ball was unavoidably postponed for a month, he said to himself he had known all along this was how it would end.

It was in vain that he had sought by despicable efforts to cut the figure of a monkey obeying the directions of an organ grinder, who did not even play his own organ, and who put his scholar through his paces;

as if he had never been drilled, as if he had not been a drill sergeant in his own person, and ended by finding fault with his step and his carriage! He was rightly served for his folly. What a grin it would call forth if it were ever known to his old comrades of the barrack yard? for whom, though they were rough chaps enough, he was fit to own he sometimes secretly sighed. He missed his mates, among whom he had crowded, instead of hanging his head and singing dumb. Where was the good of a title and an estate if they only made a man feel small among other baronets and squires who had worn their honours all their lives, whom their grandeur came naturally, who knew what to say and do on every possible emergency? Yet with one notable exception, Sir William did not see that the circle, the members of which ought to be his associates, were so very much better than their fellow creatures after all.

Sir William put no faith in Lady Fermor's assurance that the bill was only postponed for a short time, since she would have Lord Fermor as well as when the affair was proposed, before many weeks were over. She could not make him live or die, though she had driven rough shod over many a barrier, and stuck at little in her time. It sounded heartless and profane in the old woman, who had wound him round her finger, to pretend to such power.

The young man was suffering from one of the fits of reaction which beset many people who have far less reason for them than he had. His loneliness, which had haunted him in town, struck even more coldly to his heart when he returned to Whitehills. He was not without invitations to his neighbours' houses. Lady Inaute and Lady Fermor were not the only women in that part of the country who decreed that Whitehills, even with Sir William into the bargain, was not to be despised. Every woman with marriageable daughters, from office bearing, harassed Mrs. Acton, who was as poor as a many childed church mouse, to Mrs. Hollis, of Thornbrake, who was rich in her own right, and rich in her husband's, felt bound to cultivate the newcomer for the good of womankind, so far as to see what could be made of him. But Sir William, though he might kick against his subjection at intervals, remained loyal to his chief patroness. In the present state of matters at Lambford he would not mix into company. His unvarnished refusals, together with the extent to which he had previously availed himself of the Lambford hospitalities, tended to confirm the rumour which was already afloat that in newspaper language there was a marriage on the lyfs between Sir William Thwate and Miss Compton.

This so-pampered one source of attraction—that of a disengaged eligible young man—but filled its place with another. It would be interesting to see Sir William Thwate and Mrs Compton together and judge if there were any truth in the story. Anything serious between the couple. To think that a woman over eighty should step in idly while young couples held back, in order to subject the pair to inspection and win it before their eyes! Here was food for excitement in a dull country neighbourhood, while the question in suspense promised to prove an important agent in filling the Thwate parlour. Instead of a sprightly, of reluctant guests, I only I am, chafing, in her sleeve was in danger of being fully and privately revealed for intentions.

In the meantime, one of the two centres of interest was utterly unconscious of the potent charm with which she had been invested. Her great friend, Lucy Vernon might have given her some inkling of the truth but unfortunately Lucy had been working very hard night to enable the female teacher in the factory school to bring up her pupil to the standard of attainment which should secure a Government grant, and Mrs Vernon was occupied at home and less at the Rectory than usual at this date.

The military discipline which Sir William had known helped his sense of propriety in holding himself aloof from his servants. The one to whom he drew nearest was the journeyman who accompanied his master in his rides. This was an honest sensible lad a countryman, born in the old Whitehills. Sir William and Bill Rogers were about the same age, while Lill was au fait with all the rural knowledge, with which Sir William, brought up in a town, proved sensibly acquainted. And a lad like Lill had at his finger ends the local annals of which his master was profoundly ignorant. From a casual observation now and then, the two took to chatting a little to each other—quite respectfully on Lill's part—about the crops and the crows, the colts and the rabbits. Lill would venture to tell Sir William's attention to this farm, and tell him there had been Wilkines in it, folk said, as long as there had been Thwaites in Whitehills. He would point to that mill, the lease of which belonged to Sir William also. It seemed that night the squire should know what trouble there had been in the miller's family, for the last two seasons, since the miller met with the bad accident, when his arm was caught in the machinery, and his wife was of no use because of 'a waste,' while the eldest son had taken to drink.

Mr Thwate had given a run—it seemed to him—to awaken in Sir William sufficient curiosity about his tenants, with whose interests his own must be inevitably bound up. He was new and strange to the place and life, and he was still startled and shaken by the events and revolutions in the last few months. It was different now, on Bill communicated the information in a simple, more telling manner. Sir William listened, asked questions, even went so far as to certify some of Bill's narratives and make a movement in connection with them. And it must be said of Lill that he did not abuse the influence of which he was now at rather unconsciously.

In order to put in even of his own house, the young of Whitehills continued terribly unsexed. He gave deep offence to Mr Comberbatch the butler, by ordering him—the young man—to be brought into the library and by leaving a book lying beside his plate. Sir William might think of his butler's place, if he had none of his own. It was too absurd for a fellow who had polished his belts and cleaned his boots to make a pretence of being that scholarly. Why the Dean had never looked at a book for half an hour before luncheon, saying, the mere sight of print, hurt on a moral point of view. As for reading, during dinner, of course he knew better. He was a gentleman. Even when his luck were from home he was sensible what was due to the table and the wines—not to say to the cook and the butler. But what could be expected of a squire who drank water like a temperance lecturer? The Dean was an affable gentleman in proper quarters, but Sir William had not half a dozen words to say—except, as Mr Comberbatch had heard, to that lump of a lad, Lill Rogers. Mr Comberbatch had no fault to find with Lill, but what could he tell a gentleman that would be of use to him?

Mr Comberbatch was not a bad fellow himself in the main. He could be just, he could even be ungracious. But he was full of class prejudices, and he had not the breadth of mind to comprehend that while he himself might call even Lill, Sir William as an old jing and humbug of a butler, Lill was Sir William's contemporary, "a nice chap" who would not have been more than "a cut above Will Thwate in the old days."

The long summer evenings tempted Sir William to saunter, generally aimlessly enough, beyond the park, along the country roads. When he passed the way-side mns. of Eastham, the sound of skitties and jovial voices such in the inflections and rhymes of the native dialect, filled the air. But the only effect of the lively turmoil was to hasten the wayfarer's steps, and cause him to turn into more secluded by-paths. There was one which led by a high matted-together hawthorn hedge, one tangle of traveller's joy and black and green bryony. Beyond lay a long strip of underwood, prized as an excellent covert for game. Sir William knew that to his cost. He had happened to take a turner, which had attached itself to him, along the field path. The seductions of scent had proved too strong for the small animal. She had forsaken her late love, and plunged into the underwood, over a sluggish ditch and through a hole which was by no means large enough to admit her companion. Sir William had hesitated to turn his way through, and here, perhaps, one of his own indignant keepers. He had fought shy of them, as he had fought shy of his retainers generally. And the keepers, especially, were down in the mouth with regard to a master who, so far as they could discover, had not asked a single question about the state of the birds and whether poachers were hard to grapple with on the Whitehills ground. The keepers' importance was as seriously threatened as that of the butler. They were only dimly aware that Sir William had in his day fired at game rather bigger and less safe than partridges and hares. Nor did they suspect that he had been testing the truth of his aim at a target, and had inspected all Sir John's guns with some interest and a clear idea of trying his luck on the first of September, or whatever day was the law of the land and the gentry.

In the meantime Sir William had stood still and listened to a great hurly-burly behind the hedge, and such sharp yelps of frantic eagerness and delight from Vixen, that he was sensible all his whistling and shouting would not bring her back. He feared that dog-slaughter would take place before he could prevent it, and before the perpetrator of the act was cool enough to recognise the intruder, and to realise that the owner of both dog and game stood on the other side of the hedge. However, there are consciences in dogs, and Vixen awakened in time to a sense of the folly and impropriety of her conduct. She sneaked back with her eyes scratched and watering, her nostrils full of sand, and her coat stuck all over with dead leaves, broken twigs, and seeded heads of grass, preventing the usual respectable look of a pointer caught red-handed. Sir William took care not to include Vixen in his further rambles in the direction of Hawley Scrub.

He was alone as he strolled one memorable evening across the meadow land by the Scrub. It was the loveliest hour of the twenty-four, the height of the young summer. The sun had set, but the light was still clear, not only in the west, where rose and purple had given place to a pale amber, but in the rest of the blue sky, bluer than at any other time, as the coin in the ear and the leaves on the trees were greener.

The trumpets of the greater birdwood and the round fairs of the moon daisies, already wet with dew, still stood out prominently among their surroundings, but they were rapidly assuming a character totally different from that they had borne at noon. They were becoming ghostly as by moonlight, and striking even an unimaginative person with a vague impression of something awful, solemn, mysterious in their ordinarily frank, familiar, cheerful beauty. Just so the commonest, homeliest pieces of furniture acquire an altered aspect when seen by the string-lights and shadows of a solitary candle in the hush of midnight or in the half-obscurity of the grey dawn. As for the closed poppies, like big blood drops, and the blue cornflowers, like clippings of the sky, they were growing dim and indistinct in their deepening, darkening colour.

Sir William had a love of nature, though he could not have expressed his feelings on the subject very intelligibly. He liked the look of the place at this season. He liked the occasional rattle and chirp of birds gone to roost, and the utral, drowsy notes of the final evening of the thrush, before the bird gave way to its rival, the nightingale, which were the only sounds that broke the silence.

Presently he came in sight of the waters of a pond—looking steely blue as a stage to its leaden greyness, when the night had fairly fallen. Eastham was so great in ponds and ditches, that it would have looked as if one of its most distinguishing attributes were wanting, if standing water, in some form, had been long absent from the landscape. In June, flowering rushes and flags formed a suitable fringe to these ponds and ditches, while the former were sometimes thickly set with the great white cups of the water-lily, and the smaller stars of the water ranunculus.

But it was neither water-lily nor ranunculus that Sir William was staring at, when he drew nearer the pond, and stepping through the sedges, regardless of the slushy footing, grasped the bunk of deep water. He had his eye on a tuft of coarse grass, among which he believed he discovered the tail of a water rat—yes, it was a water rat, and if Vixen had been with him, there might have been some splashing and rare sport, for water rats had not been much more in Will Fhwatte's way than hares and pheasants. Presently there was a splashing, whatever might be said of the sport, without the aid of Vixen. Sir William's footing gave way, and he fell into the water. It was deeper than he had imagined, with an oozy bottom which yielded to his weight. In a moment the muddy water was far above his knees, rising breast high. He was a fair swimmer, and would have been safe in an open sea, in moderately calm weather, for an hour or more, but this small pond, when he tried to strike out, was like a miniature submerged forest, with roots of trees and bushes, and a dense growth of water plants. He could not free himself sufficiently to swim. He was sinking deeper every instant. He could still keep himself afloat, principally by resting his chin on a convenient but slender willow bough which reached his length, and by clutching with both hands thrust into a thicket of osiers invading the water. But he could not pull himself up, from the nature of the ground and the inefficiency of his support. He had cause to envy his decoy duck, the water rat, and to suspect he might perish with as little grace as he and Vixen would have granted to the denizen of the pond.

Sir William, though he had grown homesick, was not slow to proclaim his case. "Halloa! As sure as fate, I'll be drowned," it is to be feared he said, returning to his vernacular in the exigency of the moment, and with all the volubility which the occasion required, he shouted for help.

To his relief somebody answered him almost immediately from no great distance.

"What's a do? Don't let go. There's no danger."

The last statement sounded weakly flattering, though it was uttered in a loud rather deep voice, which might have proceeded from a man's chest. But on Sir William's shifting his chin by half an inch, he saw it was a woman who was hastening towards him, and did not feel surprised, in spite of his worship of Iris Compton, that she should talk nonsense in such a contingency.

"It's much you know of it," he protested indignantly. "Run and fetch any man you can find. Look sharp, if you want to save me."

"That would be an uncommon clever way of saving you," she retorted, still advancing quickly towards him, "when father ain't at home, and I don't know of any other man within half a mile. Just do as I bid you. Hold on like gum death, and I'll help you out before you can say 'Jack Robinson.' What business had you down dabbling among them water docks? There ain't no wild ducks' nests here, if that was what you were after."

He might have answered her that he had the right possessed by the monarch of all he surveyed, but he contented himself with indignantly forbidding her to come a step nearer to him, as soon as he saw what she was going to try. She had slid half way through the fringe of rushes, and was proceeding to precipitate herself still further, hanging forward with one arm extended to meet his clasp, and the other thrown round a sapling willow which looked perilously slim as a support for both.

"I'll pull you down," he remonstrated. "Do you want me to drown you, too? Do what I told you."

"And do what I tell you, you greedy donkey," she insisted unceremoniously. "Do you mean to keep me hanging here all night? I'll go bad I've as strong an arm as you any day, unless you're as big as Dan'l Bates. There, hold on to the bushes with one hand, and give me the other. Try to get your foot upon that patch of dock, the ground shelves there—I know every inch of it—then spring. Didn't I tell you I'd fish you out? Don't go to come over me with your man's strength again."

Sir William found himself standing dripping like a water god, if water gods are ever shiny and green with duck weed, confronting a strong woman of his own age, and nearly his own height, wearing a black woollen gown and a red handkerchief knotted at her throat. Her head was bare, and her ruffled, dark hair was more conspicuous for its luxuriance than for neatness of arrangement. She turned upon him a brown face buxom even in the weatherbeaten texture and tint of the skin. The full red lips parted and showing the white, glittering teeth, and the well opened grey eyes looking across him with a bold, blithe challenge, formed the most conspicuous features.

His inspection and the thanks he was beginning to utter were brought to a summary conclusion. "You'll have to come straight ■ our house—it ain't a hundred yards off—and strip, and put on some of father's clothes, while I'll throw yours into a bucket. I'll rake together the fire, and you'll swallow a nip of summat hot, or we'll have you took with aguer before we're done with you. Have you heard tell there's aguer in them parts yet?"

He followed her without resistance into the Scrub, which might have been an enchanted forest for him, though he was a clownish squire, and his guide the most primitive and plain spoken of princesses.

She stopped abruptly and faced round on him. She had been glancing repeatedly at him, and she found herself on the eve of a discovery which arrested her. "Rent you the new squire, Sir Wilham, himself?" she suddenly charged him, with a mixture of dismay, distrust, and lurking amusement. "I've been out of the way, at the death of olumtie at the Quarries, for the better part of the spring and summer. Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, I have got into a scrape, and no mistake!" She hid her crimsoned face for a second in rustic affront and alarm, as a child might have done, then looked sharply up and around her, as if she were preparing to luit from the consequences of her lack of ceremony in saving the squire. Altogether her behaviour showed a jumble of genuine-unreasoning mortification and alarm, with a tremulous dash of diversion at the absurdity of the situation.

It put it before her in a more satisfactory light. "I was such an ass as to tumble into that beastly hole, and I believe that at the moment I should have been lying at the foot with my teeth clenched on a mouthful of mud if it had not been for your sense and pluck. I'm no end obliged to you—that's about it, though when I come to think of it, I don't know that there is another humin being to say as much to you on my account. But you'll take me ■ your place and do what you can for me—won't you?—like a kind soul. For, to tell the truth, I don't like to show before my fine servants in this guise." His heart was warm with gratitude to his rescuer. He had found free speech wherewith to address the country girl, and under the influence ■ his freedom, she gradually grew glib as she was wont to be, with only a relapse now and again into consternation—brightened by a suspicion of a frolic, every time they became silent. "What's your name, if I may make so bold?" he asked, as if she were the lady and he the servant. All the time, he was expanding into communicativeness, under the welcome consciousness of no longer feeling dunted and depressed, forced to pick and choose his words, as he had been for the last six months. "What may your father do when he is at home?"

"Oh, I'm called Honor—Honor Smith, and father is old Abe Smith, Abe short for Abcl. He has been one of the under keepers for a lot of years, so that I was born and brought up at our cottage in Hawley Scrub here. But father do be getting old and losing favour with Waterpark, the head keeper, and my brothers did no good, but gave trouble, and father—he were blamed for ■ Ted, he 'listed, and young Abe, he went off to America. Now, father and me—mother's dead before I can remember—we're thinking ■ going out, in one of them emigrant ships, to join young Abe in the Back Woods. That name sounds pleasant, don't it?"

CHAPTER XIII.—A HAIR ON THE DOG THAT BIT HIM

ABE SMITH'S cottage was a tumble down, picturesque, half coloured lodge in the wilderness. The interior failed to do credit to Honor's housekeeping. Disorder reigned over the articles, few as they were, in the family room. The furniture was summed up in an old oak table, which Lady Ishwaite might have coveted, though it was battered and standing unacutely on three legs, a convenient devil chest, into which everything might be stuffed, ■ chair or two—that for Abe an old arm-chair as black as the table, a cupboard with the door half off its hinges, exposing the scanty supply of common comestibles.

But the visitor had hardly time ■ look around on inanimate objects, for, contrary to expectation, the owner of the cottage was at home. He knew Sir William by sight, though Sir William could not profess to return the compliment. Old Abe testified ■ his knowledge by the formality with which he stood up, as fast as his stiffening joints would allow, and removed his cap, at the same time he glanced with a flurried look at his daughter for an explanation, which she did not delay.

When Sir William received a considerable shock as he listened to an entirely new version of the accident.

"I was a walking round the pond with an eye for them plucky ducks that wander all the way over from Mistley Down, father, when what should I see but the young squire wallowing in the mud and water at the very worst place, where Adams met his death. Didn't I just run and cry, 'Your honour, mind what you're about, don't flounder in inch further— you value your life and I'll do my best which is my bounden duty to save you. And sure enough I crept through the crevice and held on by one hand till I gripped the other. You know I'm strong, father, and Sir William's rifle so we tumbled out of the water, and here we are.

Several times while she was speaking she gave Sir William a half-cunning, half-ironical glance of warning and mutual intelligences as she directed him to continue her. Once when she passed close to him behind his father as she was bustling about to make up the line which was lying white in the sea she muttered so that Sir William only could hear.

He liked that way of putting it best.

But Sir William did not like it and stifled his own fact ungraciously. He was a truthful man who had never crumpled a conscience unless in the plainest chaffing. His sister John would not have told a lie to save her life. I suppose it was a sign of their drops of gentle blood, perhaps it belonged to a higher order of gentility.

There seemed the less sense in Honor Smith's easy tolerance, that his father looked at him more with the than with the eye not a man to fly into a fury on a small provocation. He was behaving, to his guest so delicately that it was difficult to separate observation from the deference.

Sir William raised his host by absolutely declining spirits of any destination and defying the consciousness but he was anxious to have his clothes dried for the reason he had given Honor. Here a difficulty presented itself. It was not in his father that Honor had inherited a splendid physique. He was a little hairy man, who in his thick mole-skins more fattened than puffed, and weather-stained skin edgewise looked shaggy all over, like a creature of the wilds and the waters a badger or an otter, rather than in the noblest man. It seemed as if Sir William could have put him into one of his pockets. No argument as to what would be of the slightest use for any use to the master.

"Dear sakes! what are we thinking of?" cried Honor in scorn of her own slowness and forgetfulness. "There's Uncle Sam's old regimental in the drawer of the chest. They're the best we have to offer, sir, and I think Sam was a big man, when he wore them, every way."

Sir William picked him up at the word regimentals and then looked out. What a fool he was to mind a dead man's clothes though they were regimentals! Very likely they did not belong to any regiment of the service he had known. What though he had thought never to wear the Queen's livery again? It was a big lie that he had disgraced it beyond redemption, the last time he had it on in the service at Nalpool when he wreathed the shaggy lion his arm and slung them in his colonel's face. He must put on the red jacket once again at a pinch, unless he cried to be put on his hands with a cue or worse since his teeth were beginning to chafe in his head.

How mistook the squares' hesitation.

Uncle Sam's cloth was as good as new. He said a little hastily, beginning to pull out what had been put away with some care in the drawer of the chest. "He wore a good many puffs above us, so that his tunic is almost fit for a gentleman. I have often been on father to sell it right away but it does be a kind of credit for us to have it, if it were only to show that we didn't all of us our bristling at the wall. And father there has a notion that the thing would be lying away for use and that Ted may pick up and come back some day as smart as them which listed before him. It will happen when the Queen takes us all to a snuff, and a bad after it, at one of the parties. It will be as good as a uniform, then, besides being a mighty compliment, if you will take a turn in them, Sir William, while I am clearing your own suit. Father and I will go out and leave you to the fire and your own company if you'll please shift yourself before the floor is in a swim."

It was clear Uncle Sam had been the great man of the family, and that it was in wishing to pay proper honour to the family the uniform had been brought out for his benefit.

Sir William when left to himself, looked with some agitation at what would have awakened no interest in another man his place, if it had not excited amusement or annoyance. He lifted up the different portions of the dress with a kind of trepidation yet with yearning. It was all complete, though a little old-fashioned. By what appeared a singular coincidence the rank of Sam Smith, which he had not forgotten, must have been the same as that to which William had risen. There were the identical stripes of which he had made short work in his fit of frenzy. He had a glimpse of the old soldier's sword lying gleaming in the half-shut drawer. Sir William dressed himself punctiliously, finding the clothes not far from his fit. Then he looked in the little looking glass which hung, for Honor Smith's convenience, on the wall opposite the window—where a withered nosegay thrust into the neck of a bottle stood on the sill. A thrill ran through him as he regarded his mirror in the glass. He felt at home in the borrowed clothes. He took out the sword and began to make the accustomed passes with it. Ah! that was a deal better than juggling like an idiot to the jangling of another idiot, who could not even ply his bit without the help of another man.

Sir William was disturbed by Honor's knock at the door. He must be quick about changing his clothes, if she were to have them cleaned and even partly dried before midnight.

Was there a spell in these old arguments which became Sir William so well, that he had not to wait for Ade's respectful compliments, since he saw with gratified vanity the admiration which shone in Honor's great grey eyes? How long it was since his beard had grown warm under the influence of a woman's inadvertently betrayed admiration! He was not very vain, but he was sensitive to public opinion even on his looks. In his old estate he had been a favourite, rather a hero, with women, and though he had shown himself particular in his taste, so as to have been something of a lover who had found no humble home, he did not object to the hero worship.

It is to be had chafed him to meet none save critical eyes. He did not believe Miss Compton had ever wasted a thought on his inches or the colour of his hair—only old Lady Palmer had ever made him feel that she found him a well knit comely fellow.

He had not looked so gallant and gay, or made himself so entirely at his ease, for many a day. He sat at the fire and smoked with old Abe, and he told dubious stories of porching stuffles, or told tales of a soldier's life, in which Abe was interested for his son Ted's sake and because of gratifying memories of the brother, who had been almost a gentleman in the under-keeper's eyes, and who seemed to sit there again before him.

Sir William shouted thanks and jets through the half-open door into the back kitchen, in which Honor was so obligingly at work on his clothes. After her part was done, there was still the drying of the soused garments, and this necessitated the guest's further stay, and his taking a share in the family supper, which was pressed upon him with the unstinted hospitality of the host's class.

The meal was composed of choicer fare than might have been hoped for from the rest of the establishment. There were cold roasted leveret pikeon pie, and poached eggs. An explanation was offered of the name of the first, with a little disagreement between the spectators and a few break downs, that a more thoughtful man than Sir William might have come to the conclusion upon the father and daughter were accomplished experts in such apologies. Abe had found a porcher's snare with a leveret in it and he had taken care that the setter of the snare should not profit by his success. The wild pigeons had been brought down by Jeky Mushet's sling. The boy meant no harm, but he must be taught not to take such liberties in future, as Sir William would be shooting both the crows and the pigeons for his own and his friends' diversion. The eggs were plover's eggs, which Honor had gathered as in olden timesley Down.

Sir William heard every word as if it were gospel, and did not betray the faintest suspicion that he was eating savoury food of his own providing—the game pigeons, and pitted eggs which he paid a king of men with Abe among them, for protecting from all spoilers.

Sir William was good company on this occasion. He was as much carried away by reaction, old association and the spirit of defiance which was yet to rise in the man as if he had swallowed bumpers of stone, drink. He joked and rattled off camp experiences. He proved a capital listener to the annals of the woods and fields. He was gay and hearty, until he was really volunteering, a song which had been the usual accompaniment of former merry makings. It seemed as if his later dreams and the very image of Miss Compton were for the moment swept from his mind. At last the play was played out, and Sir William, in his half-dry clothes, took a cordial leave of his entertainers.

The fraternisation had been complete while it lasted, and could not have astounded others more than it did some of the participants in it.

"Did you ever, father?" protested Honor. "If the square isn't one of ourselves, I can't tell who is. Why he has been jack-fellow alike and no man believe with us, ever since I brought him in like a drowned rat. He is the right sort to fill old Sir John's shoes. But won't he make the stick-up ladies and gentlemen stare? Ain't I quick to have been and nabbed him in this way? Now we may laugh in Waterpark's face. If we only go on as we have begun, it may be 'change seats,' the Kings come, with you and he, and we stepping into his grand cottage and no 'Merica for us after all, before the year is out.'

"And you may be Lady Thwaite of White hills—is that the next thing?" inquired Abe, with mild scepticism and sarcasm, for he stood in some awe of his daughter. "And sure enough that will be when the Queen or the Lord Mayor bids us to a feast, or when the world comes to an end, as much the same thing. It's like it is turned upside down already, when a chap like him, have got the property. But don't you let your fancy cut capers and get the better of you so as you'll sup disappointment for your pains, Hon. This here had be come of the people, and no mistake. He isn't the supercilious cut of a gentleman, though the name be. I know and he do belong to the tribe. But he ain't quite one of us neither, not he, though he may favour your Uncle Sam as we're bound to use in the world. The squire couldn't take no drink like a man and so far as I could see he didn't tell no crackers, neither one way nor tother, bouncing or dy which if ever man had a grand chance to do he had. It would be like playing with fire to have to do with he. You could never tell when you had him or when you wanted him. He would be off like a hot when you least expected it. I ain't so cock sure that there bent the making of one sort of gentleman in him, as gentlemen goes, the sort as is blunt—may be thin skinned and peevish, but is as nice about their word as if it was their mark or their teeth. And when I come to think of it, Sir William was as clean as a dook all over, like your Uncle Sam, during the mud he brought up out of the pond. He may let us stay over the autumn, till we take ship to 'Merica. Waterpark can hardly have the face to make a stand about trumphy buds and ends, and think for to turn us out at the Yist, when he knows that you drew Sir William by the ears of the 'ead, as I may say, out of the pond, but that's all the good we're like to get of the adventure, if you'll believe me for your own good, my girl, and I am an old man. I should know summat by this time of the day."

"Like enough father," answered Honora indifferently, as if she were getting weary of the subject, but that's not to keep me from putting in a claim to the squire's acquaintance, and getting a guinea or a five pound note when I've worked for it. Maybe I'll get more, maybe no," she added with a laugh. "Are you going the round of the walks to-night, when Luke Evans is to be the turnstile about two in the morning? If you go, I'm with you. I'm as fond of a rove when timid folks are in their beds, as you can be, or young Abe and Ted ever were."

"The more's the pity, lass," said old Abe in a moralising vein, "though it do come natural to some women as to most men. Your mother now, she were scared in the Quarries, yet she took as easy to the woods as a fish to the water. More by token her brothers were the biggest poachers here about, and Morry he were transported for life, for his share in such a tussle as has not been heard of since that day. Me and Waterpark were in it, and I was in mortal terror I should have to fire at Morry or bear the mark of his bludgion. I here's no doubt company's charity, reflected Abe, going off on a new tack, which yet had its link with the former line of conversation, "wandering about in the dark gets a thought creep and nicker-fying as a man wears up in years, and recalls old mates and old frays."

Sir William, whose habits till now had been as regular as those of any of "the Methody persons" to whom he was sometimes compared, for the first time since his coming to Whitehill, kept his servants up late without previous warning.

Cumberbatch, who had constituted himself his master's keeper, experienced real anxiety on his account. When it was relieved by the squire making his appearance, the sufferer could scarcely go so far as to take the offender to task, but he looked Sir William in the face with such solemn reproach, that the delinquent was impelled to explain. "I stepped into a pond a good bit off, and had to wait in a house till my clothes were dried. No I don't want any supper. No, I shouldn't think of hot brandy and water. That will do." Sir William was himself again, cold and reserved. Will Thwaite, open hearted and reckless, had been left at the cottage by Hawley Scrub. But the squire asked Bill Rogers, during the next morning's ride, what he knew of an old under keeper and his daughter living together in the worst cottage Sir William had seen on his lands.

"They're a bad lot, Sir William," answered Bill promptly, "leastways old Abe ain't what he should be. Old folk will have Abe's come of a queer breed, being a far-off shoot from their squatters as made fire with Kestrelham when great part of it—because of the water lying easy everywhere—was no man's land, given over to the fowls of the air and the fish of the fresh water seas, and to them as liked to catch them. I don't want to tell no tales, but Abe's failings are paper's news and there's a score of his neighbours as will know if I don't, while the man is going for sure across the seas in the autumn. The wonder is that he has been kept so long, but old Sn John—he took it into his head after it were a bit muddled, that Waterpuck, the head keeper, had a spite at Smith, and he would permit no spies, would Sir John, save his own, which were his right like, he being juke and master."

"Is it certain Sir John was in the wrong?" inquired his successor, as if he too were cautious of his likes and dislikes.

"Well, sir, I would not go far to contradict you, replied Bill with sincere respect, but Abe connected himself by marriage with persons notorious that might have been his misfortune more than his fault, but the word went even before Abe's sons were half grown, that he were in league with the porchers, and connived at their snus and shots, in stead of fighting them fur as the other keepers fought them. There could be no mistake about Ieil and young Abe, they soon made the countess too hot to hold them. I never heard of a Smith as was a credit to the family save Sergeant Smith, a brother of Abe's that married when he was in his teens, and did good in foreign parts, and only came home to die, before he was consumed by the rest of the lot."

"And what about the daughter, Bill?"

"Why, if you will believe it, sir, Honor the girl—that is as big and strong as one of her brothers—have took up the trade too and is as wild as need be. She had a bad up-bringing. Her mother, such as she was, died when the lass was in her cradle, but what finished her off, years and years gone, was that a young chip with whom she kept company, had a hole drilled through his shoulder, one September night, and were taken up and died of the wound in Barket's lot. She is the strappingest lass going," Bill said with some lurking admiration, "and I don't say she ain't an honest woman. She's kept men at the staff's end—all but poor Hugue could—and he would be a bold man who would look soft on Honor Smith, or speak sweet to her against her will. She's a regular rindy, nigh as bad as a gipsy. She's never in the house save to cook her father's meals, she aint up sweeping or charring, or even dressing herself fine like other women, not since Hugue met his end, and that is good six or seven years gone, when she was a ship of a handsome girl, but the word goes she can tramp day or night, and keep out of the way when she's wanted, and set a snare, and bring down a bird, and dodge and he and toss off a glass neat—not that I ever heard tell of her being seen in drink—like old Abe's self. That's all I've got to say of them Smiths, if you please, Sir William."

The description did not please Sir William, but he gave no sign. He vouchsafed an explanation to Bill, as the master of the house had offered an excuse to his butler, and he drew an inference which he had already drawn more than once before. "I was indebted to these people last night, Bill. I fell like a big baby into the pond near their door, and the girl you speak of gave me a leg up—when it was touch and go with me, for I had no room to swim—is it I had been the girl and she the man. Of course you did not know this when you spoke, and I didn't ought to have asked you a question without telling you first. But you understand I don't care to hurt the Smiths spoke badly of, after this."

"No, sir, I beg your pardon, sir, I hope you believe me, I would not say a harm of no friend of yours not if I knowed it, for my wages twice told," cried Bill with genuine regret, for he was quickly acquiring a warm regard for his master.

But the servant's private reflection was, "Why, to think of his making friends with them Smiths, as if he were the forlornest wretch in the kingdom, and he Sir William, and the squire of Whitehills, with half of the gentlemen and ladies in the county ready to strike their hands in his, I'll go bail, if he'll only give them time." They may say what they like of his smelling of the barrack yard, and not of the hussars' quarters there, either he's too good for this world, or one sick of his lone position."

Afterwards the servants' hall at Whitehills I repeat all the details of the accident, in the world below stairs does not fail to recollect, in spite of the absence of direct information from the fountain head, what that other world above-stairs has been doing. There judges picked up the additional information that Sir William had been over to see the Smiths, once or twice during the next fortnight. Mr. Camberbatch merely turned up his nose in silence, and thought it was what he might have expected, from a bronce's unseemly preference for a young groom over a middle-aged butler.

Bill too was silent, but he groaned within himself. "He ought to take care of his child. Why don't some of his own kind, the kind he's in now, look after him? There's the old lady over at Lambford, what runs after him is if she were a girl herself, but they do say she's a devil's lump if ever there was one. Why don't Sir John's mother say here till he's served with a wife, — take the young lady with her at Neiberton? — questioned poor I all unreasonably and with a fine disregard of the propriety in the conductment he proposed to institute. — I'm blowed

if I can tell for what the like of she is charged on the estate, if it ain't to do for the squire when he wants her. — I were my lady, I wouldn't take my wages and give no work for them — conclude I'll, rubbing down the horse he was going on with virtuous vigour.

Possibly Lady Thwack's notion of doing for Sir William differed slightly from Bill's, but she was not without a conscience on that point.

A SAIL THROUGH LOWER EGYPT AFTER THE WAR.

By LADY BRASSA. AUTHOR OF 'A VOYAGE IN THE "SUNSHINE"' ETC.

WE left London on the 22nd December 1882 travelling by rail to Marseilles, where we picked up the dear old Sunshine. After delightful visits to Genoa, Spezia, Leghorn, Florence and Naples we reached Malta on the 7th January, 1883 and set sail for Port Said on Monday January the 15th. We had a beautiful day for our start, not a southerly wind and a cloudy sky — but a brilliant sky and a westerly breeze promising us a quick and pleasant passage to Port Said.

The weather during the next two days was perfect, and we glided along rapidly, in almost smooth water with every stitch of canvas set. Nothing of much interest took place, beyond sundry shakings of sails, made necessary by passing squalls and variations of wind. I was suffering a good deal from bronchitis, and was only able to come on deck for a short time in the middle of each day, so that I got pretty well acquainted with my cabin and all the little objects therein.

On Wednesday afternoon (January 17th), things did not look quite so promising. Though the wind continued fair, a heavy easterly swell met us and caused us to knock about a great deal; and before dusk it was evident that we were in for some bad weather. The usual preparations were accordingly made, the two cutters being taken on board, cupboards hoisted, reefs taken in all the sails, and canvas coverings lashed over skylights. Our expectations were justified, for a terrible squall followed, the easterly gale breaking on us with all its fury, carrying away our fore boom, and lifting one of the guns out of the davits, though it was subsequently recovered, with its bows stove in. The anchors were taken in off the rail, sail was still further reduced, and we continued hove-to all the next day (Thursday, January 18th), shipping continued small seas with occasional big ones, though only one or two were of great account. The catastrophes in the china and glass department were numerous and rather serious, the stewards having been deluded by the fine weather into the belief that the usual precaution might safely be dispensed with. The carpenter put the finishing stroke to the various smashes by tumbling off a stool, on which he was standing to reach up a skylight more firmly, right on the middle of the centre table in the saloon, destroying everything on it, including a globe of gold fish, some favourite white china ornaments of mine, and numberless other things, to say nothing of breaking the table itself and the lamp above. Everybody was miserably ill. In the middle of the night, Tom, looking very worried, anxious, and tired—as well he might—came down to discuss what was to be done. It was somewhat difficult to decide, or, rather, there was not much choice, for there was too much wind to scud, even had we been inclined to turn back, it was, of course, impossible to beat and so keep on our course, and there was, therefore, no resource but to continue to lie to. It was a safe, though a most uncomfortable arrangement, for every time the yacht was put about she shipped a certain amount of sea, though nothing of any serious consequence. The gale might last three days, or even more—horrible thought!—or it might break in the morning, so we agreed to wait till the sun rose and see what change that might bring. We were at this moment near Adia, somewhere about the spot where St. Paul was driven up and down for many days. Tom reminded me of the fact last night, but I do not think it afforded me any consolation, though my own feelings make me understand more fully what must have been the apostle's sufferings in a much smaller and less comfortable vessel than our own.

Friday, January 19th—By daylight things looked brighter, as they often do when the gloomy night is past, the worst of the squall was over, and by mid day we were able to get up steam, and head towards Navarino, where we anchored safely about eleven o'clock at night, to the great thankfulness, joy, and comfort of all on board. Have you ever been hove to in a gale? If not, you cannot appreciate the rest, the peace, and the gratefulness of heart with which you find yourself in a well sheltered harbour when all is over, and are able to sink peacefully off to sleep.

Navarino, the ancient Pylos, is a splendid harbour, surrounded by rocks and mountains, which, covered with snow, present a beautiful panorama to the eye, but render the atmosphere bitterly and almost unbearably cold. It is an interesting place on account of the many naval battles that have been fought here in all ages. The Island of Sphacteria, which shuts in the harbour's mouth, is the supposed scene of Byron's "Corsair." Here was fought the celebrated battle between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, so ably described by Thucydides, of whose narrative Professor Lowell has given us an excellent translation. Many other battles of minor importance took place near Navarino during the war of Greek Independence. Then, in the fifteenth century, the Venetians took possession of the place, and built a fort, after which it was perpetually changing hands between them, the Turks, the Greeks, and the Egyptians. But, in 1827, occurred, perhaps, the best known battle—that between the English, French, and Russians on one side, in aid of the Greeks, and Ibrahim Pasha and the Turkish fleet on the other.

The town of Navarino is not much to look at from the sea. Our men, who have been ashore, describe it as a place with "nothing to eat, nothing to drink, nobody to speak to, and all the men in petticoats." I was still a prisoner, with a very bad cough, but Tom, the children, and the doctor, who went ashore soon after breakfast, described the scene as most primitive—beards of long-haired pigs curving about the streets, a cow being tethered in the middle of the public place, the post office established in a cowshed, and guarded by two rufous-looking men, with no knowledge of any language, except a sort of modern Greek patois. The male inhabitants, truly enough, were all in full white petticoats and garters, similar to those worn by the Albanians. In it is a nice little fort garrisoned by a commandant and a hundred and ninety soldiers. This officer kindly showed Tom and the others all over the place, including the prison, where there were a great many men in rags confined in one large court-yard, containing, however, numerous huts or sheds, forming separate dormitories. The commandant was a Spratton, and spoke with the greatest animation and affection for the English nation. The children brought me a marvellous, a curious jug, a pretty lantern, and little pig almost as small as my own Island favourite, and several other offerings from the store. The pig is the quaintest little animal imaginable, like its up like a dog, and was discovered after lunch to dory comfortably in a room among the pillows on the sofa. He is about half the size of my favourite old pig, I think, and has very sharp teeth of his own.

The weather this afternoon had apparently cleared up the wind was fair and as we should be under shelter of the land in some distance we decided to till a fresh departure. Very pretty indeed the harbour looked as we sailed slowly out past the islands, one of which contained a most curious natural arch. Two turrets had crumbled during the day, and had remained for a few hours so that I suppose there must be some sort of trade here, quite as the devil dive place appears to be. No sooner were we outside the harbour than the ark seemed to burst upon us with a doubled fury, though by this time the wind had changed its direction and was fortunately from a favourable quarter, and we were therefore for a time in smooth water, and went tearing along, before it. Once out of the shelter of the mainland, it was a very different story. We encountered a terrific sea, of a peculiarly pyramidal form, which threw us on our beams ends, stove in the side of the other pig, strained the davits, and loosened the rail, besides doing other damage on deck and below. Everything on deck was set swimming, and in the nursery too for some clever person after all had been secured for the night, though it so fine and smooth while we were under the land, that he opened two of the skylights, the result of which was a perfect deluge this morning, when we shipped one of these big seas, frightening the poor maids out of their wits, and completely muddling everything. The contents of the lockers where the children's boots and shoes are kept, were washed out, and floated about the floor in some eight inches of water.

Matters did not improve as the day wore on, and we continued to roll and pitch violently, shipping seas at intervals, till we got under the lee of Candia. Then at last we had a little comparative peace and comfort, and were able to shake some of the reefs out of the sails and try to get things into a somewhat better state once more. By six o'clock the wind fell so light that the masts were lowered and steam was ordered to be got up, but scarcely had the order been given when the breeze came and we were rushing along before it and heeling over at an angle which made it very difficult to get about, though, being still under shelter of the island the water was perfectly smooth. Past experience had, however, made us cautious and everything was prepared for a further spell of bad weather, though this time our precautions were happily unnecessary. The rest and comfort of that night to all on board can scarcely be imagined after the troubles and anxieties of the last few days.

Monday morning dawned fresh and fair, with a light northerly breeze, favourable for carrying us on our course, but bitterly cold, making me cough more than ever. I do not know when I have had such a bad attack, and have spent so much time in bed on board ship.

I am afraid I have not given you a very grand or graphic description of the storm, which was really magnificent as seen from the deck below, with all skylights battened down (well secured with chains and ropes). I passed most of the time, not so much in bed as lying on the leeboard (such was the angle at which we were heeling over) tightly wedged in, with Mooney as a companion, my berth being near the centre of the ship in the nursery, and consequently a little steady. Then all the time dogs came and crouched down beside us, horribly frightened, poor things whenever a worst roll or lurch than usual came and pitched them violently from their places. Bibby was never ill for a single instant, and wandered about, trying her best to be a small ministering angel to all the sufferers. A capital little nurse she made too, getting, or trying to get everything that anybody wanted. Notwithstanding sundry tumblers and bruises, and the fact that everybody was ill and there was no one to look after her, she kept up her spirits very well.

■ was of course impossible for her to go on deck, but occasionally she joined our little party on the bed for an hour or so. It was very depressing work lying there, more or less in the dark, listening to the crackings and creakings around us, and hearing the water splashing about on deck, and not knowing what would happen next. Two or three times the sea struck us so heavily and we took so much water on board, and the yacht seemed to struggle and stagger to such an extent, that I thought we must be going to the bottom. I am, who was on deck at the time—as indeed he is almost always—told me he had experienced exactly the same fears. All depended on everything holding together, for if any important rope had given way, or a skylight or companion had been broken in, nothing could have saved us. How thankful we were that we had started with new sails and ropes so that at the end of the gale we found only two or three unimportant spars carried away, two boats stove in, and the rail and davits slightly damaged. The Suez Canal, although a beautiful sea boat, is rather too heavily sparred for such gales and really awful bits as we have lately encountered.

The following morning was rather finer, but I was too ill to get up and remained in bed all day, feeling very wretched. The wind was shifty, though light and fair. I do not know what we must have looked like to the very few steamers we passed or met. All our sails were set and the rigging was hung full of crupets, curtains, quilts, blankets and cloths, which had suffered from the effects of the last few days' working. It is wonderful what an amount of salt water these things will stand, if they are really good to start with. Towards evening the wind dropped very light. We accordingly got up steam at midnight and steamed on and on through a dull and windy sea, with occasional cat-paws of breezes, till we reached Port Said soon after midnight on Wednesday, January 24th.

Thursday, January 25th—Early this morning we had many visitors on board and began ■ repair damages. Our foreyard was sent down, and the sail uncut from our foreboom, while the boats were got into the water and were taken charge of by Captain Fairfax, who had kindly offered to send them on board the Monarch to be repaired. A very small midshipman came to fetch them—so small that I offered him cake and wine, and then sent him round the ship with Moonie and Baby to see all the pets, treatment which I knew he must have thought rather infra dig, as I found afterwards that he was much older than he looked and had rather distinguished himself during the recent warlike operations. On the occasion of the capture of the Suez Canal, armed with a large cut-throat almost as big as himself, and in command of twelve blue jackets, ■ landed and took possession of the office of the Suez Canal Company, told M. de Lesseps emphatically that he was not going to stand any nonsense and kept them in their quarters all the livelong summer day. Very long and very hot in Egyptian summer try ■ too.

I am remarkably surprised with the appearance of Port Said, which has greatly improved since we were last here. There is a nice square with a fountain and flowers, where the band plays duly and a very comfortable hotel (the Hotel de France) which has replaced the excellent old Hotel des Bains.

Friday, January 26th—We went with Captain Fairfax and several other officers to the top of the Dutch House this afternoon and had the plan of the recent operations explained to us. The country being so flat it is very easy to see the whole at a glance, the town at your feet—I like Menoukh, covered with wild fowl and fishing boats. Port Ghazal in the distance, and the ships going up and down the Canal for many miles. The late Prince Henry of the Netherlands was persuaded by M. de Lesseps to build this beautiful house, a speculation for a hotel, at a cost of from £120,000 to £150,000, ■ de Lesseps promising to do all sorts of things to improve the surroundings by making gardens, roads, &c. The hotel was good (I speak from experience, as I stayed there when last here) but the speculation was bad. When the hotel utterly failed, M. de Lesseps offered £25,000 for the building, a little more than he had charged Prince Henry for the land some years previously. His executors—one being the King of the Netherlands—said they would rather blow the whole place up with dynamite than let ■ fall into his hands. Our Government stepped in at the nick of time, and purchased what must prove a most valuable property, whatever happens. It is a fine well built house, standing on a large plot of land with extensive outbuildings and offices surrounding, a courtyard, with large verandahs on either side, affording protection from the sun, and perfect ventilation.

The only four houses available out of the six in Port Said had been placed at our disposal, and on these, Captain Fairfax, I am, Fairfax and I accompanied by the two children on donkeys, started for a mile through the Arab town, past the big stone house and along the sea shore. ■ Ghr, the last rebel fort that surrendered to the khedive, or rather to the British sailors and marines under Captain Fairfax and Captain Bosanquet. Our way lay along the sandy shore close to the sea, and reminded me of a ride I had often taken on the north coast—instead of the north coast—coast of Africa, from Cape Spartel to our frequent camping-ground ■ the rough neighbourhood of Tangiers. The sand was smooth and hard, the shells numerous, the fetch of the sea considerable, the swell far pleasanter to look at than it would have been to feel the effects of the waves crisp and curling, running in long, curves up the shelving shore, and forming what looked like a series of huge pebbly oyster shells from the South Sea Islands, as the freshly wetted sand reflected all the exquisite tints of the bright sunlight.

Ours was rather a different ride from the first that Captain Fairfax had taken, when he went out with a body of blue-jackets and marines (whose camp, which they occupied for three months, we rode through on leaving, the town) to seize Fort Ghr. The expedition started over night and arrived near the fort at 3 A.M., when the men lay down for an hour to prepare for the attack which they expected to have to make. In the meantime the men from the fleet, which had anchored off the island, opposite the fort the previous night were landed with considerable difficulty, several boats being nearly upset in crossing, the bottom of the entrance to the narrow channel, which had not been surveyed, and with which they were not familiar. But there was no occasion to attack the fort for as soon as our men approached, the garrison came to the water's edge and laid down their arms. Since then the fort has been demolished, and a very small fishing village has sprung up on its site, from which some of the dustiest Arabs I ever saw came out to look at us with great interest.

The ride back to Port Sud was delightful for it was a relief to turn one's back to the wind, which, though warm, was strong. The water birds and water fowl seemed to be all coming home for the night, and the shore was alive with them. Anything more beautiful, than the flights of flamingoes can scarcely be imagined—first black and grey, and then, as the sun caught their scut and pink breasts and wings, turning into a bright roseate cloud, flushing through the air, and exhibiting every variety of tint as they soared and wheeled high above our heads. We just managed to get on board before the sun slipped behind the horizon and the cold chill of evening was felt.

All the non-commissioned officers and many of the soldiers and marines came on board the Sunbeam this afternoon. I hear and appear to have enjoyed the visit, at which I am not surprised, for their life here must be very monotonous. The Liverpool Governor of Port Sud also came this morning with his interpreter and stayed a considerable time. He is a nice old man, decidedly liberal in his views, expressing great regret that Turkish ladies were not allowed to receive the benefits of education, and to travel about and see more of the world, and so become more intelligent companions than is possible at present. He was much interested to hear of our visit to Constantinople in 1878, and of some of the Sultanas having come on board the yacht and the opinions they had expressed on this and other subjects.

Saturday, January 27th—In the morning we had steam up and were all ready to start at nine, but were so hemmed in by steamers of all sorts and kinds that it was almost impossible to extricate ourselves.

Privellgio Bey came to see us this morning. He speaks English very well, and is a brave little man. When the war began he was at Suez, and was ordered by the Khedive to take his ship to Alexandria, which he proceeded to do. At one of the stopping-places on the Canal, Arabi sent some soldiers to seize the ship, the crew of which showed a disposition to fraternize with the rebels, seeing which Captain Privellgio rushed among them, first alone, but soon followed by a few of the men who remained faithful, shot some of the mutineers, put others below hatches, forced the engineer to steam ahead, and with the very few hands available, safely through the Canal and saved his ship.

As soon as we got outside we found the wind blowing, fresh and rather shy, but the sea was quite smooth until after we had passed Damietta. Then it became rough and unpleasant. The usual precautions of reefing, housing topmasts, gutting boats on board, and battening down with canvas were taken, and we had a bad night of it again tossing and tumbling about, but still going very fast, which was some consolation. In the morning things were much worse, everybody was more or less ill, and I confess that when Tom came down and woke me, to announce that we were still thirty miles off Alexandria, that the wind was dead ahead and blowing a gale, with a misty cross sea (the latter being a fact of which we were all only too well aware), and that there was no hope of reaching Alexandria until to-morrow, my heart sank within me, and poor little Muriel, who had begged to be allowed to sleep with me, looked most piteous. Soon afterwards Tom came down again to say that the wind was increasing, and that even if we could beat to Alexandria, which was impossible, we might have to lie off that port for two or three days. The question therefore was whether we should heave to where we were, or run back before the gale 120 miles to Port Said, the nearest port. I felt greatly tempted to say "run back," but I resisted and did not. Presently there was a tremendous report, and a crash which made the yacht shiver from stem to stern, and caused me to wonder with some anxiety, what could have happened. The job boom had come away. There was a good deal of wreck to clear, but this was done as soon as possible. The ship was put about and we were soon running at great speed and with comparative comfort towards Port Said, where we arrived at 4 A.M. on Monday, all pretty well tired out. There was a general turning in, and not much was seen of anybody until after midday.

In the afternoon we went for a ride with

Captain Lauffa. This time our way lay through another quarter of the Arab town, where a market was being carried on with great animation, and along the side of the Canal between it and Lake Marcout. There is not much variety of choice in the rides about here, surrounded as the place is by sea, lake, and canal. The ground was nice and soft after the rain of last night, and we galloped along and soon caught up a steamer—one of the Wilson line—going up the Canal, and rode alongside her for some time. Then we turned and entered back, admiring the graceful lateen sails of the dhows as they flew across the lake to Damietta, looking like white water fowl with their wings spread. On the other side there were a great many flocks of real wild fowl and swans, geese and ducks, besides rose coloured flamingoes, and sea birds of many descriptions. Just as we got near the town, it so happened that a party of Arabs, in the brightest coloured garments, were selling the cargo of five or six fishing boats—by a sort of auction apparently—with a good deal of noise and gesticulation. There were fish of all kinds and sizes, and the scene was altogether very picturesque and interesting. We watched it for some time, as the carts and hand burrows, the panniers of the mules and donkeys, or the small baskets of the women and children, who walked gracefully away with them on their heads, were gradually filled.

The Iron Duke and the Orient both pressed here this evening, one going up and the other down the Canal in which there is a great block just now, thirty six ships having been stopped for five days by the grounding of the Braunschweig. It is lucky we did not go up to Ismailia in the Sunbeam, and thence to Kassassin and Ibel-el-Kebu. We thought of doing so one time, but were recommended not to make the attempt, on account of the delay which so frequently occurs in the Canal besides which the expense would have been enormous, owing to the high dues which fall very heavily on non cargo carrying ships.

Next morning at eight o'clock, we again started for Alexandria, the Monarch leaving the port at the same time for hung practice. Directly we got outside, canvas was set, and we had a delightful sail on a really hot day—the first since we left Malta. Towards evening it fell calm, and we got up steam. Our progress was so rapid that the engines were slowed, and we passed a really quiet night going half speed only, so as not to get to the Aboukir Forts which we wished particularly to see, too early. We passed quite close to them and then steamed all along the coast, by Ramieh past the forts of Pharos and Aidra, of which we had heard so much to the narrow intricate entrance to the harbour of Alexandria.

Wednesday January 31st—In the afternoon we went for a drive with Captain Fitzroy through the arsenal—where the Egyptian soldiers salute us with great respect—to the fort of Ras el tin where the evidences of the destruction caused by the bombardment, in the shape of guns dismantled and completely overturned, great holes in the walls and other effects of the iron storm were very striking. It is wonderful that some of the projectiles did not penetrate the magazines which are full of English powder shot and shell, of the latest and most improved kind accumulated here during the last five years. We collected some small relics, of which there was no lack and then drove on to Pharos, the site of the celebrated lighthouse that was once one of the seven wonders of the world, but of which no remains are now to be seen. A great Arab sikh was buried here many years ago, and no European was ifcrwards allowed to visit the sacred spot under pain of death or even to go on to the spit of land on which the present lighthouse stands. Since the bombardment, however, we have taken the matter into our own hands, and free access is allowed to the fortress surrounding the lighthouse, which latter edifice escaped a single shot. In the fort, all the guns that were not dismantled and destroyed at the time have been spiked since. Here the destruction caused by our shells is almost as great as at Ras el tin. One of them burst inside the mosque containing the sacred tomb—another penetrated a sort of niche or what we should call a side chapel, and partly buried itself in the opposite wall, without bursting.

From Pharos we took one of the saddest drives imaginable through ruined Alexandria—almost as sad as our drive through Paris immediately after the Communist insurrection. In fact the state of things here was in some respects more deplorable for in Paris the fury of the mob was more equally wreaked on the public edifices while in this city both public and private buildings have suffered alike, and thousands of innocent people have been rendered houseless and homeless. The splendid square as you know, a heap of ruins but the terrible and widespread desolation in all parts of the once beautiful city must be seen to be fully realised. (Of whole groups of houses, not one stone has been left standing on another, while in other places one house has been taken and its next door neighbour left having marvellously escaped destruction by some unaccountable chance the relics of its former grandeur in the shape of thickened walls and scanty trees and unimmaculate twisted and jaggedly broken pillars, the heart and soul of the city. It is a holy contrast its present condition offered. The effect of the little huts, booths and shops, erected among the ruins that are piled up in the centre of the square to make room for the traffic is much the same. There where once were beautiful gardens now stand miserable hovels hastily put up to shelter the poor homeless war-torn and I also I am sorry to say some very disreputable liquor shops and dining booths, which it is to be hoped will shortly be done away with. Their owners took advantage of the general confusion to establish them but I think it will not be long before they are disestablished.

I returned on board the night early. This went for a long walk to see more of the miserable destruction caused as in 1891 in 1891 by bullets from within and not by fire from without. Captain Bloomfield, Mr. Houghton and Mr. C. were lined with us and told us a great deal about that terrible Sunday massacre which was the beginning of the rebellion. If only the Europeans had been warned and armed so as to have been able to make a stand I believe the suffering crowds would have run away at once. Captain and Mrs. Bloomfield had been lunching on that day with Captain Fitzroy and I sent their children in the carriage to hear the band play. At 11 a.m. on shore Captain Bloomfield whose house is near the port and some distance from the town heard that something was wrong and went off at once to see what was the matter. Of the fearful events of that afternoon you have of course read but I fear they were ten times worse than the published descriptions lead one to suppose. The rains had chosen their time only too well—the day on which all the resident "gourmands" were in the habit of taking their weekly holiday their favourite amusement being, a drive in an open carriage and four—a big or small but a cache with a hood of which there are a large number for hire in Alexandria. The drivers, and I found the donkey boys were in the plot and brought all their fares down the main street. Opposite a particular fine house, which was the regular rendezvous the Irishman stopped the carriages by beating or tore down the hoods, beat the occupants to death with clubs and sticks and threw the bodies into the streets the drivers meanwhile sitting quietly on their boxes and when all was over, driving away, perhaps—who knows?—to pick up another freight and conduct them into the same trap, to meet a like bloody and untimely end. Captain Bloomfield, as captain of the port, being in Egyptian uniform, and happening to meet a friend, married, by by-ways, to reach the British Consulate; but could heu nothing of his children, either there or anywhere else. With great difficulty he got back to his own house, and endeavoured to re-assure his wife, though he himself suffered the most intense anxiety. Between nine and ten o'clock the children returned, Captain Bloomfield's private coachman having behaved with great fidelity and discretion. Finding that no band was playing, and that there were symptoms throughout the city of a general émouée, he drove them off to a friend's house, where he secreted them and the carriage in an old out-house till the worst of the horrors were over, and then managed to make his way to his master's residence by quiet and unfrequented streets. Fancy the joy of the anxious parents on finding their loved ones, whom they had almost given up for lost, once more safely in their arms! I could fill pages with heart-rending stories, and accounts of hairbreadth escapes on the same occasion, which I have heard since our arrival here.

PUBLIC DUTY.

By R. W. DALE, LL.D. (BIRMINGHAM).

WHEN the eternal Word and Son of God became flesh, He revealed the sacredness of human life, its sacredness, not merely in its direct relations to God, but in its relations to that natural order and social environment by which it is disciplined and developed, and in which it exercises its affections and virtues. In translating us into the kingdom of heaven, He does not separate children from parents, husbands from wives. He takes up the Family into the divine order and so consecrates it. He does the same for industry and commerce, for literature and science and art. Christ does not pronounce them common and unclean; He makes them His own and transfigures them, by declaring that in all these pursuits men are to do the will of God. Nor does He tell us out of that social and political order which is necessary, not only to the prosperity, but to the existence of nations. On the contrary He affirms the sacredness of civil authority, and enforces civil duties with new and divine sanctions. As there is no conflict between the Divine Kingdom and the Family, neither is there any conflict between the Divine Kingdom and the State. Christ does not suppress the Family, but purifies and ennobles it. Christ does not suppress the State, but inspires political life with a nobler temper, and directs it to higher ends. He makes loyalty the religious duty of subjects, and under penalty of the divine displeasure requires rulers to be just.

Unhappily this conception of His work has never yet been fully grasped by Christendom. In the corrupt ages of the Church, men thought that the Law was not divine enough for the perfect life; and there are many Christian people still of the opinion that political activity is inconsistent with saintliness.

There are the clearest indications in the New Testament that the distrust and antagonism which have so long existed between the Church and civil society began early. The apostles had to insist with great energy on the duty of submission to secular governments, and this is an indication that many of the early converts to the Christian faith were disposed to think badly of kings and magistrates, and to dispute their authority. It was not easy, indeed, for Christian men and women in apostolic times to believe that "the powers which be are ordained of God," and to regard civil government as part of the divine order of the world. Idolatry met the Christian man in all public places. He then gods received the homage of the State. The Roman Emperor was the high priest of Paganism. Why should the sons of God, the heirs of immortal glory, acknowledge the authority of rulers who were in revolt against the divine authority, who often persecuted those who were trying to obey the divine will? What claim had secular rulers, secular laws, secular institutions on their allegiance and respect?

The presence of Jews in most Christian Churches during the first century embittered antagonism to the empire. It was the custom of the apostles to begin their evangelistic work in the synagogue; in many Churches converts from Judaism constituted the majority of the membership, the old vision of an earthly Messiah, with armies and fleets to assert His power, had vanished, or was vanishing, but the Jewish hatred and scorn for Gentile rulers remained. The Churches were infected by the fierce reckless revolutionism which was their glory among the Jewish people.

Peter, therefore, affirms with great strength the duty of obeying the secular authorities

"I am subject to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake,"—as part of the old religion—Christ,—"whether it is to the king, as supreme, or unto governors as sent by him for vengeance on evil doers and for praise to him who do well."

Paul tells Titus to "put" Christian people "in mind to be in subjection to rulers to authorities to the end that to be ready unto every good work"—it is from the old duty, which the Jews and the magistrates required.

In his Epistle to the Romans, Paul develops more fully the Christian conception of the secular organization of society. The Church is not the only institution that has the divine sanction: the State is also divine. "For, the provincial governors, the city magistrates, all 'the powers that be,' are 'ordained of God'." Church rulers derive their authority from heaven, so do political rulers. They, too, are "ministers of God's service." Christian men are therefore to submit to them, not only in order to avoid civil penalties, but "for conscience' sake," for "he that resisteth the power withstandeth the ordinance of God."

Christ had anticipated all these apostolic precepts in His reply to the malignant question of the Pharisees and Herodians—"Is it lawful for us to give tribute unto Cæsar or not?" "He perceived their craftiness and said to them, 'Show me a penny. Whose image and superscription hath it?' and they said 'Cæsar's.' And He said unto them, 'Then render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's.'"

"Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." The precept was suggested by a question about tribute. In its original reference it enforced the duty of paying taxes. Paul describes the levying and collection of taxes as a divinely appointed function of the civil magistrate. Thus throws quite a new light upon "Committee of Supply," upon the Budget, upon the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, upon Income Tax Commissioners and Customs House officials, upon the unacknowledged documents which we receive from the overseers of the poor and the collectors of rates and tax. We are to pay "tribute" because civil rulers are "ministers of God's service," attending continually upon this very thing. The tax may be excessive, unfairly levied, unwise or unjustly spent, if so, the civil rulers are doing their work badly, and will have to account to God for their injustice or their folly. We may try to set them right in a country with a free constitution, and where private citizens have a full responsibility for the acts of the government, this is a duty. In extreme cases—when, for instance, a tax is levied by an arbitrary exercise of power in violation of the recognized rights of the nation or when a government is so corrupt and tyrannical that the primary objects for which the State exists are not secured—there remains the power, perhaps the duty, of resistance and revolt. But a wise nation will suffer much before it resorts to measures of violence, and good men will be slow to come to the conclusion that the powers which are "ordained of God" have lost the divine sanction.

There are some people—honest enough in all their private affairs—who seem to think that a tax or a rate is a claim to be evaded. Paul makes this paying a religious duty—"the demand note of the collector is backed by the divine authority, and countersigned by the divine hand. What happened when Ananias and Sapphira made a false return to the apostles, who were 'ministers of God' representing the Church, we know. It ought to warn us against making false returns to the Income Tax Commissioners, who, according to Paul, and according to the whole Christian conception of secular society, are 'ministers of God' representing the State. The tax may be venial or it may be unequal, but while it lasts we ought to return every shilling of our income 'for conscience' sake."

The same obligation holds in relation to all other claims. The Customs House officer is one of the "ministers of God," and to evade lawful duties is to evade a divine claim.

On the other hand, Christian men in Parliament, overseers, members of town council and of local boards, should remember whose servants they are, and should levy taxes and rates justly, and expend them wisely and fairly as the representatives of the authority of God.

But we have not discharged the duty of rendering to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's when we have paid rates and taxes. In many countries the State employs all men of a certain age to serve for a definite number of years in the army, in addition to contributing money to pay for the defence of the country; they have to defend it themselves. We have no military conscription in England, but our constitution requires that very large numbers of men should give a considerable portion of their time to certain national and municipal duties, if they refuse to do it the whole system of government breaks down. As long as justice is administered by an unpaid magistracy men must consent to spend diabolical hours on the bench. As long as our local affairs are under the control of local authorities elected by the ratepayers men must consent to serve on town councils, to be members of watch committees, markets and fairs committees, finance committees, gas committees, water committees, and the rest, and they must consent to accept the majority. Other men must be willing to serve on school boards, and others to act as overseers and guardians of the poor. Men who discharge these duties pay a voluntary tax based on personal service. It is a tax which must be paid by some one and every man has to determine his own share.

As long as we are governed by two Chambers a member of the House of Lords has no more right to neglect his legislative duties, than a policeman to go off his beat before his time, or a bus driver, who is paid for ten hours' work, to walk five hours and sleep or smoke the other five. It is true that most of the men who have to serve in the Upper House inherit their responsibilities by birth and were never asked whether they would bear the burden of legislation or not. But this does not relieve them from their responsibility. Many of the gravest duties of every man are duties which come to him in the same way, a man's duties to his parents and to his brothers and sisters are just as binding as if he had undertaken them voluntarily. Nor is it enough for an hereditary legislator to discharge his duties as well as he is able, he should try to make himself able to discharge them well.

In the House of Commons a man sits by his own consent, and the obligation to discharge the trust he has received from his constituents is too plain to be ignored. A man who uses his position in that House to promote his private interests instead of the interests of the nation, is guilty of a flagrant moral offence, he is as guilty as a solicitor who uses for his own purposes the money he has received to invest for a client. But men may also be guilty of neglecting duty who refuse to enter the House. It is plain that the State has claims on the services of those who are able to serve it most effectively. Where there is political knowledge, political sympathy, the power of commanding public confidence, let me to discharge Parliamentary duties, there is some reason to think that a man is in possession of "the things that are Casual," it is possible that in refusing to stand for the House of Commons he is betraying his country, defrauding it as really as if he had retained his income at ten thousand a year, when he ought to have returned it at ten. This is a question for a man's judgment and conscience, not for his personal tastes and preferences. It would hardly do for a man to refuse to pay his debts and to plead in self defence that paying debts was extremely distasteful to him, and that he found it more agreeable to his personal inclinations to spend his money in other ways.

Civil authority is a divine institution. The man who holds municipal or political office is a "minister of God." One man may have just as real a divine vocation to become a town councillor or a Member of Parliament as another to become a missionary to the heathen. In either case it is at a man's peril that he is "disobedient to the heavenly vision." The divine right of kings was a base corruption of a more noble truth, so was the limited claim about "the reign of the saint." We shall never approach the Christian ideal of civil society, until all who hold municipal, judicial, and political offices, recognise the social and political order of the nation as a divine institution, and discharge their official duties as "ministers of God."

It is in this country the responsibility of government is shared by the people. If great outlines of national legislation and policy are laid down, not in Parliament, not in the Cabinet, but at the polling booth. It is the electors who make the war or the armistice, who repeal old laws and pass new ones, who interfere, justly or unjustly, between landlord and tenants, masters and servants, parents and children. Those who abstain from voting determine the national policy, it is they who vote. The responsibility of the Parliamentary franchise cannot be evaded.

I sometimes think that many things can do more for the people than Parliament. Their powers will probably be enlarged, but under the powers which they possess already they can greatly diminish the amount of sickness in the community, and in prolonging human life. They can prevent—they have prevented—tens of thousands of wives from becoming widows, tens of thousands of children from becoming orphans. They can do very much to improve those miserable homes which we find not only to be dirty but to be deadly and moribund. They can give to the poor the enjoyment of pleasant parks and gardens and the intellectual cultivation and refinement of public libraries and galleries of art. They are ruthless in many ways the inequalities of human conditions. The gracious words of Christ, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these my brethren, even the least, ye did it unto Me," will be addressed not only to those who with their own hands fed the hungry and clothed the naked, and cared for the sick, but to those who supported a municipal policy which lessened the miseries of the wretched, and added but misery to the lives of the desolate. And the terrible rebuke, "Inasmuch as ye did it not unto one of these least, ye did it not unto Me," will condemn the selfishness of those who refused to make municipal government the instrument of a policy of justice and humanity.

If ye are one of the Christian people of the municipalities interested in having an effective system of municipal government, and had worked its powers vigorously, the "Little City of Outer London" need never have been heard of. Now that the cry has come to them the churches will never be able to remedy the evil apart from the action of municipal authorities. Material, and not the gospel only, is necessary to cure the sick. Municipal action, and not the gospel only, is necessary to improve the homes of the poor.

In some countries the local authorities are appointed to our mayors and town councilors appointed by the Crown. The duty of appointment is a difficult one, the central government can never have all the knowledge necessary to appoint wisely. With us the duty of appointment rests upon the ratepayers and the duties come with it grave responsibilities.

The municipal and political franchise is a trust, it is to be used, not for private but for public purposes. If in appointing an ambassador to Paris, St. Petersburg, or Berlin, the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary were influenced by improper motives, if they appointed a man, not because they thought him to be the best man available for the post, but because he was an old friend, or if they selected one ambassador and put out another on the ground of personal rivalry, and so justify personal resentment, or if a man obtained the appointment by giving his did entertainments to his political patrons or friends, it would be a public scandal. If he obtained it by a bribe—by a bribe in any form—by a heavy subscription or an instance, to the election fund of the Union for the Reform Club—it would be a public crime.

But the same moral laws that govern the exercise of political patronage, govern the exercise of the franchise. If in a municipal or a political contest, you vote for a man for no other reason than that he is a friend or a neighbour, and it would not be pleasant to disoblige him—because the rival candidate please you more—voted without speaking to you, or omitted to invite you to a dinner party, or forgot to tell his wife that your daughters were to be asked to dance—this is a clear violation of public duty. If you vote for a man for no other reason than that he has subscribed to a hospital, or a school, or a church, in which you happen to be interested, or because he sustained your application for some public office, if you refuse to vote for him because he told the manager of the bank of which he happens to be a director to refuse to increase your "overdraw," or because he gives you no orders for coal or meat—this is positive corruption.

According to the divine order civil authority is necessary to the existence of civil society. Civil rulers are "ministers of God," but they are not designated to their office by a voice from heaven. In this country the sovereign and the peers inherit their position by birth, the rest have to be selected, directly or indirectly by those who possess the franchise. It is surely a part of God's service to determine who shall be God's "ministers," and for the manner in which we discharge this service we are responsible to God. Not to vote is to let the part of the unfaithful servant who hid his talent in the earth and made no use of it to vote corruptly is failing, it is to appropriate to our own purposes what we have received as trustees for the town or the nation.

Those who are in the habit of speaking of political life as though it were unimportant to all the present and interests of the kingdom of Christ will be therefore decline to discharge all political duties are strangely inconsistent. If a municipality proposes to open libraries or museums on a Sunday, many excellent Christian people become greatly excited and strain all their influence to prevent what they regard as a desecration of the weekly day of rest, but they do not seem to believe that members of a town council have to do the will of God on Monday and Tuesday as well as on Sunday, and that Christian principles are to check the men who will do it. If a parliamentary oath is to be abolished these devout persons ignore petitions and make speeches against it for a professed atheist to get into Parliament seems to them a terrible scandal in a Christian country but many of these same persons regard the actual business of Parliament is so remote from the province of religious duty is to make it a very "worldly" thing for a Christian man to interest himself in politics. ■ This is a true account of political life, then all the members of the House of Commons ought to be atheists. I pronounce no judgment in this place on either of these measures. ■ It may be the duty of Christian men to insist that municipalities shall refuse to open libraries, museums, art galleries, on Sunday, it may be their duty to insist that Parliament shall refuse to permit a man known to be an atheist to take the oath. But it is rather odd and not quite intelligible that those who regard politics as the special province of the prince of this world and who ordinarily shun all contact with political life for fear of losing their spirituality of mind, should now and then become ardent politicians in order to protect the interests of the Christian faith and to maintain the honour of God. If political forces are so awfully evil one would suppose that the defence of the kingdom of heaven would be the first purpose for which Christians would be willing to use them. They pray for kings and ministers, but if politics is so fatal to Christian fidelity kings and ministers are put praying for. They enjoy—apparently without any qualms of conscience—all the advantages of municipal and national government, but if municipal and political activity is odious to the souls of all who engage in it Christians ought to decline the personal advantages which are brought at so fearful a price.

Paul has taught us a nobler and profounder theory of politics. "The power that be is ordained of God for the maintenance of public order, for the protection of life of property, and of peace and for the civil rights of the 'ministers of God,' and therefore it is necessary to secure its great ends of civil society, the diffusion of material comfort, the accumulation of material wealth, the cultivation of the intellectual life of the race, the transmission from generation to generation of the discoveries of science and the triumphs of art. Apart from civil society some of the noblest and most generous virtues could never be developed. Through the Municipality and the State, as well as through the family and the Church, the infinite righteousness and goodness and mercy of God have provided for the discipline of human perfection. The true duty of the Christian man is, not to forsake municipal and political life because it is corrupt, but to carry into municipal and political activity the law and the spirit of Christ, to resolve to do his part to secure for his fellow townsmen and his fellow countrymen all those blessings which a municipality and a nation, justly wisely and efficiently governed, can secure for them, that so the promises which are 'endowed of God' may fulfil the purpose for which He ordained them and the divine will be done by civil rulers on earth as it is done by angels and the spirits of the just in heaven.

SWING-SONG.

SWING! swing!
Birds in the bushkin we'd birds on the

The world's no more content than Lee
Joy him ever on every tree
It's flutter of leaves hilariety,
Swing! swing!

I only pruned to wake him no sleep,
It's in my a dewy like they sleep,
I'm joyful as I find in full in the Under yonder cloud that move
In the sunshine that above!
Swing! swing!

Anonymous like of a veined snow Lie over the sunny hills of the Lie over brown bent woods and Where yellow yel white of the

With moss and straw my birds met
Swing! swing!

Spring wakes her young leaves for the Dark winter's death shadows are broken
The busy world with low sea and,
Welcome to them a day of the
The doves of love call in a low sound,
Swing! swing!

I by the hills on the hillside
Oh like the wind May side from him
I like the Wally will push the pair Hail! how they flash as they rush the sun
the sun
All the young world laughs oh how the

CROWS AND SCARECROWS

BY JAMES FURVIS

1951 FALL

POETS for poetic reasons despise the crow but I for prosaic reasons revere it. In the Celestial Empire, and many other places not so far off, he is a bird of ill omen and to the poets he is one of ill fame. Truly it is true, in his 'Caw-tus,' puts a hearty song in his praise into the mouth of a student —

He caw-tus, caw-tus, caw-tus, caw-tus,
Woe-tus, woe-tus, woe-tus, woe-tus.

and so with unto the student conclude —

He caw-tus, caw-tus, caw-tus, caw-tus.

It is said in ordinary phraseology, straight as the crow flies, or as the crow flies, but the crow does not fly so straight as is supposed. It knows better and wanders its way hither and thither in a good flight of imagination, 'blown about the skies,' as I can say.

The crow is a bird of ■ weathers, is ever on the alert and wide awake, and never wastes its time. It is the most prosaic bird, and deserves a good word from poetic mortals. You find the crow in our city streets, at daybreak. You can ever count upon a "good day" from ■. It is the farrier's friend, as the worms and grubs could testify if their voices could be heard, and ■ is the embellishment of what a good agriculturist should be—its eyes are ever on the field. Its flight is tireless and confidence is heard in its chattering voice. And it is something ■ its credit in its self-denial that it never sings, for Mr Darwin tells us that it possesses the proper apparatus. No other bird is so socialistic in habits, and none is so conservative. Where once it nests, it for ever nests. It weels for life, in ■ almost alone in the bird world in knowing no law of divorce or separation. But it is the bird's attachment to one spot that makes it lovable to ordinary mortals. Its preference for one clump of trees over all other trees in the world, its fondness for trees near a river, on a height, ■ near to an old manor-house or ruinous tower or gateway. At nightfall it flits about ruins like the ghost of the former owners and associates itself often with the destiny of families. To me this is not only poetic but unselfish.

I very time I pass a rookery I am in love with the deep murmuring noises of the crows, it is the music one likes to hear on ■ large estate and near to a country house. No noise fills so full of home associations and so gratefully on one's ears as the early clamouring calls of the dusky birds circling round and round the rookery the first morning one awakens on returning home from foreign lands. They then speak to us not only of our own childhood, but of that of our fathers.

There are the homely and careless noises that endear them, like rustic voices and parish dialect, to a native. Homeliness is as great a merit in a bird as in an author and the crow never loses its modesty. The crow's homeliness is probably the result of its fallen estate ever since it has followed in the wake of civilisation, and of its industrious little tattling of Coromandel Apollo when the god blackened him over and gave him one note to wing of. It imitates the strut of man whom it ever lives in sight of. There is some human interest about a bird that is known to have fed its blind companions that leads a club like life and fiercely repels intruders and pecks them with its black bills, as effective as our black balls, and that builds in trees in streets and in the midst of London at Kensington Palace and in Holland Park, and in Cortes Crescent in Liverpool. Yet its solemn walk and sable look won almost make us believe it appreciates the value of its in auctioneers' language to the advantages and amenities of a family reticence.

No landscape is complete without a line of crows. Look around you anywhere in the country be it the flat lowlands, the hilly slopes, or the grey fens, you will find the black line winging the homeward flight when all other birds are silent or plinking in a sheep field or a stubble field or following the plough in dark dots. Crows are everywhere, and they bring with them the seriousness, northiness love. They are birds of runy weather and every wet day you are almost certain in a country walk to see them on the move and hear their wings slowly flapping heavy with rain and to notice how their dull voices harmonize with the grey sky and the brown fells. In summer they make the air eloquent with their loud din, and the evenings are drowsy with their dull bores about the concave of the dark blue dome. Our scenery is everywhere coloured with them. Their sober blackness brings out the colour of the loam, the delicate tints of spring, the mellow ripeness of autumn, and the dead of winter. They are the commentators on our scenery and our seasons. They make a world of picturesque contrasts, and nowhere do they look out of place. They fit in naturally wherever they alight.

They are the field preachers, and perch one sermon from different texts, and the sermon consists of a repetition of one word. 'Work, work, work,' the kites, on being transposed, spell the bird's name. At what season and in what moral sense do we not find this bird in solemn attendance? They are associated with the solitudes of life. In autumn's early nightfall one looks and listens, and is impressed with the natural completeness of another day as it is rounded off by their homeward flight, by their nearer and nearer approach in blackening shadows until the air is filled with their clamouring calls. It is in evening, pastoral that well nigh brings one's heart not to his mouth, at least somewhat near it, for the love that is associated with one's own parish steeple, the vesper bells and the evening sounds of a rookery around one's old home is part of one's nature and part of one's life, at the best. It is the pathos of parish life.

Individually the crow may not possess a sweet voice, but collectively they produce musically engaging sounds. No other sound like a rookery at night fall appeals so strongly to one's imagination. And only one writer has done justice to this homely English picture—Gilbert White the father of the English prose pastoral. He talks—in words so charged with realism and beauty, they are still a perfect model—of the crows "returning at night, exerting their voices, and making a loud cawing which, being blended and softened by the distance that we at the village are below them, becomes a confused noise or chiding, or rather a pleasing murmur very engaging to the imagination and not unlike the cry of a pack of hounds in hollow echoing woods, or the rushing of wind in the tall trees, or the tumbling of the sea upon a pebbly shore. When this last ceremony is over with the last gleam of day they retire for the night. A little girl used to tell me that the rooks were saying their prayers.

This pleasant murmur very engaging to the imagination soon sets it at work and one looks and listens and asks himself a number of questions—though unanswerable, one's imagination finds food for thought. Their voices then become softer, and they do not continually call about work, work, work, but rather play, play, play. Are they going over the roll call or comparing notes of their days foraging, and arranging for to-morrow's routes, or are they indulging in scandal and paying visits to each other's nests or boasting of the worms they have pounced upon, or criticizing the farmers and complaining of the weather, the ploughmen and the field scarecrows, or are they, like little children, crying themselves asleep? One wonders and wonders in vain. It is music to be heard only in the plains or fields, and I like the crows the more because they follow the ploughshare and seldom hunt mountains or hills where deer run wild and men cannot live. But they were not wide of the mark when he made the student sing of the comfortable feeling of the big black crow. The crow, except in frosty weather, is always well to do and comfortable. And what other bird knows Sunday so well?

EDWARD IRVING.

WHAT with a new doctrine of atonement, in which there was no bargain made and no price paid, but only a union of fallen human nature with the divine which was to redeem it, and also lectures on the second coming of Christ to do for the world what the Church had failed to do,—what with these and other novelties in her brilliant but eccentric son, the Kirk of Scotland was sorely troubled, and wist not well what to do. The more zealous Presbyters rushed into newspapers and magazines, while others began to furbish up their learning and get ready grave treatises. Of the former class, one whose zeal was surely not according to knowledge, confounding the name of a heresy with that of a heretic, wrote something to the effect that "Monothelos himself" had never said anything worse than the minister of Regent Square Church. If Irving had only had Carlyle's great laughter he might have made rare mirth of that "Monothelos" might have been as famous as the "gig-man" or Professor Teufelsdröckh. But he could not make fun of the ignorance of the Kirk whose learning he had so often lauded to the Cuckneys. His mother church clearly stood in doubt of him, and began to hold aloof. She was slow indeed to take any action against one who gave such lustre to her name in the metropolis. But her orthodoxy must be above suspicion, and while she did not know much about the Latimers, and shrank from possible ridicule about "Monothelos," she had a shrewd suspicion that Irving would have to be dealt with by and by. If he would only do something or say something which could be easily handled by plain common sense.

That something they had not long to wait for, and this time the impulse came from Scotland itself, the very home and citadel of orthodoxy.

The late Thomas Eiskine, of Linlathen, though a lawyer by profession, was essentially a theologian, and one of the subtlest minds that have dealt with the finer questions of religious thought in these latter days. He was, I believe, the real reviver of that school which in the seventeenth century was worthily represented by Cudworth and John Smith of Cambridge, and in our own day by Maunce and Robertson of Brighton. With him were early associated John Macleod Campbell, minister of Row, and Alexander Scott, son of the minister of Greenock, and as yet only a probationer or preacher. Growing dissatisfied with the prevailing theology, and feeling out for something deeper and more real than the legal fictions on which the people were mainly fed, they had specially their doubts about the received view of atonement, though they did not take Irving's way out of the difficulty. They did not see how infinite divine love could be subjected to the limitations of predestination, nor yet how God could form a scheme to propitiate Himself by giving His Son for that purpose, which seemed to make a schism in the divine unity. Altogether, they were feeling that the old Puritan armour did not fit them well, and that they could nowise fight the battle in it with any hope of success. But they still worked at the atonement as the central point which needed better elucidation. They still held to the notion of faith in a doctrine rather than in a person, as Irving had learnt to do.

Among other questions, then, which rose out of the religious fermentation now going on among the green wooded slopes of the Gareloch, that of miracles etc. long assumed a rather startling shape. For the mere story of wonders done long ago, on which the authority of the Bible was made almost exclusively to rest, did not seem to help people to believe, seemed even to make faith a little harder. But if a miracle were actually wrought before one's eyes, that would be a very different matter, one might look then for some notable results. Hitherto the Church of Rome alone had laid claim to a continuity of the miraculous gift, which all Protestants rejected, sometimes for reasons which came perilously near those of the sceptic. But now it began to be asked, what right divines had to assume that supernatural powers were only temporary and for a specific purpose? Who could say at what time they died out? And supposing they had actually disappeared, what if it were only because the needed faith had first departed from the Church? Was not the gift of the Holy Ghost specially a power to speak with tongues, and to work wonders of healing in the name of Jesus? And if these were "the last days" and the second advent were near, as many surely believed, might we not reasonably hope that, in the days of Moses, and afterwards of Elijah, and finally of Jesus, so now also this power would return to the Church for the convincing of gainsayers, and establishing of the faithful? On these lines a good deal of conversation went on, and also some preaching, which were followed, by and-by, by some remarkable phenomena in Row and Rosneath. Humble and pious women were seized by an apparently irresistible impulse to speak in strange unnatural tones, and sometimes what they said was ordinary enough, at other times, to the hearer at least, it was the merest gibberish, but the speaker called it an unknown tongue, and said that it "edified herself." Several people also rose in a moment from long sicknesses, and were healed of their disorders, as they said, by merely believing that they were healed. The facts were clearly verified, the parties were quite incapable of deception, and naturally enough there was no small stir about these things.

When tidings of them came ■ Irving in London, they set him at once upon the same quest. They fitted exactly into his present line of thought, and were the very kind of facts needed to give him strong assurance. If only they were vouchsafed to his congregation, what a revival of religious life he might look for in London! Henceforth, therefore, lectures on Daniel and the Apocalypse alternated with expositions of the fourteenth chapter of 1st Corinthians. Thus men's minds were prepared for wonders, and the expectations of course tended to produce them. Their thoughts were in a state of extreme tension, electric with hope of the marvellous, and it was simply a question of time when the phenomena would appear. Irving himself never tried ■ work miracles, or to speak with tongues, in all humility confessing that this faith had been denied to him. But very soon the excitement produced its natural crop of enthusiasts in Regent Square Church, and there were scenes there which sorely troubled the donce and steady Scotchmen who came to hear speech of reason, and not unintelligible ejaculation. At first "the tongues" were mostly confined to the women, which ought to have made the minister proud, and take time to think of what Paul had said on that subject. Afterwards, however, the male competed with the female part of the congregation, and both of them in the end shunted the clergyman into a siding. Of course, as in Scotland, there was no sort of deception. Of course, when put duly to the apostolic test, they all confessed Christ without reserve. All the outcry against them, as if they had been only a set of hypocritical pretenders, merely shows how shallow were those who judged them, how ignorant of human history and psychology, and how unfit to guide men's minds during a time of fermenting religious thought. Every student of history knows that, in periods of religious excitement, abnormal phenomena are apt to appear. We meet them in the Middle Ages, and we have seen them in our own time. Only some score of years ago, many who went to "revival" meetings in Ireland and Scotland were mysteriously "struck down," by an inexplicable fit, out of which they emerged by and-by with a teaching of light and peace, and a full conviction of its supernatural character. There was no deception on their part, the thing was owing partly to mental, and partly to nervous excitement, and to that kind of infection which will set a whole company yawning if only one begin. Of course, such phenomena are obscure just because they are so far abnormal, but they are not therefore supernatural. And the "power," as it was called with a kind of awe, was not one whit more or less mysterious than "the fits" we can remember at those revival meetings.

Irving has himself described these doings in certain papers which appeared ■ the time in Fraser's Magazine, and there is no difficulty in believing all he says, except ■ to the final conclusion, that they were of divine origin. At that point we pause, and have to consider whether the thing uttered had any divine quality in it. There were, then, two forms in which the supposed spiritual afflatus expressed itself. The one was the properly "unknown tongue," which I have never heard spoken, but of which I have come across two specimens in writing. Of course, one can make nothing of it, as it was only supposed to edify him who used it, which one will hope it did, for it is of no use to any one else. There are a great many vowels in it, and only a sprinkling of the more liquid kind of consonants, ■ you might expect to find in a mere ejaculation. When read aloud, I seem ■ hear in it a frequent echo of Greek terminations, especially the Homeric ones, as if the speakers had once known a little Greek and forgotten all but the general sound of it. It seems also to have a kind of rhythm ■ a loose, irregular sort, and I can easily imagine that, when it was chaunted in an ecstasy of exaltation, such as Irving describes, the effect would be rather startling in a sober Presbyterian kirk.

But there was another form in which "the power" expressed itself, happily for us. ■ spoke sometimes in plain English, and if we might judge by what it said when we can follow its meaning, we might have our doubts about the deep things which its unknown tongue concealed. Indeed, anything more flat and commonplace than the pious ejaculations of Messrs Drummond, Baxter, and Cardale, when they were under this inspiration, it is not well possible to imagine. Henry Drummond, apart from the afflatus, could say shrewd, incisive, and witty things, worth listening to, even if not always very wise. But when he spoke by "the power," he was weak like other men, or perhaps a little feebler than most. His brisk and sprightly intellect at once became leaden, while the Baxters and others exploded in merest rapid exclamations. I hold no abstract theory as to the possible return of miraculous gifts to the Church. That is not a thing I dogmatize about. There is no scriptural authority for saying they were only meant to be temporary, and there is no distinct point in history when we can affirm they ceased to be. But when the ordinary course of nature is to be departed from, one naturally looks for some result worthy of such a step. We get, now and then, from certain quarters, messages said to be from Shakespeare or Milton, or others of the mighty dead who, in default of handier tools, communicate through creaking tables. I do not affirm absolutely that the dead may not speak to the living, for I know nothing about their liberties or their limitations. But I make bold to say that, if Shakespeare has anything to say to any one, he will not talk twaddle, and that if Milton chooses to speak, he will make even a rickety old table melodious and grandly rhythmic. If they ever do break the solemn silence, it will be because they have something to say which is well worth saying, and which could not be fitly said without them. In like manner, I cannot believe in a supernatural divine afflatus which talks no more divinely than the good folks at a Methodist camp meeting.

At first, when this "power" began to show itself, Irving tried to set some bounds to its exercise. He thought that the apostle had laid down rules which he had a right to enforce. Therefore, when some ecstatic female found herself unable to hold her peace during sermon, she had to make a rush at the vestry with her mouth full of burning words which she poured forth in a torrent, and in a high pitched key, the moment she got within its door. That, of course, could not go on long. If it was really God that was speaking, who could set bounds to Him? Who dare say that the Holy Spirit must keep silence that a mere man might speak? Irving tried a compromise. An interval, after reading and exposition of the lesson for the day, was allowed for any one to speak, who could not be silent. That seemed reasonable, but he had not now to do with reasonable creatures, and in spite of their lack of reason, they had clearly the logic on their side. The Spirit was not subject to times and seasons of human appointment, he was like the wind that bloweth as it listeth. By and by, therefore, in the middle of prayer or sermon, during any part of the service, a voice, male or female, would be uplifted, shrill, wild, and eerie, only there was nothing in it, but the merest commonplace. Poor Irving, once pities him, and wonders what had come of his old Annandale common sense. But he sincerely believed in this inspiration of "the latter days," which had little of the poetic grandeur of the old Hebrew prophets. He was confident that Christ was coming, and that these were signs of His coming. Therefore let him, Edward Irving, stand aside, with his genius and his eloquence, let him be as nothing, while these poor oracles did the work he was not meant to do, so he reasoned, but he forgot that God's workmen are not generally conceited and self-sufficient as those people were. He may set Balaam's ass to rebuke the prophet, but the ass usually speaks very good sense, and besides it says something which the prophet refuses to say.

As we may fancy, there rose ere long no small stir about these things. The crowds in Regent Square grew bigger than ever, but they came not for any good they hoped to get there, but merely to hear the tongues and add to the confusion. Naturally the elders and trustees were greatly troubled, and there were meetings, expostulations, and proposals of various kinds, for Irving was very dear to their warm Scotch hearts. But all came to naught. If this were the Lord's doing, who was he to fight against God? What could they do with a man who, in the simplicity and purity of his soul, moved on a high level of truth far above all orderly proprieties and honoured ancient customs? On the whole, perhaps, the right thing to do would have been simply to resign office, and leave him to go his own way. If they took no action, no one else could, and what good would come of breaking his heart, whose very life was bound up with that church in Regent Square? True, they had got built for Scotchmen in London, and held it in trust for them. But after all it was Irving's popularity that built it, ■ him in equity ■ belonged, for without his eloquence not a stone of ■ would have been laid upon another. If the Church of Scotland claimed it, let her establish her right at law. But ■ for them, what better could they do than depart, ■ least till Irving came to his right mind again? But in those years men had high notions of ecclesiastical authority and duty. It was not thought enough, when a church and any of its ministers could not agree, to part company, and still try to keep their charity. There must be trials, suspensions, depositions, all formalities of law, however little of its spirit.

Two of these so-called trials Irving had now to undergo, the first before the Presbytery of London, promoted by his trustees and elders, and the second in Annan, substantially by order of the General Assembly. Charged in London with permitting irregularities in the conduct of public worship, he could not deny that things were done in Regent Square church which were not customary in the Kirk of Scotland, only all the witnesses testified that what they did was by the Holy Ghost, with one exception, and he thought he had been deceived "by a lying spirit." Whether it were so or no, the Presbytery did not pause to inquire, nor would it probably have been to much purpose if they had. They had no particular skill in "trying the spirits," and besides, they had made up their minds to put a stop to the scandal Irving's beliefs, his protestations, his prophetic warnings all went for nothing. He had allowed unauthorised persons to speak in his church, and therefore its door was closed to him next Sunday, and that though it happened to be the Communion Day—a clearly gratuitous piece of harshness, for they might have let him conduct the service under protest that it was not as of right but of grace only. He found a place of refuge for a time in a hall that was used during the week days by Robert Owen for the preaching of philanthropic infidelity. That was an offensive association for one who loved the Church and the catholic faith as Irving did, but ere long he escaped from it, and pitched his tent in Newman Street, in a gallery which West had erected for his huge canvases.

The other trial was for deeper matters, and involved graver issues. It was conducted by the Presbytery that had ordained him, and in the Church where he had been baptised. Its result, too, was from the beginning a foregone conclusion. The Church of Scotland had lately been purging herself of heresy. She had deposed Macleod Campbell, whom Chalmers thought to be "the holiest man he had ever met," and had taken his licence from Alexander Scott, one of the most suggestive thinkers of our day. Having accomplished this, the Assembly tossed Irving to his native Presbytery, with strict injunctions ■ see to the purity of doctrine taught in the Church. I do not dwell on the trial. Irving was present part of the time, for he clung to the Church of his fathers like a child to its mother's breast. But he did not abide the end when, in the dusk of a wintry afternoon, by the light of a flickering tallow candle, he, whom God had so plainly consecrated for the work, was declared to be no longer a minister of the gospel of Christ. His friends in London received the sentence in a very strange way, to say the least of it. Instead of protesting against an unrighteous deed which, for truth's sake, they must ignore, instead of meeting their minister with a generous sympathy which might have somewhat comforted him, they substantially endorsed the sentence. Like dull pragmatic formalists, they said that what the Church of Scotland had given, she had a right ■ take away, and when Irving returned to them, they objected to his baptizing a baby, till he had been reordained by the laying on of their hands. Irving, who believed in these people and their orders and inspirations, submitted humbly and, if he felt it, he certainly made no complaint.

By this time also his health was failing. Unremitting work and perpetual excitement had undermined even his splendid constitution. In the beginning of 1834 it was plain he must have rest. But he would not go to the south of France or Italy or any of those resorts where people seek for health in balmy air. He thought he had still work ■ do, and needed but to get among his native hills for awhile. So he went north, by way of Wales, preaching of course as he went, and for a season ■ seemed as if he had judged rightly, for he writes ■ his wife of greatly improved health. But a long ride through a pelting rain brought on a shiver, a settled cold, fever, and other symptoms which greatly alarmed his friends, when they saw his gaunt form and sallow face at last in the streets of Glasgow. There he had only been known when he was in the strength of his manhood, and there now he died on the 7th of December, 1834. There, too, he was buried, in the solemn crypt of the noble cathedral church.

By EDWARD WHYMPER, AUTHOR OF "THE ASCENT OF THE MATTERHORN" 1

THIRD (AND CONCLUDING) PAPER

THE ascent of Kelerlingout was a complete success. The day was cloudless and the summit proved to be loftier than anything in its neighbourhood and was well isolated from the surrounding peaks. As I cast my eye down the m. lge up which we had come my followers were seen as little black dots scattered over it at intervals, some regarding their poor feet and some pretending to be much interested in the landscape, in the manner of people who are very tired. The bearer of the theodolite legs was the most advanced of them and when he arrived I fixed and levelled the instrument in order to sweep the horizon. It was soon evident that I was more elevated than anything within a great distance with the exception of two sharp, glacier clad peaks lying on the northern side of the Umanak Fiord, and these two mountains which are between 7,000 and 8,000 feet high are the loftiest I have been able to find in North Greenland.

Kelerlingout was 6,800 feet high, and there was a grand and most interesting view from its summit in all directions. Southwards it commanded the whole breadth of the Noursoak Peninsula, and extended over the Waigat Strait to the lofty island of Disco westwards it embraced the western part of the Noursoak Peninsula with Davis Strait beyond northwards it passed right over the Umanak Fiord (some 30 miles wide) to the Black Hook Peninsula to the north east it was occupied by the fiord with its many imposing islands and islets surrounded by innumerable icebergs streaming away from the inland ice, and in the east extending from north east to south east, over well nigh 90° of the horizon there was the inland ice itself—presenting the characteristic features which have been mentioned in the earlier papers. The southern part of the view of the inland ice was seen from Kelerlingout, overtopped the northern part of it as seen on former occasions whilst northwards it extended to at least 71° 15' N lat, so I had now viewed the section of the interior between 66° 30' and 71° 15' equal to 190 English miles and had everywhere found a straight unbroken crest of snow covered ice concealing the land so absolutely that not a single crag appeared above its surface.

The height of this straight, unbroken crest of snow was now the object of attention—the principal object for which the ascent was made. On bringing the theodolite to bear upon it I found that it appeared to be slightly depressed below my station, but, as it was distant more than 100 miles,* ■ was only lower in appearance and not in reality. On the assumption that it was no more than 100 miles distant, after making allowance for refraction and curvature of the earth, its height was found to be considerably in excess of 10,000 feet.

The reader is now in possession of the reasons for saying it was certain that Baron Nordenskiöld would be disappointed if he should take the direction indicated in his programme, and why his statements regarding the interior of this part of Greenland caused both surprise and concern. A journey made across the frozen interior would no doubt be accounted a remarkable achievement, but there is every reason to believe that it would be barren in results. For, although the interior has not been seen from the outskirts over its entire length and breadth, it has been viewed to a sufficient extent, and has been examined with sufficient precision, to render it a matter of all but absolute certainty that the whole of the interior from north ■ south, and east ■ west, ■ entirely enveloped in snow and ice. Almost all that can be learned by traversing this frigid waste can be learned, with greater ease and at infinitely less cost, by continuing its inspection from the mountains on the outskirts, and this is the course which has the greatest attractions for future explorers.

Though the veritable interior of Greenland is likely to yield very little of interest to the explorer, the case is far different with the fringe of land bordering the coast. The changes which have occurred both in the elevation of the country and in its climate, are amongst the most remarkable which can be quoted from any part ■ the world, and the people by whom it is inhabited have many points of interest about them. I propose to devote the remainder of the space at my disposal to these three topics, taking first the comparatively recent great upheaval of the land.

Earthquakes and active volcanoes are unknown in Greenland, yet the country presents evidences that it has been the scene of tremendous convulsions.

Besides the small areas of crusted rock which may have made its appearance through rifts or fissures, there are wide spread districts composed of volcanic rocks, with thicknesses of thousands of feet. The island of Disco, which measures more than sixty miles over in every direction, is mainly composed of them, and they are here 3,000 to 4,000 feet thick. The mainland on the opposite side of the Wight Strait is also principally composed of them, and they attain there a much greater height and thickness, rising to the very summit of the mountain Kelertungout (6,800), which is the greatest height at which they have been observed in Greenland. In this district the volcanic rocks stretch more than 100 miles east and west, and considerably more than that distance north and south. They have not the appearance of having welled out of a crater, or some vast rift in the surface of the earth, but rather suggest having been violently upheaved or punched upwards, possibly during a somewhat similar convulsion of nature ■

* As some read it may not readily credit the possibility of seeing it so soon from a distance. I may mention that a few days previous to the ascent of this mountain when upon the summit of Hare Island (11,800 feet) about sixty miles to the west at midnight, I recognised in the north the mountain near Upernivik called Sanderson's Hope and to the S.E. the mountains at the extreme southern end of the Wight Strait—the former being 150 miles and the latter above 100 miles distant from me. Thus with one exception, is the greatest distance at which I have recognised objects during winter expeditions, the one exception being the Arctic Ocean seen from a height of 18,000 feet on Chimo.

that which occurred in 1883 in the Straits of Sunda, when the island of Krakatoa was shattered to pieces, and large areas round about it were suddenly upheaved or depressed. But such a convulsion, if it occurred, must have been on a vastly more important scale than the eruption of Krakatoa. The area concerned is many times greater, and the cliffs are prodigious—on Disco often rising more than 1,500 feet in single clear precipices, and at the northern end of the Wugit attaining perhaps their greatest development, where, on the mountain Karkarsoak the seaward face, nearly 4,000 feet high, is mainly composed of one great cliff, little removed from perpendicularity.

Whether this great development of volcanic matter made its appearance at one bound, or at successive periods, or whether it has been subjected to alternate upheavals and depressions, are questions which are likely to exercise the ingenuity of geologists for some time. There is evidence on the lower slopes of Kaktungouit touching the Umenak Fiord, that at that part upheaval has occurred during a quite recent period, for there, at a place called Pattersfik, there is a considerable shell deposit, rising from a few feet above the sea to more than a hundred feet above the sea, where thousands upon thousands of marine shells* of a dozen or more species, are lying on the surface, or are imbedded in a conglomerate of pebbles and sandy detritus, and beginning to form a rock of extraordinary hardness. This deposit appears to have been formed at the end of a fiord (which has become dry land), in the same manner as deposits of a similar nature are now being created at the end of fiords in the neighbourhood of the inland ice. The engraving at the head of this paper represents a small fragment from this interesting spot.

This place has been visited by various travellers, amongst others by Baron Nordenskiöld, who termed the matrix of the deposit, "a somewhat hardened basalt sand in course of transformation to basalt tuff." As there may be considerable difference of opinion on this matter, I referred a specimen to Prof. T. G. Bonney, F.R.S. who has examined it microscopically, and has favoured me with the following note:—

"This rock is composed of various mineral and organic fragments imbedded in an earthy matrix. The mineral fragments consist of quartz and felspar—sometimes in association—with a greenish mineral in part at least hornblende (not common) of a minutely crystalline basalt (rare) and a few grains of a dark brown glass probably related to the last named. The organic fragments, as I believe in all cases little shells of mollusks. The earthy matrix is too decomposed to allow me to decide upon its origin. It may either be decomposed felspar or the detritus of basalt. The greyish or greenish aspect of the rock would not be unfavourable to the latter view. From casual minute peculiarities I believe that the quartz and the felspar are to a large extent derived from a granite or granitoid gneiss. Volcanic dust may partly make up the matrix, but the rock is not in any proper sense of the word a tuff."

(From the type specimen in the British Museum.)

About a hundred miles to the south of Patorfik I obtained a better proof of up heaval by finding at a distance of several miles inland, at a height of 550 feet above the sea, shells of the following species — Yoldia hyperborea, L., Y. glacialis, Gray; Tellina tenera (?) T. proxima, Brown, Nucula nitida, Sowerby, N. tenuis, Gray, Saxicava rugosa, L., Astarte, sp. The foregoing two instances, and especially the latter, afford strong testimony, and they are supported and confirmed by other evidence. All the highest summits I have climbed in North Greenland are composed of rocks of volcanic origin, and they are everywhere, almost up to their highest points, sprinkled with a large diversity of drifted rocks. To the general reader it would be tedious to enumerate instances in the detail, which will be done ultimately, and I therefore quote only one example, namely, the summit of Hare Island. This island lies to the north of Disco Island, and is about seven miles long, with small cliffs by the shore, crowned by a slightly undulating top, almost a moor, favourable for the retention of detritus, as it is little liable to denudation. The whole of this top (the summit of which is 1,800 feet above the sea) is covered with drifted rocks, in size from small pebbles up to boulders containing several cubic yards, which have settled down, with their largest diameters approximately horizontal, and are in many places so well fitted into each other that they almost look as if placed by the hand of man. This is only one example out of many which might be quoted. The general features of the land, the existence of marine shells at considerable elevations above the sea, and the vast quantity of drifted matter, appearing in some places just like a sea bottom,* all lead to the conclusion that great and wide spread upheaval has occurred, and that it took place (geologically speaking) at no very remote date, as the shells are all of an arctic type, and mostly, if not entirely, still live in the Greenland seas.

It is curious to find, in the heart of this region of volcanic rocks, in an arctic country and in an arctic cold, the fossil remains of a flora totally distinct from that now living there, and one which implies the existence of an earlier period of a very temperate climate at the least. Fossilised wood, leaves, flowers, and fruits have been found at various parts of the volcanic region of North Greenland, in more than a dozen places, and have been referred to various periods—those which have been assigned to the Tertiary period alone amounting to about 137 species, and the major part of these have come from one place, called Atanlerdluk, situated on the western slopes of a mountain facing the Waigat Strait.

My attention was first directed to this subject by noticing in McClintock's book, "The Voyage of the Fox," p. 26, a reference to a "fossil forest," and it appeared that Mr Olin (who was refused to in the first paper) had given Sir Leopold some specimens from the above mentioned place. "I came away," said he, "enriched by some fossils from the fossil forest of Atanlerdluk." On inquiry of Mr Olin, I learned the situation of this locality, and that he had obtained at various times through the natives a considerable number of specimens from it, many of which had been sent to Copenhagen, but he had not, I believe, actually been upon the spot whence the specimens were taken. By his advice, before proceeding there, I went to the settlements of Rutenbuk and Sakkik, to obtain local guidance and assistance, and on arrival at the spot was accompanied by fourteen natives engaged to collect, besides my own regular party. From a little shelf on the slope, about 400 feet long, and out of strata amounting to scarcely more than three feet in thickness, I obtained no less than seventy-three species, including oaks, poplars, chestnuts, planes, sequoias, magnolias, and many others. By the instrumentality of Mr. R. H. Scott, F.R.S.,† the first set of these specimens was secured for the British Museum by means of grants from the British Association and the Royal Society, and the whole were sent for examination and description to the late Prof. H. H. H. H. of Zurich, who had also examined most of the specimens previously brought from this locality, and I take the following extracts from his observations upon them:

"The collection contains seventy-three species from the locality, of which twenty-five are new. Of the latter five are found in the Miocene flora of Lurup, viz., Fraxinus Meneghinii, Smilax grandifolia, Quercus Lohrkei, Corylus insignis, and Saxifraga ferretorum. Of these the Smilax and Saxifraga present points of peculiar interest. The Smilax grandifolia represents the S. Meneghinii of the present Mediter-reanean flora, and at the lower Miocene epoch was distributed over the whole of Europe. It is found in Italy, Switzerland and Germany up to the coasts of the Baltic, and we now know that it occurred even in Greenland, hinging probably in festoons from the trees. The Sassafras has hitherto only been found at a few localities, which are, however, so far apart that it is very probable that the plant ranged over a large part of Europe. An interesting new species we have to notice a Viburnum (V. Whymperei) resembling the V. Landana of Europe and the V. dentatum of America, an Asaba with leathery leaves, a Cornus, an Ilex with very large leaves, two Rhus, a Sorbus, a Nyssa, and two Heteropappus. . . The collection gives us also much information about species already known. It contains many fine leaves of Michauxia, which extend our knowledge of this remarkable genus. The oaks appear very frequently at Atinekerdluk. To the eight species which we knew formerly, a new one (Quercus Iaharpei, Gaud.) has been added, while among the former ones we obtained some perfect leaves of Q. Lyallii, and Platanus. The same is the case with Yucca, Pinus, and two remarkable ferns (Hemitelia Lyallii and Woodwardites), differing very widely from all species both of the temperate and frigid zones. The discovery of the fruit and flowers of the chestnut proves us that the deposits of Atinekerdluk were formed in different seasons, in spring when the chestnut is in flower, as well as in autumn. The discovery of the fruit of Mentha arvensis is a further confirmation of a species founded only on the leaves.*

To discuss such an assortment as this in an arctic climate is in itself sufficiently remarkable, and it is the more so to find it within an area measuring less than 200 feet in length, 10 feet in width, and a depth of 3 feet 8 inches. Within this space thousands of specimens of seventy-three species were obtained. In his valuable paper, Prof. Heer speaks with admiration of the "densely packed" masses of leaves, but the collection as it reached his hands conveyed little idea of the wonderful profusion seen on the spot, which gave the impression of a most luxuriant growth of vegetation, of numerous species in close contiguity, and of an immense accumulation of fallen leaves, twigs, and branches.

As a rule, there were only impressions of the leaves. The original tissues had disappeared, though in some cases the tissues remained, and even cones and stems were found with their structure only slightly fossilized. Those nearest the surface were in a hardened, reddish clay. These masses did not split easily, and they suffered little in transportation, and the larger part of those which arrived unbroken in Europe were of this nature, but the lower strata, composed of greyish shales, were by far the most prolific, and, when cleared, the supernubundant rubbish, presented a most charming spectacle of myriads of leaves lying closely one over another, as perfect in preservation and contour as when they had first fallen to the ground. These shales, unhappily, were exceedingly tender and brittle, and they suffered greatly in transit, and through the frequent picking and repacking, so that few reached Europe intact.

The deposit at Atinekerdluk is by far the richest which has been discovered in Greenland, either in species or specimens, but I have myself (in 1867 and 1872) collected fossil leaves belonging to various periods at ten other localities, either upon the mainland, Hare Island, or Disco Island, and there is little doubt that many others will be found ultimately. The greatest success obtained in 1867 was the discovery of a Magnolia cone on Disco Island, and this afforded much satisfaction to Professor Heer, who had previously observed in specimens which had been sent to him some fragmentary leaves which he referred to Magnolia. An engraving from this specimen, which is now exhibited in the British Museum, is given of the natural size. In the same neighbourhood, in 1872, I obtained large quantities of fossilized wood. The stems and trunks which are found in this condition greatly exceed in dimensions anything now growing in the country. There is now, indeed, scarcely anything in North Greenland worthy of being called a tree—the nearest approach being the dwarf birch, which creeps along the ground, and seldom grows as high as a man. The largest living wood is hardly ever more than a finger in diameter, while complete fossil stems have been found exceeding a foot in diameter, and isolated fragments are occasionally met with, which have apparently belonged to more considerable trunks. The largest fossil stem I have actually brought home, belonging to a coniferous tree, is figured herewith on the scale of 3½ inches to a foot, and an interesting contrast is afforded by the annexed specimen of living wood (the largest I have actually seen growing) which

* The whole were taken after by my assistant working under my eye or with my own hands. They were all collected in situ and there was no interference of debris. Specimens brought in by natives without knowing whence they came. It is not as a rule advisable to employ natives to collect fossils without supervision, they are apt to be very apt to mix specimens coming from different strata, and thereby produce confusion leading to totally erroneous conclusions.

* Quercus Iaharpei of Broeger, was the most abundant species both at Atinekerdluk and at other places, and is found in the form of almost every slab of considerable size.

† It was necessary to carry them 2,174 feet down the hill, then they were re-packed and transported in a boat to Kulusuk, then sent by a dog to Copenhagen, then by steamer to London, where they were again re-packed and then shipped by steamer and rail to Zurich.

‡ The color name was given by Prof. Heer in compliment to Adolphus von A. Imhoff, Esq., who I am informed, was the first to bring specimens from Atinekerdluk to England.

■ engraved upon the same scale as the other fragment.

Considerable differences of opinion have been expressed regarding the period to which Prof Heer has referred this fossil flora, and some as an easy way of accounting for its presence in latitude 70°, in so arctic a land, have suggested that it was floated to its present position from more genial climes—a conjecture that no one would entertain who had seen it on the spot. The evidence is already overwhelming that, in the past, vegetation flourished there of a character now unknown in the country, and that there was a dense and luxuriant forest growth which extended over nearly a hundred miles, reckoning from north to south, and from information I have received, I have little doubt that this area will be extended ■ no remote date.

The Greenlanders deserve more space than can be allotted to their consideration. They have their peculiarities, but when these are mastered there are few people amongst whom it is so easy and pleasant to travel. A single person can trust himself amongst them, unarmed, without apprehension. There is probably no country in the world more free from deeds of violence than Greenland. Murder is practically unknown there, and order is maintained, or rather maintained itself, without the assistance of a single soldier, policeman, or magistrate.

Their treatment of the Greenlanders has for many years past redounded to the credit of the Danes. The native population, which a century ago numbered about 5,000, now exceeds 10,000. It was stated long since that the majority of the natives could read and write, and from personal observation I should say that the proportion of those who can read is larger than in the British Islands. In some way or other the Danes have succeeded in making school-life attractive, and though the small natives delight in making dainties as much as their children, they display a greater love for school than is commonly found in more civilised regions. Some other branches ■ civilisation which have been introduced are perhaps less generally beneficial. The vices of snuffing and smoking are largely indulged in, and "the skilling (farthing) cigar" has become an institution amongst the urchins. I heard in Disco Bay of one child, aged 2 years, who enjoyed a short pipe—but it should be said that she was accounted precocious.

Many of the good effects which are now visible should doubtless be attributed to the seed sown a century ago by the Egedes. The house which was tenanted at Claushavn by Hans Egede barbye (grandson of the first Egede), which was referred to in his "Extracts from a Journal," is still standing—a queer, little, incommensurable dwelling, into which it is difficult to understand how he stowed away his wife and family. In his time fiends were systematically practised upon the natives, but at the present it would be difficult to point to any country where trade is more honourably conducted.

The list of the goods which are supposed to be obtainable at the stores is very comprehensive, embracing everything that the heart can desire between gunpowder and lavender-water, and, as the selling prices are extremely moderate, it seems at first sight that a traveller would find this a cheap country. It is, as well, point out that a great many of the articles set forth exist only in the list, and that all eatables very commonly run short in the summer months just before the arrival of the annual ships. I came once to a settlement where nothing whatever eatable could be obtained, and where scarcely anything was left in the store except china buttons, fish-hooks, and lucifer matches. and, as I was very short of food at the time, the problem presented itself, Which of these three articles is the most nutritious?

The arrival of the annual ships is eagerly looked for, and is usually the most important event of the year. In the northern settlements, Godhavn, the capital, is generally the first place to receive news from Europe, after having been cut off from civilisation for seven months. On the extremity of the promontory within which the harbour lies, there is a signal house and look-out station, a quaint little building, supported internally at the angles by large bones of whales, and many wistful glances are cast from it down Davis' Straits in the spring for the first ship, bringing news from home and food for the hungry. Jens is perhaps most eager for that half cask of rum which was ordered twelve months ago, Hans considers his sixty pounds of tobacco the most important of earthly considerations, but all devour the news, to find whether the loved ones at home are well, and above all to learn, is there Peace, or is there War?

MR. MUNDELLA'S COOKERY CLASSES.

IN the twelve months that have elapsed since the subject of the introduction of practical cookery into the elementary schools was discussed in this magazine, public opinion has rapidly developed in its favour. Possibly this is in some degree due to a deeper insight into the causes underlying the intemperate habits that work so much degradation, and to the perception that "Outcast London" and "Squalid Liverpool" in great measure exist because the people in their ignorance have no capacity to appreciate or make good use of any comfortable domestic arrangements that are planned for their benefit. In almost every utterance of the social reformers who are struggling for Home Reform this difficulty is recognised as one great barrier to success. Mr. Mundella, in his reply to the complaint of over-education in the elementary schools, says, "that, in his opinion, the children are not over educated, but under led. We can therefore resume the discussion of cookery instruction with fresh arguments in its favour, as well as fresh encouragements from the Department and flesh experiences of work done to lay before those who desire to take up the subject, or to stir up others who have hitherto been in diffident or even inimical to the proposal.

What Mr. Mundella defines as "the want of proper food" for the children is only one phase of that loss of "home life" which is such a palpable evil among thousands of our working people, and which disheartens so many from making efforts to ameliorate their present external conditions. This loss is to be met with, not only or even chiefly in the degraded mode of living so terribly brought before us of late, but in the homes of otherwise decent working men, where want, dirt, and drink almost necessarily prevail. And why almost necessarily? Because the wife and mother knows little or nothing of thrift, of sanitary laws, or of the art of providing and the methods of preparing wholesome food. And knowing nothing, she finds her ignorant efforts so unsatisfactory that she discontinues them and ends in driving her husband to the public-house, and in bringing up her own girls with an equal distaste to the unknown joys of good housewifery. She herself probably becomes the afternoon loungee on the doorstep, ready for any temptation that may present itself. This is no fancy picture, but a condition of life too often found amongst our people, for which no one remedy can ever be found. Possibly many remedies working hand in hand may succeed in restoring a pure and healthy tone to the home of the English working man.

Taught in school the niceties and advantages of practical domestic economy, girls of every grade will know how to value and to use the better arranged houses which may soon be within the reach of even the poorest. And if, instead of philanthropy helping to pauperise by giving food to poorly fed children (or, worse still, the State undertaking to do so), its efforts are directed to teach the people to help themselves, we may hope that the introduction of cooking instruction into the schools will, before long, show results in the better fed condition of the brains and bodies of the younger members of the family.

In April, 1883, the new code came into operation, and from that date "in schools in which the inspector reports that special and appropriate provision is made for the practical teaching of cookery, a grant of four shillings is made on account of any girl over twelve years of age who has attended not less than forty hours during the school year at the cookery class." This condition is quoted in extenso for the purpose of directing attention to the principle implied in the term "appropriate provision for the practical teaching of cookery," viz. that this grant is for something quite different from the "culinary treatment of food" taught by theory under the head of Domestic Economy. Unless a great part of the children's time is occupied in practical work, the condition of the code for which the four shillings is granted is not complied with. Hence, also, the objection to large practice classes, which, for economy's sake, are a great attraction to school managers. In large practice classes only about half of the class can work at a time, while the other half look on, or, perhaps, learn a recipe or two, neither of which occupations produces much result at the age at which these classes are formed, although, of course, the forty hours may be duly made up thereby.

There is one difficulty in the conditions of the grant, viz. fixing the age of twelve years, at which the subject is permitted. But we have every reason to hope that this will be changed to eleven years of age. Out of 14,000 schools in England and Wales, in 8,000 the children are free to leave after passing the fourth standard. Very many of them are only eleven years of age. In two recently examined cookery classes of twenty four girls, all from the fifth standard and upwards, the greater number were only eleven, and one only ten years of age. The managers had wisely allowed their children to have the benefit of the lessons, although it is to their pecuniary loss, for they will receive no grant for any under twelve. In another class of thirty, where all had passed their twelfth year, before a quarter of the lessons had been given more than one third of the children had left to go to work. In consequence of many such experiences as these the Committee of the Liverpool Training School of Cookery have petitioned the Department to reconsider this difficulty, and have been promised an early attention to it. If the change is permitted one of the greatest stumbling blocks to managers and teachers in arranging the cookery classes will be at once removed.

Even more encouraging than the grant itself, are the terms of approval and recommendation of cookery contained in the report which Mr Mundella laid before the House on the 20th of July last. He then said, "We are glad to learn that arrangements are being made in various parts of the country, by school boards and voluntary associations, for giving girls, in the last year of their stay at school, some practical instruction in the subject of cookery, a knowledge of which is so useful to them in after life. The grants offered by the code which has recently come into force, will, it is hoped, be of use in encouraging managers to make cookery a part of the ordinary course of instruction. After the three elementary subjects and sewing, no subject is of such importance for the class of girls who attend public elementary schools and lessons in it, if properly given, will be found to be not only of practical use, but to have great effect in awakening the interest and intelligence of the children."

No stronger recommendation could possibly be addressed to managers on the introduction of any new subject into their schools, and if the opinion of the Lords of the Privy Council on Education has any weight with them, we might expect that few schools would consider themselves "excellent," until they had taken up so important a subject. Though placed in the code amongst the "Specific subjects," it is here ranged in order of usefulness next after the four obligatory subjects, and before long may take a place among them.

To this commendation of cookery there is appended a condition to which we wish to direct special attention. The lessons will be of use, "if properly given." This we take to mean, given by teachers who are qualified to do their work thoroughly. The teaching of cookery is not simply the preparation of certain dishes, which might be shown by any ordinary cook, but includes much instruction in the even more difficult art of choosing suitably nourishing and, at the same time, economical articles of food, so that the smallest incomes may meet the needs of the largest families. Such instruction means a fairly broad education on the part of the teacher, with complete mastery of the practice of cookery, and the power of imparting this instruction in an attractive and efficient manner. Experience shows that the more highly the student has been educated so much the better teacher she eventually becomes. This is a work which is most undesirable to add to the duties of the schoolmistresses, whose time and strength are already fully taxed, and who, as a rule, by no means desire to take up this additional burden. We therefore advise, very strongly, that if the subject is to be taught effectively, and to the satisfaction of her Majesty's Inspectors, the lessons should be given by special teachers, regularly trained in those schools of cookery where diplomas are awarded, and with particular regard to proficiency in teaching children of the working class. In this way only can managers feel assured that their children are taught how to become thrifty providers, as well as good cooks. The occupation is one which highly commends itself to many well-educated persons, from whose ranks it is most desirable that the staff of teachers should be drawn, and for whom there will be ample employment if even a small proportion of the schools take up the subject.

The training for a diploma of the Northern Union of Schools of Cookery occupies from five to six months. After taking the different courses or lessons required for her own instruction, and having passed two theoretical examinations, the remainder of the student's time is employed in practising the art of teaching cookery, very special attention being given to qualify her to teach children in the elementary schools. Her specimen lessons satisfy the requirements of the committee, marks for efficiency in teaching are added to those already obtained for practice and theory, and all this to make up the diploma. There are two kinds of diploma. A full diploma qualifies to teach all branches of cookery—high class, household, and artisan. The fee for this is £10 10s. An artisan diploma qualifies only to teach household and artisan cookery. The fee for it is £7 7s. The study of certain specified books is required of the student, and after each theoretical examination she receives a certificate.

We will look now at some of the results already attained, and also answer questions so often asked as to matters of arrangement and general detail.

On the 18th of September last year the Countess of Derby, on behalf of the committee of the Liverpool Training School of Cookery, of which she is patroness, presented the cookery certificates of the Liverpool school a large number of children who had received lessons in practical cookery for the forty hours prescribed by Government on the plans of that school. We refer to this as a thoroughly representative gathering, children being present from almost every possible variety of girls' school, and showing the many directions in which cookery instruction has penetrated. There were classes from voluntary schools of all denominations, Church of England, Roman Catholic, Unitarian, Non-conformist, from the Female Orphanage, from the certified Industrial Schools, from the Workhouse School, and last, but not least in importance, and certainly first in interest, a class of barefooted guls and boys from the Night Industrial Ragged Schools. Upon this class the examiner reported that they were even quicker in their work and more intelligent in their answers than the children of the higher class schools, though all alike seemed extremely interested in their work, and the majority of them put their instruction into practice at home. The thanks of grateful parents had rewarded the managers for taking a lead in this matter, and the ragged boys had been allowed to learn at their own urgent entreaties. The cleanliness required for their lessons was in itself a valuable experience for them. That such useful instruction has successfully penetrated to the very lowest strata, even to the gutter children, proves what can be done, if we choose to set to work, with the young, in preparing the very poorest to understand and appreciate good house arrangements.⁴

Many inquiries have been made as to how cookery can be introduced into the already crowded time tables. Experiences differ, but the greater number of schools seem to have taken a portion of time from sewing, advanced arithmetic, and grammar—a plan which would be quite keeping with the opinion of the Department quoted above. In none of the classes mentioned had there been more than fifteen girls in a præparatory class, generally only twelve. The demonstration classes are sometimes attended by two or even three practice classes, so that forty lessons instead of sixty would suffice for three classes. The lessons being alternately demonstration and practice, the three classes that attend one demonstration would each have a practice lesson before the next demonstration. This very much reduces the expense of instruction. Lists of utensils and details of plans have already been given in this magazine (January, 1883), but it may be well to remind the managers of country schools of the co-operative plan, by which a teacher giving, as is due, ten lessons a week, can reside for half a school year in one central place and instruct ten neighbouring classes.

Evening classes might also meet the difficulty of half-time schools, which are so numerous in the manufacturing districts, where such instruction is particularly needful.

Some people still object to the use of gas in giving lessons to the poor, but no girl has ever expressed any difficulty in working at home, because at school she learnt at a gas stove. If the principles are thoroughly explained, an average amount of common sense will carry them out anywhere. The £5 5s. required for the rest of the utensils is not a very formidable amount, and if other educational associations followed the liberal example of the Liverpool Council of Education, and made grants to poor schools for this special purpose, there are many managers who would be glad to commence work, who are now only deterred by expense.

The conclusion of the whole discussion may be briefly summed up in the words of Mr. Mundella, "Delays are dangerous." And they are particularly so in matters of education. While we are "considering and inquiring," one school inspector after another is setting free from the authority of school and sending into active life whole generations of girls, who go to form the future wives and mothers of the people. By compulsory education the public has taken the training of these girls into its own hands, and therefore it owes to them to provide such instruction as will fit them to carry out home duties with more success than has hitherto characterized the home life of many people of this land.

⁴ An important feature in the practical working of cookery classes is the employment of printed recipes, which the children can carry with them. Among these recipes care should be taken to include such as may be of use in the preparation of food for the sick. It has been most gratifying to find that such a plan is finding its way into the hands of the girls who in consequence of the lessons on practical cookery given in elementary schools have been able to supply suitable nourishment to the patients in the families to which they belong.

I 'VF played the poor orphan I ve bathed and whined
In the cold and the wind and the wet,
An I ve lied like a nigger thru' whok blessed day,
An I ain't earnt a 'ilpenny yet

First a clergyman comes and I 'rye to myself
Here's a customer, sure as I pay
He was thinking of next Sunday's sermon, I's post
For he chivied me out of his way

Then comes a fine lady an' carried a dawg
As was petted and fed like a saint (Ah, there's many a man as is left to starve,
An' there's many a dawg as am I)

An I see 'O the lady, I see see I,
All a shiverin' and chatterin' with cold
“My father's just dead and mother is lef'
With but me, an' a gel two years old”
XXV—14

(For yer see it comes easy to be in that way
When you've learnt it ever since yer was young)
Bite the lady poked 'O with her fat little dawg
An' her foot boy he put out his tongue

So yer see I felt hopeless so hungry and queer,
An' tremblin', I arldly could stand,
An' it seemed as my broom 'ad grew cavier much An' was gettin' too big for my 'and

When I see a old lady, as looked wery good,
An' could pity a bit of a chap,
As was angry and little and dirty and pore,
An' would give me a penny mayhap

But she gave me two tract, 'bout brimstone and that,
As one were called, 'Sinner do Right'
But they made my heart 'cavier much than before,
An' my stomach they lef' just as light

Ah me! I was wretched, and wished I was dead,
Dead and quiet and out of the cold!
An', if you'll believe me (for I can tell the truth),
Down I goes in the mud, and I 'owled.

An' I 'owled and I 'owled till I fell fast asleep,
An' nobody noticed—not one,
'Cep' the policeman, who stirred up my bones with his boot,
An' 'angrily chivied me on.

Blunderin' and stumblin', I crawls on agam,
In the face of the wind and the sleet,
Till, more dead than alive, into town one
I walk,
An' fell in a 'cep at his feet.

'Twas a navy; he houted me up in his arms,
As kind as a h'angel could be,
An' out comes my story, without any lies,
For I were too wretched, yer see.

"Oh, give me some bread, wet, give me some bread!
For I know I shall die, if yer don't,

An' I give you my word that I'm not lyin' now,
An' if you will hear me, I won't.

"I stand at my comin' from mornin' till night,
An' I begs of the coves as go by;
An' I lies, sir, I lies like a bad little beast;
If I don't they won't listen; that's why.

"You say I'm a werry small chap to be here;
Ay, I've never a friend, 'cep' my brooms,
For I can't got no partiklar parents, an,
An' I can't got no partiklar 'ome."

Then he carried me straight to a 'ospital 'ouse
(An' that's where I'm stayin' just now),
So warm and so rich, like a palace
it is,
Right away from the dirt and row.

An' a young doctor comes to me every day,
As gentle as ever I see;
And sometimes that navy comes in at his side
A-bumpin' a present for me.

An' they whisper and whisper,
the nuns an' all.
An' one told me (my ' didn't

SUNDAY READINGS.

BY THE EDITOR.

MARCH END.

Read Psalm civ. and 1 Cor. ix. 9 to end.

THERE are several mistakes, ancient and modern, met by St. James when he gives the warning, "Do not err—Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." He gives us, for example, a principle which may be applied to the difficult question regarding the origin of evil, and to the source of every-day temptation. There have been those who have recognised evil as a necessary and even salutary element, as being the stimulus to virtue and the educator of the will. Others again, puzzled by the existence of sin in a world governed by the Omnipotent God, have drifted into a dark fatalism and dared to ascribe evil to the Almighty Disposer of all events. Now St. James meets all such theories with a broad negative. Whatever difficulties may beset the question, one thing is plain—"God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man." God is "the Father of lights," therefore all light comes from Him; and with Him can no darkness have its origin, for "with Him is no variableness nor shadow of turning." As the sun gives forth nothing but light, and as darkness springs from the interruption of its rays by matter that is foreign and alien, so the ineffable clearness of God's goodness can have no shadow of inconsistency. The shadow of sin is not from Him. "Every man is tempted when he is led away of his own lust and enticed."

But St. James also meets the error of those who in the spirit of a false Puritanism would confine God's gifts within the limited circle of things spiritual. He asserts that "every good gift and every perfect gift" is from God. There is not one God in grace and another God in nature, but the broad tide of wisdom and power and beauty which floods all worlds, material, intellectual, and religious, flows from Him. It is indeed ennobling to reflect on the fulness of the perfect goodness which thus surrounds us. Only cover for a moment the blots of wickedness and consequent sorrow and death which mar the vision—and, lo! what a paradise lies before the eye, surrounding us on every side with a loveliness which is absolutely without spot or blemish ! External nature presents a landscape thronged with multitudinous forms, and colours, that are stannessly beautiful. Or, if we reach back to the laws which regulate all physical movement, we trace, from the greatest sun to the tiniest ephemeral, a wisdom and tenderness which are inexpressible. Or, if we examine the social system under which God has placed us, we recognise in our natural affections and all earthly relationships, nothing but tokens of divine goodness. The mutual love of parent to child, of brother to brother, and of husband to wife, is the language through which we learn the meaning of the highest relationships which bind us to God. The social life of the community is a school for self discipline and mutual duty. Even the body is holy. The hunger and thirst, the heat and cold, the health or sickness, the pain or enjoyment of which our bodies are capable are important elements in our education. They are the promoters of commerce and of the intercourse of nations. It is chiefly to supply our bodily wants that we scatter our fleets over every sea, and cover the globe with railways and telegraphs. Without multiplying further illustrations, enough has been suggested to show that, when we deduct the evil which springs from the perversion of God's good gifts by sinful man, there remains surrounding our common life one vast system of blessing and mercy. It is a strengthening and joyous thought to recognise this in the work of Christ, Who, in removing not merely the penalty of sin but sin itself, would vindicate, as from God and to be used for God, every department of human interest. It is thus that we can understand the religious function fulfilled by the statesman who moulds public policy so as to subserve the beneficent purposes for which the social system has been intended by God. We thus see the nobility of the sphere which the true scientist fills, who learns the wisdom and glory of God in the material universe, or of the artist who seeks the ideal beauty breathed in nature's groupings of form and colour, or in him who applies for useful ends the laws which God has imposed. For what are science and art but man's acquaintance with God through material things? So that every truth learned and every beautiful work accomplished by us are but "good gifts and perfect gifts" that come from "the Father of lights." Even in the clash and din of daily toil we can recognise the acquirement of skill, money, or influence, and the working together of the many towards the advancement of the social whole. When thus used as from God and for God these labours constitute a truly religious service. Intellect, imagination, skill, the eye which delights in beauty and the voice which thrills with harmony, the joys of domestic life and the varied links which bind man to man, all are from above, and if we but subtract that one disturbing element, "every man is tempted, when he is led away of his own lust, and enticed," there is nothing left but what is perfectly good and religious in the truest sense.

MARCH 9TH.

Read Psalm lxxv. Colossians ii.

What is that "world" which St. John commands us not to "love," but "over come?" We are familiar with the interpretation frequently put upon it. Hatred of the "world" is the pet phrase of many religious schools, who with facile audacity classify as "worldly" all persons who do not repeat their shibboleths. Pharisaism has in all ages attempted to set up visible barriers between the lawful and unlawful. The austerities of the early Christians, the monastic system of the Middle Ages, and the easier but equally narrow exclusiveness of modern religious coteries have been founded on a similar desire to create a society which shall be a visible protest against worldliness.

Let us then try to understand what St. John meant by "the world." He certainly did not mean that we were to hate the world of nature. The green earth, the sweep of ocean, the splendid day and night with their chastity, beauty, are God's own handiwork, and full of His glory. Nor can it be the world of social life with its manifold duties and influences that is condemned. When men have fled from society in order to escape worldliness, scowling on the genial humanities, which weave the brighter threads of innocent memento into the hard web of earthly care, or regarding with indifference, if not suspicion, the many pursuits—political, literary, and scientific—by which the advance of civilisation is determined, they have generally experienced worse than failure. Pride and ambition have not always been extinguished by the cowl of the monk. Vanity and all uncharitableness sometimes display their most revolting aspects within those very religious circles which glory in standing aloof from the world. In contrast to such methods of avoiding worldliness we may remember how Christ's own life was a protest against the distinctions created by mere "schools" of opinion or of observance. He shocked the religious narrowness of His time by His universal lovingness and sympathy. He refused to walk under the petty tyrannies of prevalent conventionalism. He dined with people at whose table no Pharisee would sit. It was because of His very unworldliness that Christ broke through all fictitious distinctions. He was the object of reproach in proportion as he vindicated the liberty of the spirit against the dead letter of external rules.

For worldliness does not lie so much in the object as in the spirit in which we deal with the object. There is nothing necessarily evil in "the world," or in "the eye," or in "life." It is when "the lust of the world, and the lust of the eye, and the pride of life" come, that worldliness prevails. Everything depends on whether we are so governed by the objects around us that they reign over and determine our character, or whether we are governed by the sense of God, and of the holy, and true, and pure, and good, and see the objects that surround us in subjection to these principles. For there are two tendencies with which we have to deal. The one would drag us down, chaining us ■ the influences or passions excited by the things at hand, the other appeals ■ us in the name of God and of duty, and according as we yield to the one or the other of these principles, do we become worldly or unworldly. When the present ■ engrosses our interest that life falls under its power, then are we "carried away by the course of this world," and our characters are moulded, not by the eternal ideal, but by the force of circumstances and the fashion of the hour. Without touching on the grosser forms of evil, we can see this principle illustrated in common life. There was nothing wrong in the plentiful harvests and the enlarged gains of the prosperous farmer, but he became a worldly man because these were his all in all. He had neglected that being of his which was made in the image of God, and which ought to have had its life in the spiritual rather than in the material and temporary. His wealth held him in possession, and he was mastered by the very things of which he foolishly thought himself the master. A similar spirit of worldliness may exist in the poorest as well as the richest. The labourer whose interests are centred on the question of weekly wages may in this manner be as worldly as the millionaire who spends his existence over his ledgers. It is the like principle which converts the possibly pure gratification of our social instincts into worldliness. When society with its petty ambitions, its gossip, its trivialities, engrosses the mind, so that ■ the world of fashion men and women become mere things earned on by the stream, and accepting the tone and mannerisms of the hour, without obedience to the claims of God or of His love—then are they emphatically "worldly people." And not otherwise ■ it with that subtle worldliness which so often mingles with the false pietism which affects ■ be separate from the world. When there is no sincere outgoing of the being towards what is simply just, loving, and dutiful, but when the interests of the little or great sect are allowed unquestioning supremacy, and conventionalisms exercise their tyranny, and ambition, vanity, or petty intrigues find shelter under the sacred names of Church or Creed, then have we what in unconscious satire is sometimes termed "the religious world."

Without further illustrating this principle we may ask next how it is to be overcome? St. John replies, "This is the victory which overcometh the world, even our faith." If faith is that which gives substance and reality to things unseen, then we can easily perceive how in proportion to the strength of faith we will overcome the engrossing influence of the things seen and temporary. The man of faith walks as "seeing Him who is invisible." He is not dragged down by the earthly tendency, but like one who, ascending a mountain top, beholds the hills and trees, which once appeared great, shrink into comparative insignificance, so faith lifts him into a position whence all earthly objects can be regarded in their true proportions. He thus learns to use things aright. But ■ is more than the mere principle of faith which determines him, it ■ faith in Jesus as the Son of God. We take Him, the living Saviour, as our Guide and Master. ■ we are ever tempted to be worldly, we are strengthened to live above the world when we behold the glory of Him who, while He consecrated all earthly relationships by His presence, yet was so immovably held by His life ■ God that no shame or desertion, not the tedious agony of the Cross, nor all that this visible world could heap of difficulty or trial against Him, could make Him swerve from the path of loving obedience or disturb his central life in God.

In conclusion, it is by the application of these principles that we are able to solve many of the practical difficulties which beset some people. When they ask whether it is right for a Christian to engage in this amusement or that, or where the line is to be drawn between the lawful or unlawful in the degree as well as in the kind of recreation that may be enjoyed, I answer that no such rule can be laid down with any precision. The gospel gives us principles, and leaves the application of those principles to the conscience of the faithful. There is no Pharisaic drill prescribed for the avoidance of defilement. There is frequently both cowardice and wickedness in the demand for certain definite limits, because that demand often conceals the desire for self-abandonment within the limit. But Christ's law of life admits of no such casuistry. He commands us to share His own mind, and if we are true that then the very instinct of loving loyalty will teach us what is right. This is a searching law which admits of no compromise. It is the law of liberty, for it is the expression of what has become our life. By it must the Christian be guided in all things, and through its power, and by the indwelling of the Holy Ghost, can he alone overcome that subtle worldliness, which lurks not in outer things, but in the eye with which they are regarded.

MARCH 16TH.

Read Paul's 2nd and 3rd Cor. 2: 12.

It was in reference to the question, then so keenly discussed at Corinth, regarding the lawfulness of eating meat which had been offered to idols, that St. Paul laid down the maxim, "whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, do all to the glory of God."

The old question of meats and drinks, which, like many others since, was noisy in proportion to its insignificance, has long ceased to have any interest, but the principle laid down by the Apostle is as important as ever.

It is not difficult to understand what is meant by glorifying God. There is a sense in which sun and moon, winter and summer, frost and snow, beasts and all cattle, "praise and exalt Him for ever." But it is in a different manner, because conscious and intelligent, that God's children are to glorify Him. The way in which the marvellous structure of the human frame shows forth His glory, is easily distinguished from the method in which the soul that inhabits that frame is called on to praise Him. Man glorifies God when he appreciates and confesses what God is. It was in this sense that Jesus Christ glorified God. He found in His very meat to do the will of His Father. And we also glorify God only as we respond to what He is. We glorify His love when we render to Him our affections, we glorify His wise government by submitting to His guidance, we glorify His grace by yielding to Him our hearty trust, we glorify His holy will by obeying it, and we glorify His promises by having our hopes fixed upon His faithfulness, as a very anchor of the soul. Every one who thus responds to what God is, really adds to the glory and blessedness of the universe. As the star, which catching the rays of the sun, itself unseen, not only manifests the presence of sunlight in what would otherwise have appeared a dark and empty heaven, but adds to the splendour of the sky a new brilliancy of its own, so does every faithful servant of God make the glory of God visible by reflecting His righteousness and love. Heaven and earth are enriched by every pure spirit who dwells in the light of the divine countenance.

Now St. Paul teaches us that there is no act however lowly, no life however commonplace, which may not be consecrated to the glory of God. It is a simple and oft-enforced lesson, but none the less requiring to be continually pressed upon our attention.

For there is nothing does more harm to true religion than the non recognition of the will of God in our ordinary duties. That is a most mischievous error, which teaches us to hand over to what is called "the world," the things which really occupy the greater portion of our thoughts, and which form the most powerful factors in the formation of our characters and in the advancement of good or evil around us. According to such conceptions Jesus Christ was fulfilling "worldly" labour when He toiled in the carpenter's shop, while He was "religiously" occupied when He was preaching in Galilee. In like manner a man is supposed to be engaged with "religion" when he is in church, but to be pursuing things "secular" or "worldly" when he is in the office, or when wielding the hammer in the workshop. A woman is doing something "religious" when she goes to the prayer-meeting, but can see nothing religious in the management of her household, or in her duty as a servant. And thus life becomes divided, and religion and business are kept in two distinct departments. The consequence is that Christianity is denuded of the very power which God intended it to exert. Commerce, politics, amusements, social intercourse, being classified as "worldly," are left to take care of themselves, instead of being permeated by the Christian spirit, whose purpose is to elevate and purify all that belongs to us as men. Now, a primary principle for right-doing is to remember that it is God Who appoints our various duties, so that the work of shop or factory may be recognised as being given to one, as much as being a clergyman or missionary is given to another. The Christian merchant should know that God has called him to buy or sell, as truly as He has called another to preach. When the right motive governs, then even the cup of cold water becomes consecrated, which is given in the love of Christ.

But it is obvious that this conception of the sacredness of labour excludes all work which, from its very nature, is injurious to our own souls or the souls of others. It is impossible for any sincere man to believe that it is God's will that he should gain his livelihood by things which hinder the good of others. If his occupation is such, or if "the custom of the trade" is such, that he cannot ask God to bless or prosper him in its pursuit; if it is of a nature that he feels Christ's presence with him in it would be a continual rebuke; then he is bound, at whatever cost, to obey conscience. "No man can serve two masters." For the Christian the glory of God is the one guiding rule; and if any man knows that the verdict of the great Judge can never be, "Well done, good and faithful servant," in reference to the manner of his life—then must he make a choice between sacrificing what may appear to be "his interests" or the loss of the divine blessing.

MARCH 23RD.

Read Psalm I. and St. Matt. vii. 12 to end.

Last Sunday evening we spoke of the sacredness of common duties, and the importance of the rule laid down by St. Paul, "Whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all in the glory of God."

There are many hindrances to the advancement of the kingdom of God besides the attacks of modern unbelief, the deficient supply of churches, or the unsuitability of religious services; and among these one of the greatest is to be found in the gulf which has been allowed to separate things religious and secular. The divorce is often complete. He does not seem to be the same man who sits so demurely in the pew on Sundays, full of interest in sacred things, and who on weekdays is the overbearing or overreaching man of business. It is not easy to connect the full-blown decorum displayed in church with the mean trickeries or the unprincipled selfishness which the brother merchant knows were characteristic of certain trade transactions. The "scamped" workmanship or cowardly eye-service perhaps rendered by another who, if religion meant no more than an ample supply of pious phraseologies, would be eminently religious. The temper which keeps a household in misery, or the rude inconsiderateness which jars every relationship, or the bitter party-spirit which, to serve its own ends, can touch the borders of falsehood, are often found in persons who would expect the highest place to be given them in the synagogue. The effect of such inconsistencies is to deter men from Christianity altogether. Clerks in offices, intelligent mechanics, and artisans ask, "What is the use of religion if it does not make people honest, kind, generous, and courteous?" They point to the revelations of the Bankruptcy Court, they describe the recognised habits of trade, and assert that the Parsee or Mahomedan is as reliable as the Christian. They tell you to contemplate the actual condition of society, and to measure the slight influence which Christianity has upon the relationship in which class stands to class, the rich to the poor, the employer to the employed, capital to labour; and on such grounds as these they refuse, perhaps with a certain bravado, to acknowledge the value of truths which seem so powerless in practical life.

It is easy to give replies, more or less satisfactory, to these objections. It is obvious that Christianity is not to blame for the wrongs inflicted on its every principle by men who "hold the truth in unrighteousness." Nevertheless, we should be thankful if such criticisms serve to rouse the Church of God to evils too much overlooked, and thereby lead to an examination of the causes out of which they spring. And of these causes, one of the most pernicious is the schism between religious and secular affairs, and the identification of religion with certain opinions, feelings, hopes, and observances, rather than with the production of a certain character through the energising power of right beliefs and affections. It is by Christian people recognising how God must be glorified in business, in politics, in society, in such relationships as master and servant, parent and child, by manifesting in these the Christ-like spirit of truth, patience, considerateness, generosity, and kindly love, that that kingdom can best be advanced which is "not meat and drink, but righteousness, and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." Such methods are surely more powerful than those hard processes of dogmatic argument which so often fail of true conversion; or, still worse, which enlist fleshly passion on some "side" in a wretched Church controversy. The attraction of Christ-like tenderness, and the vision of lives sweetened by meekness and charity, are the best proofs of the value of religion.

But so to act we must have as the ruling motive of our lives the desire to glorify God in all things. I do not mean that the presence of God must always be a distinct subject of thought, but to that love God must form the abiding motive. For it is quite possible for the mind to give itself wholly to the work in hand without such a motive being ever really absent. Just as the workman may be bringing every energy to bear upon his immediate task, while the thought of the home for which he toils, the sick wife, or the child that is to greet him on his return, is never absent as the chief stimulus to labour and its reward—so too, even when God is not consciously thought of, and when the whole attention is strained in the fulfilment of some passing duty, yet may the Christian have the glory of God as the great object of his life. And just as the workman must know and love those for whom he labours, so must we cultivate the knowledge and love of God by daily prayer, and by bringing ourselves under those influences which inspire the sense of God's goodness and glory, otherwise the fountains of motive will soon be exhausted. Otherwise, though we may continue to prate about work being worship, we will find our work speedily losing those qualities which are essential to its consecration.

Rom. Ezech. xxviii. 17. St. Luke xiv. 12.

The contrast which our Lord draws between the slave who fulfils what his master orders in blind obedience, and the friend who understands and sympathises with the purpose of the command, illustrates the difference between the education of the law and of the gospel. The distinction lies in the spirit in which obedience is rendered, rather than in the duties which are imposed. St. Paul illustrates the same truth by showing the difference between the life of the child as guided by external rules, and that of the full-grown man who acts on the principles of which the rules are but the expression. Under the letter of law the disciple could ask, "How often shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? until seven times?" implying that after that he might get his revenge. But Christ raised him from the letter to the spirit when He replied, "Not until seven times, but until seventy times seven;" for when a man became His friend and shared His own loving mind, there could be no limit to forgiveness.

But the spirit of legalism assumes many shapes, and the teaching of Christ requires to be continually repeated in order to counteract the Pharisaism peculiar to every age of the Church. In the present day we need His teaching to throw light on many tendencies. This evening we will use it as illustrating the position in which what are called "good works" ought to be viewed.

There is a practical error, common both to Romanism and Protestantism in regard to this subject, which is at once removed when we understand the difference between the spirit of the slave and of the son. Under Romanism and its kindred systems a type of religious service is frequently witnessed which cannot but arrest attention by its great earnestness and devotion. In a luxurious age there is something very striking in the spectacle of self-assumed poverty, and the endurance of painful fasting and numberless privations, in order to win the favour of God. The most menial duties are fulfilled, and an unquestioning obedience rendered, the great merit of both being self-mortification whether there is any right reason for such or not. There is undoubtedly a certain fascination for young or romantic minds in such devotion. There appears something essentially religious in the self-abnegation that is enforced, and many naturally conclude that persons who undergo so much suffering in order to please God must be the true representatives of Christ.

Under Protestantism we discover frequently a similar tendency. When a man becomes anxious regarding his soul, and recognises how very far he is from the standard of goodness which is revealed in God's word, he feels as if he dare not go on until he becomes a better man. He then resolves to give more attention to his religious duties, to pray more earnestly, to read good books, to lay aside evil habits, and by doing so he hopes that by-and-by God will have mercy on him and save him. In the meantime he thinks it would be presumption in such a sinner to take the place of a son towards this holy and awful Being. It seems more humble and reverent to remain far off—a hired servant rather than a child. All this is quite natural!

But both the tendencies I have described are contrary to the method of the gospel of Jesus Christ. He came to the world to make us first children of God—and when children He calls us to do the will of the Father in the liberty of sons, who know the mind of the Father and sympathize with it. Reconciliation comes first—and the consequent obedience is ■ be that of friends, not of slaves. He demands undoubtedly self-sacrifice and thorough consecration to His service, but these to be truly acceptable must be the fruit of the new love which has been awakened. When the Prodigal came home, and his father, embracing him, cried, "Rejoice with me, for this my son which was lost is found, he was dead and is alive again," would it have been true humility if the son had refused to take the friendship thus offered, and had insisted on being treated as a servant? What if he had said, "Take away the ring and the robe and the shoes—I can not accept much mercy. I insist on labouring with the meanest of the slaves, and by the toil and suffering I endure I will try to make myself worthy of the hire of bread, for which I starve. Perhaps after such deserved privation I may be received as a son, but not now." Would such conduct be the expression of true humility, or of pride? Would it not be a worthier act frankly to accept the father's love in the spirit of restored sonship? After that he might in deed work and toil, but how different ■ be working in the liberty of a son from toiling as a slave!

Now Jesus Christ came to show us that God would deal with us even as that father dealt with the Prodigal, that He blots out our sins and iniquities, that He restores us as sons, and will not have us as hired servants, that by His grace He inspires the spirit of sonship, and that the service He seeks is the service of a love which finds its very life in pleasing Him. He calls us not servants, but friends—who share His own blessed thoughts of love, holiness, and joy. Good works are even more called for under the gospel than under the law, for there is no law so searching as the law ■ the spirit of the life that is in Jesus Christ, and no command so exacting as that love which makes self-sacrifice a very instinct.

CHAPTER XVI.—COMING THRO' THE SPRAY.

 Then do you know I ever looked down on me

THE day was passing on, the tide was rising, the awful four white walls of sea that were rearing and dishing in Soulsgrif Bight were growing more appalling in their dread tempestuousness with every hour that went by. The spray of the waves that struck the foot of the cliff flew upward in curling, twisting columns, the lighter masses staining the white snow on the cliff tops, the heavier falling back and mingling with the flying surf that was obscuring all sight of the rugged blackness of the rocks at the back of the Bight.

The little boat with the shipwrecked crew was still there, tossing outside the breakers ■ could be seen from time to time for a few seconds. When it had been first seen six figures had been visible against the clear cold glare beyond. "Then my little lad isn't there!" said Ailie Drewe with quivering lips and blinded eyes, and from that time Ailie had nothing more to say. But she still stood there, braving the cold, and the snow, and the cruel showers of hail.

Near five hours had gone by between the sighting of the dismayed ship and the sudden looming of the life-boat on the top of Briscoe Bank, but it was only three hours since George Kurloewald and his Bevis had ridden into the coastguard station at Swarthcliff.

Swiftly, silently, yet with terrible difficulty, the boat was lowered down Briscoe Bank by means of ropes. When it touched the sands of the Bight there was a burst of strong, unclouded, yet almost overpowering emotion. Tears, sobs, prayers, broken words of hope and consolation, revealings of long suppressed affection, warm clappings of hands that had never touched in friendship before—this was the choral music of humanity set ■ wild accompaniments of storm wind, and thunder-loud bass of the furious wave.

Swiftly, and as silently as might be, the life boat was manned, the brave sea-soldiers buckled on their buoyant armour, set their pale blue lances athwart the rest, and turned to face the foe with hearts as brave, as disdainful of danger, as any that ever beat in the breasts of the chivalrous knights of ancient repute. Chivalrous!

"I do distrust the poet who discards all character or glory in his tunes,
 And trim his tale to his own hundred years,
 Past most and drawbridge into a castle court,
 To sing—oh not of hazard, or of toad,
 Alas! the ditch there—twere reasonable,
 But of some black chief, half knight, half sheep, after."

If Homer had seen Ulysses and his men launching a nineteenth-century life boat straight out into the very middle of the breakers that surge and dash upon the North Sea coast during a hurricane, we had had another epic to set our hearts a beating to its diviner theme.

George Kirkorwald was a poet, not quite mute, not quite inglorious, but it was hardly to be expected of him that he should see the poetry of that day's deed while his best strength was set to help the doing of it. For a long while after the launching of the life-boat he saw nothing but the desperate strife it had. No eye there saw aught save the boat, its swift forward leaping, its downward plunge into the trough of the sea, its perilous uplifting and suspension on the curling crest of the mountainous wave, its perpendicular rearing as it rose, its dread descent as it fell, its human reel and shudder under the shock of a mighty blow, its sad submission to the drenching, bursting wave that half-filled the hollow between its planks, the swaying, the rocking, the toising, the threatening, the hard, strong, desperate striving,—how should any eye turn from the appalling fascination of a scene like that?

Genevieve Bartholomew saw it all, not knowing how she dared to see, not knowing or dreaming what she might yet see. For her the scene was as strange, as utterly unimagined, as it was touching and overwhelming. She was still alone, still on the sloping ledge of shale where the rock curved a little to the southward. She was utterly heedless—a native of the place would have said reckless—of the waves that were hissing below her, seething at her very feet, sending flying showers of spray all about her. How could she fear a few flakes of foam in such an hour as that, when men were fearing not to risk their lives, fearing not to face death at such odds as these?

She was not saying these things to herself, she had forgotten herself altogether. She had no thought but for the safety of the souls there in peril—the life boat crew, and the crew of that lesser boat that every now and then came into sight for a second or two, and then disappeared in a way that sent a thrill through the gulf's whole being, suspending every faculty of life with dread and pain. More than once she had to turn and hold by the rocks behind her for support when the surge of fear had passed over her, it seemed to leave her strengthless, and this was a new sensation. It never occurred to her that exposure, need of food, keen anxiety, could have much effect of any kind.

Still she stood there in the curving of the rock, a little sheltered from the wind, and a little sheltered from observation. The surf was still flying about her; it began to fall more and more heavily, and at last the edge of a wave burst upon her with some force. Thus was awakening. Turning to retrace her steps, she saw with a sudden sinking and sickening of heart that the yellow yeasty waves were tossing the long tangle of the very stones she had passed over—it seemed to her only a few minutes before.

Was it impossible to reach the sands?

Another daring greedy wave, another thud against the perpendicular wall of rock, another clash of the recoiling wave and the advancing one, another cloud of heavy spray, these things made answer.

She was standing there, holding by the jagged edge of the rock. She afterwards remembered looking up at it, noting its curious linear fractures, its manifold tints of black and green, of russet and blue, of various brown and amber, she remembered distinctly the thought that it might be the last thing her eyes would rest upon.

Presently she closed her eyes, praying for deliverance, if deliverance might be. If not . . .

There was nought to be heard through the roar of the storm. There was a smothered cry down on the beach by the water's edge, where the people had gathered after the life-boat had been launched. Genevieve did not hear it. She had been standing farther forward by the angle of the jutting rock when she discovered her danger. She could be seen as she stood there, a tall white figure against the black rock, and Ailie Drowe had been the first to see her—the first to raise that startled cry of dismay.

It could only be a few seconds that elapsed before Genevieve was conscious of a dark form dashing through the white whirl of spray, of a strong arm thrown round her, holding her firmly through a fierce shock, a drenching, blinding shock of water. Then she knew herself lifted, borne on . . . For a little while she knew no more.

It was a very little while, not more than a minute or so, she doubted, indeed, if consciousness had ever really left her, it grew suddenly so quick, so keen, so full of shame, so full of gratitude. All at once she was herself again as she stood there surrounded by the little group of helpful women who had left the crowd—she hardly saw them in that first moment. Her eyes were lifted to the face of the man who had risked his life for her life. ■ was only a look she gave, no word, but it repaid him—he knew that on the instant—it repaid him a thousandfold.

The day was eventful, but that one look was the event of the day for him.

"You will come with me?" he said rhetorically. He was always authoritative, always most courteously commanding in his manner. He drew Genevieve's arm within his own, made ■ rest there, accommodated his movement to hers, and went up the beach to the little inn with quite ordinary gravity and composure. There was a fire blazing, provision made for any half-drowned man who might reach the shore, a woman waiting to do what might be done. She was rather amused than concerned by the brief history of the lady's drenching that Kirkoswald gave.

"Strange folks don't understand, ya see," she said, removing Genevieve's dripping fur palmetot, and the little white fur cap with its limp feathers. "They don't understand, an' Ah've seen 'em that venturesome 'at Ah've been fair 'mazed. But all's well 'at ends well, an' Ah reckon you're not much worse, miss, by ■ look o' ya?"

"I thank you, I am not any worse myself," said Genevieve, glancing at the dark, wet figure beside her, who stood watching her with quiet concern.

"You'll be thinkin' o' yer cloak," the garrulous woman went on. "Ah's frightened myself 'at it 'll dry rather hask,* wi' t' salt water, an' it 'll be a pity. It's a bit o' bonny graithun,† if 'tis rether kensprie,‡ but it be comes ye well. Ah said so to Marget this mornin'."

Genevieve listened in amusement. George Kirkoswald was turning away, his work outside was not yet done.

"I will come back presently," he said. "Meantime you will have something to eat, please, and you will oblige me by remaining here until I can arrange for your return to Murk-Marshes."

Genevieve looked up with a quick blush.

* Hask—humb, unyielding.

‡ Kensprie—composure, too easily recognized.

He knew her then, or, at any rate, he knew something about her. Was ■ aware that she had left Miss Craven, who would be both perplexed and angry, ■ Thirkeld Abbas? Did he know that she had a father, who would at least be anxious? Did he understand how she had come there; how she had longed ■ be at hand ■ offer sympathy, to be of use, to tend and help others rather than he tended herself? Could he comprehend her disappointment and humiliation? All this was behind that one glance that George Kirkoswald answered with a smile as he went out. It was the smile of a man who smiled rarely, and ■ was strangely moving, strangely sweet for a face so strong and sad.

It passed from his face very quickly. The little door of the inn opened straight on ■ the low quay. As he went out he saw quite distinctly the life boat struck by the heaviest sea she had encountered yet. It fell like an avalanche, well nigh swamping the boat, and breaking six of her oars. "They snapped like straws," said one of the men afterwards, a man whose arm had been disabled by the same stroke. Two other men were hurt, the boat was not manageable against the wind, there was nothing for it but to turn back for reinforcements of men and oars. A whole hour's rowing at full strength in such a sea as that had exhausted the powers of the life boat crew to a considerable extent, and it had been fruitless.

A low sound that was half a cry passed through the crowd when it was made clear what had happened. The storm was still raging with its wildest fury. The little boat was still in sight. Six long hours it had tossed there between Briscoe Point and Soulsgrif Ness.

CHAPTER XVII.—"SIT STILL AND HEAR THE LAST OF OUR SEA BORROW."

Love's not a flower that grows in the soil earth,
Sings by the crickler, must wait by man
Her run, merrily by part—most like the time
To stem, to leaf to bud to blow, it owns
A richer soil, and grows a richer seed.
You look for it, and it is there,
E'en while you look, the perfect flower is up Consummated in the birth!"

KNOWLES

GENEVIEWE, watching from the inn window, could see all that was happening out there in the infuriate storm. Another snow squall was looming and threatening in the distance, the coxswain of the life-boat was calling out for fresh hands—they were there with fresh oars, all waiting ready. Among those who put on the cork jacket for the second attempt George Kirkoswald was foremost. Was it a fancy, or did he really glance up from under those heavy, frowning brows of his toward the window of the little inn?

Another moment and they were out again in the great white upheaving world of water. It seemed as if the roar of the gale were rising to a shriek as the squall came on. The mingled sleet came down, rain and snow one minute, rain and stinging hail another. You looked, and the life boat was visible through the slanting scud, leaping, plunging, quivering, the men bending forward on the thwarts under the deluge that was pouncing over them, clinging for very life. Again you looked, and there was neither boat nor men to save, neither boat nor men to be saved. All was rage, dread, white fury, black despair.

For an hour, a whole, long hour, that seemed as ten, Genevieve stood there by the window. The childish sense of wrong doing that had haunted her all day was gone now. Everything was gone but one strong desire.

She would not have said it to herself, she would not have dared to say that one man's life was more than another, but it was one man's face that came before her when she prayed, one man's voice that rose above the others when the cry of drowning men seemed to her tensely strung nerves. A long, mingled with every shriek of the gale.

At last, through a break in the thick, yellow grey mystery, it was seen that the life boat was being rapidly driven shoreward again. Another minute and it was seen that she had more than her crew on board.

No voice was heard in that suspense. ■ any spoke, even to God, he spoke silently.

Not till the life boat actually touched the beach, slanting downward on a seething wave, did the cry reach the shore—

"ALL SAVED!"

Across the Bight it flew, amid the roaring and rattling of the hurricane.

"All saved! all saved! all saved!"

Genevieve heard it. She ran out from the little inn, down the half dozen steps of the quay, away over the wet, shingly slope. The old man ■ whom she had spoken first when she came down to the Bight was there. He took her hand and pressed it, tears were streaming down his furrowed face.

"Oh, my honey!" he exclaimed, "they're saved! they're saved! It's a miracle! a miracle! as much a miracle as if they'd been raised from the dead!"

"Ay!" said another ancient manner, "A never thought ■ live to see the day when a boat 'ud be built to swim in a sea like that!"

Some of the people made way for the young lady who had stayed with them so long, and sympathized with them so keenly. Words of help, comforting, consoling, had been passed about from lip to lip during the day, and her kind face and unassuming ways had opened hearts that were not opened too easily. Though she never came into Soulbisgrif Bight again she would not be forgotten there.

She saw the one figure she desired to see—he was helping to lift the rescued men out of the life-boat, pale, helpless, exhausted men who could not even look their gladness or their gratitude. One was lying back with closed eyes, another had torn hands, torn with clinging to the little boat, but they were too much frozen to bleed. Another had a broken arm, that hung down when he was lifted.

Ailsie Drewe's little lad had been lifted out almost first, lifted into his mother's arms, but he lay there quite listlessly. There was no sign of returning consciousness as he was carried home, no sign when he was laid on the sofa by his mother's fire. Genevieve had left the beach with those who had carried him. She was there in the cottage helping others to chafe the frozen limbs, that had been covered quickly with hot blankets, helping, too, to keep up the mother's fainting hope.

"The child breathes—he breathes quite naturally," she said, bending over the wet, yellow curls to kiss him as he lay. He was only a little fellow for his years, and he looked so fair and sweet in his death-like pallor that she could not help but kiss him. In after days Ailsie used to tell him, smiling sadly as she said it, that a lady's kiss had kissed him back to life. Certainly it was strange that his blue eyes should unclose just as the kiss was given. He looked up, at first vacantly, then, as his eyes met his mother's, with recognition. But they were very heavy eyes, and they soon closed again. Was the lad remembering how and where they had closed last?

There was a tale to be told, and by-and-by a gentleman came in, hoping that he might be there when the boy told it. Perhaps he had also another hope.

"I trusted that you would be here, Miss Bartholomew," he said. "I have taken the liberty of sending to the Richmond Arms for a cab, ■ will be here presently."

"Thank you," Genevieve said, feeling again a confused sense of wrong doing, a still more confused sense of wonder as ■ what this stranger was thinking of her.

"I must explain to you," she said. "I came to Thirkeld Abbas with Miss Craven this morning, and I promised to wait for her at the Rectory . . ."

"Instead of which you ran away?"

"Yes," replied Genevieve with a sudden smile, perceiving quickly that she had no need to fear misconstruction. "Yes, I suppose it might be put that way."

"I think you ought to look sorry."

"Don't I look sorry? I should say then that must be because I look afraid. I believe I am very much afraid of what Miss Craven will say. ■ is so late, it will be dark very soon."

"Don't ■ apprehensive," said Mr. Kirkcald, changing his tone to one of greater kindness. "I will see you safely home, if you will allow me, and after that I can easily take care that Miss Craven comes to no harm that I can avert. I shall go back by the moor."

Again Genevieve looked up with the sudden inquiry in her eyes that had amused him so much before, but his instinctive courtesy was stronger than his amusement.

"If you do not know my name I ought to tell it ■ you," he said. "It is George Kirkcald, and I live at Usselby Crag, there fore I have the pleasure to be your neighbour."

"Thank you," Genevieve said, "I did not know." To herself she added, "And yet I think I did—I think I have known it all day since that first moment."

All day! It was only a fragment of a day in truth, and yet it was half a lifetime.

Surely if she had never seen this man before, then he was one whom she had long desired to see, she had heard of him, or read of him, until the impression had been made, that he had to day confirmed. It was he who had mingled with all her past inner history, it was he about whom all that was best and highest in her estimate of humanity had gathered, it was he to whom she had turned for guidance when thought was confused, for help when knowledge was darkened, for support and sympathy when the days were heavy with unsuspected burdens. He had been part of her past life, as certainly as he was part of the present, and her future was bound to him, though she should never see the greatness and the goodness that was in him looking down from his eyes into hers again till her life should end.

She hardly thought consciously of the deeds he had done that day as she stood there. They were only a part of himself, and being himself he could have done no other. Yet doubtless the acts had disclosed the man more plainly than years of uneventful intercourse would have done. And it was not only the thing done, the manner of doing it made evidence also, and there was no touch there to mar the fine consistency of the impression.

There was a lighter feeling in the cottage by this time, the little lad was sitting up, leaning against a pillow and sipping some tea. Rough, uncomely faces moved smilingly across the firelight. Ailsie looked pale as she sat by the sofa. She was rocking herself to and fro, as if the weight of dread and sorrow were loth to leave her, and full deliverance hard to recognise. She was not ungrateful, poor woman, but her gratitude lay trembling under dread possibilities, awaiting a freer moment for expression.

Presently the boy spoke, and his mother bent over him.

"Yon's hum 'at pulled me oot o' the water," he said in a faint voice, and indicating Mr. Kirkcald as he spoke.

"Yes, and it was more of a pull than anybody would think to look at you now, my man," said George, coming ■ the side of the little patchwork covered sofa, and stroking the yellow curls that yet had the salt seawater in them. "I want you to tell me how you came to be in the water. Your captain says there must have been a mistake somewhere. I have heard his account, which is puzzling."

"I was my own fault—at first," said the cabin boy.

"So it seems. Captain Unwin expected that ■ was the last to leave the ship—he says that he could hardly see through the spray and foam who was in the boat, and who was not. Then, just as he was about to cut the rope he saw you on the deck ■ the hull, and called to you as loud as he could to look sharp, instead of which you cast the boat adrift, to the dismay of everybody in it. The captain thinks you must have known that they had not the smallest chance of getting near the wreck again to take you off."

The little lad looked pale, his lip quivered, a tear or two gathered on his eyelids.

"The captain said that?" Davy asked, "He said he shouted 'Leuk sharp?'"

"Yes, what did you think he shouted?"

"Ah thout he said, 'Let go the rope!'"

"And you let it go?"

"Ay, sir. Ah let it go."

There was a silence in the little cottage. The lad's simple, heroic obedience—obedience to a command which, as ■ heard it, must in its very horror and cruelty have struck him with a sudden bewilderment, was too great and grand a thing for spoken praise. A sob broke the silence. It was not Miss Bartholomew who was sobbing. Her face was white and tense, but there was a smile on it.

"What did you think when you saw the boat drifting away?" she asked of the cabin-boy.

"Ah didn't think nothin', miss."

"He's not to make reply,
His not to reason why,
His but to do and die."

quoted George Kirkoswald with a light in his grave eyes.

"And now tell me what you meant when you said it was your own fault?" asked Kirkoswald.

"I meant 'twas my odn fault for goin' doon below when they were gettin' ready to leave the ship."

"Then why did you go?"

"For the mate's pictur' He didn't tell me; but Ah knowed he'd miss it. 'Twas his wife's 'at's just dead a month sen."

"And you went below to get that?"

"Ay, and Ah got it, an' Ah kept it a bit after Ah was i' the water. But it got washed out o' my belt."

"How long did you stick to the wreck after the boat had drifted away?"

"A good bit—an hour mebbe. Then she began to go doon, starn foremost, an' Ah fastened myself to the life-buoy—the captain told me to stick to that buoy a long time before, when the masts went by the board.—Then Ah jumped off fra the bow, an' tried to swim to the boat, but t' sea were ower heavy."

That was all that Davy Drewe had to tell. George Kirkoswald knew the rest. He had called the attention of the coxswain to something floating on the water before they reached the little boat; and that something had proved to be the widow's one son, tossing there in the storm-swept sea, exhausted, half-frozen, yet fighting even then for the young life that was in him.

Davy's tale was hardly told, when a neighbour came with the startling news that a carriage with two horses was to be seen "in the street." No one there had ever seen a carriage in Soulagrif Bight—there was not a horse in the place, nor was there a road that any ordinary animal could be expected to climb.

"Since it is impossible the cab should come to you, I fear you must go to the cab," said Mr. Kirkoswald. Genevieve was putting on her cloak and hat, the women were helping her, thanking her. Davy Drewe was looking at her with childishly open admiration.

"Will you come an' see me again?" he asked, holding out his small frost-stiffened hand.

"Yes; I will indeed," she said. "We ought to be friends. This gentleman has saved two lives to-day, your life, and my life We must remember that, Davy."

"Were you goin' to be drowned?"

"Yes;" interposed George Kirkoswald, "Miss Bartholomew ran some risk of being drowned because of her anxiety to see that you were saved."

"You'll be thinkin' Ah'm a thankless woman, sir," said Ailsie Drewe, when Mr. Kirkoswald offered her his hand. "But it's noan thanklessness; it's nut knowin' what to say, nor how to say it. Ah feel as if Ah'd like to lay down my life for you, if so 'twere to be 'at you wanted it."

"Then that is certainly not thanklessness," said Mr. Kirkoswald. Genevieve did not hear what other reassuring words he said. There was more knocking at the cottage door, more people coming in. Surely that was Miss Craven's bonnet! And quite as surely that was Mr. Severne's low-crowned clerical hat immediately behind it!

"Oh, I say! We simply thought you were lost, Miss Bartholomew," said the curate, pressing forward. "We've come down in a cab, Miss Craven and I, the cab, there isn't another in the district; and somebody else had ordered it, but it was coming down here, and we insisted on coming with it. Oh, really! Is that little boy ill?"

Explanations followed, interspersed with introductions, inquiries, disapprobations. Miss Craven was very austere, very determined that her displeasure should not be made light of. She accepted Mr. Kirkoswald's politenesses as they were justly her due, having an instant suspicion that he might be in some way to blame.

So much attentiveness to a quite unimportant stranger would be very likely to arise out of a sense of culpability. Then, fortunately, it occurred to her that in the eyes of a man of Mr. Kirkoswald's learning, the Cravens of Hunsgarth Haggs might not, after all, be such very unimportant people. He would know something of their ancient standing, and he would comprehend that though a family might come to be represented for all practical purposes by one unmarried woman, that family was still entitled in her person to such respect as would have been paid to it under more fortunate vicissitudes. This made matters plainer, Miss Craven's mood lighter, and the homeward journey certainly easier in consequence.

The darkness came down suddenly; the lamps were lighted in the streets at Thirkeld Abbas. Mr. Kirkoswald, who had been riding on before the cab, stopped at the Richmond Arms until Miss Craven came up ■ ask whether he might not send his man over to take the trap up the snow-covered roads to Hunagarth Higgs in the morning. Miss Craven yielded to this, but not too readily. Some transferring of parcels took place, Mr. Severne shook hands with everybody, and went away, smiling, blushing in the dim lamplight. Something had delighted him, some other thing had perplexed him, but he was not very clear about his sensations as he went homeward. Mr. Kirkoswald was riding forward again, and he did not stop till he reached the stile by the cottage at Netherbank. He dismounted there.

"I may call to-morrow to inquire how you are?" he asked, walking by Genevieve's side along the frozen field path. The wind was still boisterous; a few silver stars shone keenly out between the clouds. There were lights in the window of the little cottage.

"Thank you," said Genevieve, with unhesitating grace. "I shall be glad to see you, and my father will be glad to have an opportunity of thanking you. . . . You will not give him the opportunity now?"

"I am afraid I may not, thank you. I must go up with Miss Craven as the roads are so bad."

He waited a moment by the foot of the tiny flight of steps. Keturah opened the door with an exclamation. "Good night," said Genevieve gravely, standing a moment in the glow of the light that came from the kitchen fire. "Good night. . . . There are so many other things that ought to be said that I am unable to say any of them."

"I am glad you have not tried to say them," answered George Kirkoswald, with a deep intentness in his tone. "There are things that are much more permanently contenting to me unsaid."

CHAPTER XVIII.—JULIET OR ELAINE?

"Love at first sight is the sweetest love, and for this reason—that it does not depend upon any one merit or quality, but embraces in its view the whole being. 'Tis in this love which is likely to last—uncomprehensible, indefinable, reasonable about."

See ARTHUR HILLY

GENEVIEVE had spoken quite truly when she told Miss Richmond that she was not lonely. She had an active brain and active fingers. The tiny house needed careful and constant mindfulness, the study offered occupation; Keturah required a considerable supervision. Then, too, she had her piano, her embroidery, there were letters to be written, books to be read; for sympathy and society she had her father; for the solitary hours which she had always enjoyed there was the moor, the reedy marsh, or the wide sea-shore. "I wanted nothing," the girl said to herself, "and yet it seems as if I had wanted all."

It was but natural that a day so eventful as that stormy day in Soulgrief Bight should cause a great reversal and upheaval in the existing order of things, especially since that order had, undeniably, been of a simple and settled kind. It was almost inevitable that thought should linger on such a day, that thought should turn to reverse, and muse upon it, that musing should grow creative, and build upon it.

Juliet's musings on the balcony took form, and kindled into a guileless yet forceful confession of love, though not a hundred words of Romeo's had fallen upon her ear.

"Romeo, tell thy name,
And for thy name which is no part of thee,
I'll do all myself!"

Elaine spoke less, and less passionately in her first sudden love for Lancelot, but—

"All night long his face before her lay;

Dark, splendid, speaking in the silence, full
Of subtle things, and held her from his sleep."

Genevieve's love resembled both these, and it differed from both. It resembled them in suddenness, in completeness, it differed from Juliet's in respect of impatience, from Elaine's in respect of simple and beautiful self-abandonment.

Her nature was too rare, too fine and strong, to die for need of another nature; but by reason of these very qualities her need of love once awakened would become the one passionate need of her life.

Her need of love? It had never existed till now; and now it was one with her need of an atmosphere for her soul to breathe in.

All day there was with her in the room a new light, a new strength, a new reason for living life at its very best.

It was a sunny day, clear and keen, and calm with the strange calmness that only comes after a wild sea-storm. The snow was still lying white upon the great sloping upland, under the clumps of dark fir-trees, over all the wide, low-lying land that stretched between the rugged slope and the sea.

Everything was still, so still that a footfall on the frozen field made echo enough in the little house to stir the pulse to quicker movement. Genevieve was ashamed for her blush, when the door opened and Mr. Kirkoswald came in, afraid lest her heart's secret should blaze itself in the heart's colours on her face. How tall and strong he looked in that little room! He seemed to fill it with his impressiveness, with the finely careless dignity that ■ had when he moved and spoke.

"I see that it is a mere matter of courtesy to ask you how you are," he said, looking into her face with a grave and kind intentness. "Are you really no worse for all that you went through yesterday?"

"Thank you, no—not any worse," Genevieve replied. "I should like to have gone down to Soulgriff Right again to-day if I might. I wish so much to know how Davy Drew is, and the others."

"They are all right—that is, as right as one could expect," replied Mr. Kirkoswald with compassion in his tone. "Poor Verrill couldn't have his broken arm set till this morning. He looks the worst of them all, but Dr. Sexton says he'll come round in time. Davy Drew was sitting on a stool by the fire, whistling 'Sweet Dublin Bay,' and catting a model of the hull of the Viking."

"... But there! that is stupid of me! I was not ■ mention the model."

"I see!" said Genevieve, smiling. ■ was a dreamy, lingering smile that played about her beautiful mouth. Was she recognising the human promptings by which this new found friend was led? A little silence followed, it was as if her beauty were weaving a spell that a man might hardly dare to break unadvisedly.

Was it only her beauty? George Kirkoswald asked of himself as he sat there. Was it only that she made a picture as she sat before him with her faultless face, her crown of soft, shining, yellow hair, her deep, violet grey eyes? She had on a dress of warm white serge, there was some lace round her throat, and a string or two of coral beads. No detail that went to the making of the whole escaped him, but ■ knew that for him the spell was in none of these. The face itself, lovely as it was, did but seem the human expression of some lovelier spiritual ideal.

Suddenly Genevieve recollected herself, and a burning blush of self-accusation spread over her face and throat.

"Shall I tell my father that you are here?" she asked, "or will you go down to the studio?"

"Which would ■ prefer?"

"I don't know, I don't think ■ would care much, but I should like you to go down to the studio, if you will. I have been thinking," the girl said, speaking with her usual unconventional honesty, "I have been thinking that I should like to show you some of his work."

"And I have been wishing much that I might be permitted to see it," replied Mr. Kirkoswald, also speaking honestly.

They went out together, down through the leafless orchard. The twisted trunks of the apple trees were throwing long blue shadows across the snow, the old moss green well was sprinkled with diamonds, the hedges were bright with scarlet rose hips, a robin was swaying lightly up and down on a purple briar spray. Far away beyond the snow covered pasture lands you could see the dark blue grey sweep of heaving waters.

CHAPTER XIX.—ART AND LIFE

"The world is too rich with us late and soon
Is it not sad to see us lay waste our power?
I like to see in Nature that is ours
We have given our hearts away, a word is ours!
This sea that bears her bosom to the moon
The world is not all that we are at all hours
A call up, it is now I do sleep and grow
For then, for everything we are out of tune!"

WORDSWORTH

THE door of the studio was open. Noel Bartholomew had heard voices, and he stood there quietly eager to welcome the man who had saved his daughter's life. He looked wan and tired, and it seemed to Genevieve that his scant and ill-arranged grey hair was even greyer than she had believed it to be. He was, as usual, very grave and very calm.

His first words were of course words of gratitude. They were not many, and they were quietly said, but his emotion was apparent, even to the point of giving pain. This was only for a moment, however.

"It is an ill wind that blows nobody good," he said, recovering himself. "And I must not forget that I owe to yesterday's peril the pleasure of seeing you here to-day."

"I should, of course, have given myself the pleasure of coming sooner or later," said Kirkoswald. "I hope I don't interrupt your work by coming this afternoon?"

"On the contrary, you are doing it a service, by preventing my working with a tired eye and a still more tired brain."

"I suppose most artists are tempted to do that?"

"I believe so, and I believe that the greater the unfitness for work the stronger the fascination of it, that is, of continuing it. ■ is so at least with me. ■ is easier to put my palette down in the middle of a successful morning's work than ■ the end of a doubtful day."

"That I think I can understand," said Kirkoswald, who seemed to Genevieve to be listening with an interest that was as real as it was deferential. After a moment's pause he added, "I have often wished, when I have found myself standing before a picture that I have really cared for, that I might know something of the history of its creation."

"In many cases, perhaps in seven out of ten, the true history would disappoint you. Is not Browning's 'Andrea del Sarto' a revelation?"

"It is," said Kirkoswald, "a sad one. But the pictures of Lucrezia's face reveal things to me that are sadder far. Take Browning's poem, del Sarto's pictures, his wife's portrait, and you have as painful a soul's tragedy as you need want."

The walls of the studio were still decorated with unfinished paintings, with careless sketches, with masterly studies. On the easel there was a full-length figure. It was, as George Kirkoswald saw for himself, a beautiful-browed Anone. The Judas had been put away out of sight, untouched since the day it had excited discussion.

Noel Bartholomew was somewhat surprised by the insight and pertinence of his visitor's remarks.

"You paint yourself?" he asked, as they sat by the studio fire, in the midst of the glow of fine colour, of artistic ornament and suggestion that was everywhere in the place.

"No, on the contrary, I can't draw a straight line," was the reply. "But I have long been attracted towards art—half against my will in the first instance. I have been told that Byron had a great contempt for painting. I had no contempt, but a consummate indifference. A painted canvas seemed me such an unreal thing. I know now that it was my own incapacity for recognising the real, that is to say, the spiritual, the true real, when I saw it; my own inability to perceive the right connection between human life and human art."

"Then you are now altogether on the side of the artists?" said Genevieve. She was sitting opposite to George Kirkoswald, and her eyes met his. He saw that there was an intenser meaning in her question than it might seem to have.

He paused a moment before replying.

"Would you mind explaining to me more exactly what you mean?" he asked.

"First let me explain," interposed Mr. Bartholomew, with a quietly humorous smile that was more visible in his eyes than about his mouth. "My daughter has the misfortune to have inherited strongly Puritan tendencies, tendencies that have skipped over one generation if not two, and are now displaying themselves all the more strongly for the lapse. . . . Proceed, my dear; inform Mr. Kirkoswald that deep in your heart of hearts you believe all painting, all sculpture, all secular poetry and music to be so many snares of the Evil One."

There was a distinct silence. Genevieve's face was turned a little toward the fire, as if she were looking into it for some thought or word that she wanted.

"I am sure that your father has stated the case from the extremest point he could find ■ stand upon," said Mr. Kirkoswald, speaking in a tone that betrayed both his interest and his appreciation of the difficulty.

"So he has," said the girl, turning a grave uplifted face toward him. "But I will not say that he has gone beyond the truth. I dare not say it, lest my words should come back upon me."

There was no smile now on the face of either listener; one face had a touch of surprise.

"Perhaps, if I may venture to say so, you are suspending your judgment at present?" Kirkoswald said.

"It has been in a state of suspense ever since I began to think at all, and I see no prospect of any conclusion to the matter. Lately, I have let it rest."

"Or, rather it has let you rest," said her father.

"Exactly. Coming to Mark-Maria's was the hoisting of a flag of truce."

"Which I suppose you do not consider equivalent to a declaration of peace?" inquired Kirkoswald.

"No, I do not," said Genevieve. Then she added more gravely, "I think that peace for me would mean the death of one of my two natures—the artistic, or what my father terms the Puritan. So far as I can tell, they are both very much alive; though at present they have no reason for clashing."

"Then you have the misfortune to represent in your own person the two opposing parties?"

"Yes, I suppose so. I am very conscious of being torn two ways," said Genevieve.

"On the one hand by a love ■ beauty, on the other by a fear that your desire for things beautiful ■ not, from the highest standpoint of all, a legitimate desire?"

"Precisely," said Genevieve, looking up with some gratitude, some wonder ■ her eyes. "It is precisely that. I want what I think the whole civilised world ■ wanting, A RECONCILER !”

“To reconcile what, speaking exactly?” asked her father.

“The Sermon on the Mount and the interior of a modern artistically furnished house,” said the girl, speaking as if she spoke of a thing long considered.

“The command to take no thought for your life, with the strong, pure seeming instinct for graceful, refined, and beautiful surroundings?” said George Kirkoswald. Then he added, “Does ■ seem to you that no such reconciliation is possible?”

“On the contrary, I feel that it must be possible,” declared Genevieve with enthusiasm.

“But I cannot see it, I cannot find it. One day I honour most the men who can set their foot upon the neck of pride, the pride of the eye, the pride of life—who can live out their days surrounded by four bare walls, and never know that they are bare. Another day, and my whole soul is stirred by some good, some glory that I discern through some triumph of human art—art that has drawn its inspiration from Nature, and so, avowedly, can lead one from Nature up to Nature’s God.”

“How the world ■ made for each of us !” said Kirkoswald musingly, hardly recognising his utterance as a quotation.

“You think that?” said Bartholomew, adding reverently, “It has always seemed to me that Christ’s own different way of dealing with each differently-constituted and differently-circumstanced individual that came to Him, was certainly sufficient warrant for supposing that He had no desire to reduce humanity ■ one dead level of thought and opinion.”

“One may be sure He never meant that,” said Kirkoswald, “and it seems ■ me, also, a sure thing that He never meant to crush out any human feeling for whatsoever things are lovely, or pure, or beautiful, or true.”

“So far I am one with you,” interposed Genevieve. “He who said, ‘Consider the lilies,’ and declared that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed as they were, could never have desisted that any human being should pass through the world with eyes closed to its marvellous loveliness. But we were not speaking of natural beauty.”

“No; we were not,” said Kirkoswald, appreciating the effort to keep him ■ his argument. “But to reply to what you said just now, how many people have passed through the world with eyes closed to every glory of sunrise and sunset, who have never been awakened to one tender thrill by the rustle of green leaves, the ripple of a brook, or the sparkle of sunlight on a summer sea ! How many have gone down to their graves careworn, toil-stained, crushed out of life by the burden and heat of the day, who have never once in their whole long life felt the sweet influence of “The silence that is in the starry sky,

The sleep that is among the lonely hills !”

If Art had no other mission but ■ minister to the needs of such as these, ■ would still have a most glorious and decided right of being.”

“And you think ■ has even a wider mission than that?” asked Genevieve.

“I do, undoubtedly; a mission ■ wide as that of science itself,” said Kirkoswald. Then his lips parted with the shadow of a smile. “But I am not going to touch upon science,” he continued, “you would not let me, I know. You think I was going to reason illogically. But just let me say that it seems to me that science, instead of destroying the Christian’s idea of God, will one day unfold Him to human eyes in aspects so grand, with attributes so stupendous, with powers and designs so inconceivable ■ us at present, that humanity will be tempted to look back upon the days of pre-scientific darkness as pityingly as we sometimes look back over the days of mingled doubt and anticipation that preceded the coming of Christ.”

“So great you believe to be the ends of science?” asked Bartholomew.

“Yes, and equally great I believe the ends of art to be. Therefore it is that I look upon a true artist as upon a true steward of the mysteries of God. He ■ not more nor less than an interpreter—a revealer to common eyes of nature, the ‘time-vesture,’ woven that man may have some ever-visible token of the nearness of his God.”

“You are listening, my daughter?”

“Yes, I am listening very willingly,” said Genevieve, “and also gratefully.”

“Oh, please don’t be grateful !” entreated George Kirkoswald. “I hat sounds as if I had made no impression at all. I should like to make an impression, if ■ were but a slight one, so that you may be the better prepared ■ listen ■ the Reconciler when he comes.”

“Don’t make light of it, please.”

“Certainly I will not. And, indeed, you are right, it is not a light matter in these days. Every one who can think at all is taking it more or less seriously, and, so far as I can discern, there is a general tendency to what one may term ‘coming round,’ on the part of those who might seem to be the natural opponents of art. I heard one clergyman confessing ■ another the other day that he had never seen the real glory and loveliness of a sunset sky until he had seen a few scoops of painted sunsets."

"That bears out what Browning says. What is the passage, Genevieve?"

"You mean the one in 'Fra Lippo Lippi'?"

"For, don't you mark? we're made so that we love
First when we see them paint it, things we have passed
Perhaps a hundred times nor mind to see,
And as they are but painted, rather to see,
Which is the same thing. Art was given for that,
God uses us to help each other so,
Lending our minds out."

"If I remember the context rightly, the poet includes more than landscape-painting," said Bartholomew, who appeared to be very content to elicit another's views, keeping back his own, if indeed he had any that he could have presented on the spur of the moment, which is doubtful.

"Yes," said Genevieve, "he includes nature animate as well as inanimate. He puts the question —

"In you feel it in the eye or no,
For this tall town a face, gooder than's her,
It's more into a round it and the day about
Much more the figure of an, woman, child,
Just as the figure is?"

"Of course, all that can be said for the painting of nature applies in a much higher and stronger measure to the painting of humanity, or so it seems to me," said Kirkoswald. "The character, the history, that lies so pathetically written in the lines of a human countenance may surely be as beautiful a thing, and as full of meaning, as the truth that lies in the scars of a rugged cliff-side. It is by the study of art that one learns to see 'what beauty there ■ in the dark eyes that are sunk with weeping, and in the paleness of those fixed faces which the world's adversity has compassed about, till they shine in their patience like dying watch-fires through tw light.' I may be wrong, but it certainly appears to me that there is a greater sympathy abroad for all manner of suffering; and I attribute the growth largely to the greater spread of art and poetry, under the head of poetry including the prose poems of such men as Dickens, such women as Mrs. Gaskell. . . . But, there! again I shall have to be brought back to the subject."

"No, I won't bring you back any more today," Genevieve said. "I have a feeling that I did not state my own case effectively in the beginning."

"Therefore my victory has been an easy one."

"You are feeling victorious?"

"On the whole, yes. But ■ modifies the feeling to be told that you did not bring your full strength against me. Will you do your worst next time?"

"I will do my best," said Genevieve.

"And may I be there to see?" said her father, restraining the smile that played about his face, lighting up its sadness with an almost pathetic light.

CHAP. XX. THE MISTRESS OF YARRELL CROFT.

"Lightly, her soul allow'd, one slept away,
And while she made her ready for her ride,
Her father's latest word humm'd in her ear,
"Being so very wifely you must go,"
And she rang'd itself and echo'd in her heart,
"Being so very wifely you must do."
Tennyson

THE thaw that followed that heavy snow was a very prolonged affair: some time had to pass before the Bartholomews could return the calls of some of their more distant neighbours. It was not an unhappy time—it was too full of life and work to be unhappy. Whenever there was light enough Noel Bartholomew wrought at his beautiful Ænone, or, if Mr. Severne came, he worked a little at the Sir Galahad. When the light failed he would read, or draw in black and white, or sit and dream. Sometimes he would read aloud to Genevieve whilst she sat at her embroidery; sometimes in the firelight they would sit and talk. Genevieve always thought this the best time of all, there was so much confidence, so little strain; there was no more dread of silence than of mistaken speech.

One dull grey afternoon they sat together as usual: there was a cheery fire, and Genevieve's canary seemed to be singing to the leaping flame. Mr. Kirkoswald had called during the day, merely, ■ said, to beg that they would not think of going up to Usselby until the roads were better. He had stayed in the studio awhile, then he had lingered again in the dainty sitting-room; and Genevieve had found that his lingering there was very sweet—perilously sweet. When he went out, a little cry, half of gladness, half of a new and unknown pain, went after him, ■ cry that came echoing back a moment later with the force of an openly-uttered reproach.

Genevieve was thinking of ■ ■ she sat silently there by her father's side in the twilight. When she spoke ■ was aware of the slight effort in her voice.

"What age should you say Mr. Kirkoswald is, father?" she asked, somewhat abruptly.

"I was thinking of his age this morning,"

BETWEEN HEATHER AND SEA

answered Mr Bartholomew. "He will be thirty-five, or thereabouts."

"Not more than that?"

"No, he can't be more than that. . . . What age should you have supposed him to be?"

"Fifty! . . . What is it that makes him look so old?"

"He does look old for his years, I admit, and there is a history in his face. But I should say it was the history of some more or less intellectual strife, rather than of any ordinary life experience. Whatever it is it has taken the years. Still it is a grand face and a grand head!"

"You are thinking of painting it?" said Genevieve, rather in the tone of a protest. A minute later she was conscious of a strong desire to see it painted.

"No, on the contrary, I decided this morning that his face was one that I should never attempt," replied Mr Bartholomew. "I could but fail. It is too full of the perplexity of life, and his eyes have too much of the luminousness of thought in them. Altogether there is a good deal in him that could never be made visible on canvas. I should try to make it visible, it would elude me, and I should be left with the consciousness of having spent my strength for nought."

There was another brief pause, then another question came with effort —

"You like him, father?"

"Yes, I like him."

"You don't say that heartily?"

"Don't I? Shall I say it again, and put more heart into it?"

"There! that is satire. We will not speak of Mr Kirkowald again to-day."

Another afternoon—a pale yellow afternoon—the cab came from Inverkeid Abbas to take Noel Bartholomew and his daughter to Yarell Croft. It was a large, massively-built, grey stone house, standing half-way down the slope where the upland curved to the west. The roads about it were well kept, the leafless trees were tall and stately, and they were so grouped as to look picturesque even in their leaflessness. In front of the house there was a portico with pillars, and a double flight of broad stone steps.

Miss Richmond was in the drawing room. She was alone when they went in, sitting there, gracious and graceful, in a dress of ruby velvet. She was like a picture in its proper setting now. The yellow light outside seemed to give value to the rich furniture, the glowing draperies, the blue and crimson and gold of the painted and diapered ceiling. Genevieve could not help wondering what Miss Richmond had been doing, and of what she had been thinking as she sat there in the midst of so much magnificence. There was no sign of any book or work. The grand piano was closed. The luxurious looking cushions, strewn about so profusely, seemed to be the only things in actual use.

Mrs Richmond was very quiet, very impressive, perhaps even more impressive than usual. Cecil, coming into the room, seemed as if he hardly understood his sister's mood. He watched her furtively for a time, then he ceased to watch, or to try to understand, but he went on wishing that she would be more cordial to Miss Bartholomew. Genevieve had not missed any cordiality. She tried to be responsive to Cecil's attentions, but they became a little pronounced, a little embarrassing, and he seemed to take any sign of embarrassment rather as a compliment. It did not trouble Genevieve much. She was listening to Miss Richmond, wondering about her life. Something seemed to be weighing upon her, some great loneliness or weariness, some strong desire. She was speaking of wasted lives, of unseen sorrows, unsuspected despair, of life long misunderstandings. Mr Bartholomew was listening, replying when reply was called for, but he felt at a loss to know whether Miss Richmond's remarks were quite of the general nature they appeared on the surface of them to be. It was odd how, now and then, the man's keen perceptive powers failed him.

Genevieve knew less of Miss Richmond than her father did, but she saw more than he did to-day. To her there was nothing impersonal about Diana Richmond's words, except the grammatical mood of them.

Once the girl thought that, if they had been alone, she would have knelt down beside Miss Richmond, and clasped her hand, and prayed her to speak of the thing, whatever it was, that was lying underneath the stilled, oppressive graciousness of her ways. Her words were said slowly, quietly, emphatically, but they had the effect of a wild cry of confession upon the girl, whose own emotions were just then being wrought upon more than she herself knew.

"The strange thing is," Miss Richmond was saying, "that people don't get over things, they don't forget as the preachers of consolation tell you they do. 'Time heals all sorrows,' they tell you, but it is a platitude, and not a true one. Sometimes people deceive themselves, they think they have forgotten, and then something brings all back again, and it is worse than before."

"I suppose it is so, very often," said Mr. Bartholomew, sadly. He was thinking of his own sorrow just then—he could not help it—wondering if he could ever deceive himself into thinking that he had forgotten.

Miss Richmond was continuing —

"I had a friend," she said, "it was years ago; we were children together. When she was engaged to be married I felt it like a blow, as if she had died, and I went into deep mourning. But the engagement was soon broken off. The man was a flirt, and as cruel and heartless as a man could be. Nothing would move him. She was years before she got over it. All the best of her life went in anguish. But she did seem to get over it at last. Then—only a year or two ago—the man came back—he had been abroad for years, and with him came all my friend's sorrow. It had all to be lived and endured over again. She is enduring yet. You might think it would kill her, but it will not. She is very strong. She will live and suffer for a lifetime yet. And the man does not care. They often meet. He must see it all, but he cares nothing—nothing for the life long martyrdom that he has brought about."

Suddenly—while Miss Richmond was speaking—there flashed across Noel Bartholomew's brain the remembrance of the conversation that had passed between himself and Miss Craven on the first night of his arrival at Hunsarth Hags. He glanced towards Genevieve, but she did not understand the glance. How should she? Miss Craven and her father had spoken of a dozen people, all of whom were only names to her. How should she remember that George Kirkoswald's name and Miss Richmond's had been mentioned together? And if she had remembered, how should she have suspected—as her father did—that Miss Richmond's friend and Miss Richmond's self were one and the same, with historical variations?

"And after all it is only a suspicion," he said to himself during the long drive homeward from Yarell Croft—it was very long and very silent, and the silence was less comprehensible than the silences between the father and daughter usually were.

Two days later the thick yellow sky changed to a clear, vivid, frosty blue. Noel Bartholomew was divided in his mind as to how he should make the most of such a day. Finally the expression on his daughter's face decided him. He would leave his mournful Æneone, and go down to Soulagrif Bight to sketch a wreck washed ashore during the last night of the storm, the night after the day on which George Kirkoswald had spent his strength and risked his life to save the lives of others.

It was not only Kirkoswald's chivalrous courage that was moving Bartholomew to have faith in him. Doubt thrust itself in, echoes of Dorothy Craven's words came back, remembrances of Miss Richmond's emotion, but Noel Bartholomew was not a man to be unduly influenced by such evidences as these against his own better judgment. "There has been nothing in Kirkoswald's life that he could not explain, if explanation were needed," he said to himself in the dead of the night, when he lay awake, thinking of his daughter's future as he had never thought of it before, and realising his own carelessness about it.

The carelessness was incomprehensible now that its probable consequences were becoming visible in the distance. If life were spared to him, with power to work, he might atone in a measure, but the "if" was an important one, and he perceived it now. He could only hope that knowledge had not come too late.

He could not shut his eyes to the other possibility, the possibility that his daughter might marry. It was distant enough—he hoped that it might long remain distant; but he recognised the fact that since his child had no mother, it would be well for him to try to excise a mother's foresight. He would spare her pain if she might be spared by any watchfulness of his.

A moment of mingled sadness and perplexity came to him when he saw the sudden light on her face as he spoke of going down to the Bight. But the sadness did not stay with him. He looked fairly in the face. "What is it I am dreading?" he asked of himself, and he knew that there was nothing to which he could put a name. He took no account of the fact that the nameless fears, the nameless sorrows of life, are often a large and heavy part of life's ill.

No such shadow came over Genevieve. Even in the solitude of her own little room under the thatched eaves she blushed for her own half uttered hope. "He will be there—I know he will be there!" she said, arranging her yellow hair under a wide-brimmed, purple velvet hat. She was not vain—she had never been vain—but she was too simple-minded not to be glad for once in her life that another should find her fair enough to pleasant to look upon. If was a gladness she had never really known till now, and she could not have told how she had come to know it. All within her that concerned this new found friend was unquestioned, and unquestionable.

Friend! That was quite the right word, and she used it to herself always, saying softly, "I shall know now what human friendship means. At last I shall know."

Her cheek had not forgotten its blush, nor her lip its happy smile, when she perceived that her prophecy was fulfilled.

Soulsgrif Bight was all alive that morning—almost as much alive as it had been on the day of the storm. The stranded ship had broken up during the last tide or two. Groups of figures were hurrying about, men with gay coloured sou'westers and dark blue guernseys, women with red shawls, children with bright pinafores, some were bringing firewood from the wrecks that lay on the dark beach, others brought ropes and iron. A man was coming up with a clock that he had found amongst the wreckage, both its hands were gone, and the dial-plate was cracked across. Some children were making merry over a bird-cage which had been found among the tangled weeds, with a little dead bird at the bottom of it.

People were straying all about the sands. Some were sauntering away toward the reef, others were coming back. On the edge of the quay there was a gentleman standing, a tall, strong man, with dark hair, a loose grey coat, and an impressive manner of wearing it. He was talking to the auctioneer, who had come down from Thurkell Abbas to sell one of the wrecks. Suddenly he turned his head, not knowing why he turned it, and the colour that rose slowly to his clear, dark-toned face was plain there for any one to see. He came forward rather hurriedly, but as if he tried to repress something as he came. The light in his eyes as he shook hands with Genevieve was at least as glad as the light in her own.

"Do you know that I have been hoping—I may say expecting—that you would come?" he said. "Indeed, more or less, I believe that I always expect you to be in Soulsgrif Bight when I come down."

"Do you expect to see me standing on that rock in a storm?" she asked, the smile dying away from her lips as she spoke and a grave look coming into her eyes. "I sometimes wonder how I can ever forget that moment!"

"I think I don't forget it," George Kurk-wald replied, speaking intently, but as if he spoke to himself. Mr. Bartholomew was walking forgetfully away with Ishmael Crudas toward a group of people who were gathering round the wreck that was about to be sold by auction.

There was a little silence. Mr. Kurkswald and Genevieve were standing on "the staith," as the people termed the wooden quay. The sun was shining, in a pale, wintry fashion, over the blue sea that was only just stirred by a light breeze, the wavelets broke far out over the purple-brown reef that was all broken into long lines by the strips of standing water that reflected the pale blue of the sky. Russet red anchors were lying half embedded in the sands, a strong sail lay riven into strips of canvas a few inches wide, a tall mast was there, with broken yards clinging to it, half buried underneath there was a ship's lantern and a tea kettle, a little farther on there was a curving piece of the back of a violin standing out of the sand.

"You will not care to go down to the sale?" said Mr. Kurkswald. Turning to look at Genevieve as he spoke he saw that her eyes were filled with tears. "You had better come and see Davy Drewe," he added with gentleness, moving to go as he spoke. "Davy has been wanting to see you for days past, and I am beginning to have a notion that he holds me responsible for your non-appearance. . . . Would you like to go and see him now?"

"Yes," said Genevieve, "I should like it very much. But will you tell my father? He may want me if he is going to sketch."

"I will tell him while you talk to Davy. I should like you to stay there a while, in the cottage, if you will. You are not used to scenes like this."

It was all quite natural—this care, this protection, this deep understanding kindness. It was as natural as if it had always been, and yet it had the tremulous surprise, the quick, quiet, palpitating gladness of a new and unhopd-for joy.

There were only Aimee Drewe and her little lad in the cottage on the hill-side. Aimee was knitting, and she might not stay her hand, she earned much in her living that way, knitting strong blue guernseys for the fishermen of the Bight.

"Eh, bless you, then, is 't you?" she had said in her own rude, glad way as she opened the door. "Come yer ways in, an' sit doon, both o' ya. Ah said when miss came she'd be comin' w' you, Ah said so. Davy.

An' Ah said if Ah'd been better off for menseful¹ granthin', Ah'd ha' meade bold to ha' asked you both tiv a cup o' tea." Then the woman stopped, too dignified to lay bare the worst, and too cheerful for any ordinary listener to suspect it.

George went out presently, and Davy went up stairs, coming down again with a tiny model of a ship, which he would have lacked courage ■ offer but for his mother's presence there. It was not very daintily finished, but it was beautiful by reason of its exquisite proportions.

"He's done it all himself, miss, an' he thowt 'at ya'd like to hev it, as ■ 'ud sort o' remind ya o' that day, an' o' your life an' his bein' saved togethor like. An' eh, but you gentleman is a brave man! an' a strong un, too. They say he pulled i' the boat as if he'd niver done nowt but handle an oar since he was born. Ah reckon ya'd know him afore yer came ■ this neighbourhood, mrs?"

"No, I did not know him before," said Genevieve. "I did not know him until that day."

"Ya don't say so? Then, mabbe, 'tisn't as Ah thowt," said Aisie, looking into Genevieve's face, as if she feared that she had made a mistake. "Ya mun excuse me, mrs, if Ah said ow't 'at Ah sudn't ha' said. But there weren't no harm anyways in me praisin' him. Ah didn't know him mysel' till they said his name were Kirkoswald, but Ah'd seen him when he was a liddle lad, Ah'd seen him up at Usselby . . . Ya'll ha' been there, mrs?"

"No," said Genevieve, again feeling that the admission would be considered an unwilling one—"no, we have not been to Usselby yet . . . Do you know it well?"

"Noa, Ah don't know it nut to say well, but 'tisn't much of a place, nut like Yarell Croft, nor nothing o' that sort. Years ago 'twas a kin o' rackledoon oad spot, an' Ah niver heerd 'at ow't had been done to it. I' oad man was sa queer, ya know. He warn't nowt ov a gentlem'n, nut like this. He'd a sight o' money, so they said, but he were as greedy as sin, i' sarvants used to tell on him goin' doon into t' kitchen, an' cuttin' a tallow candle into three, an' givin' owther on 'em a bit yance i' week. An' they warn't alloo'd noa supper. He turned every sarvant there was off i' spot one winter, acause they'd roasted some 'tates unbeknown tiv him."

"But had he no wife?" asked Genevieve, who could hardly in any way connect George Kirkoswald with such a home life as this.

"Noa, honey," said Aisie Drewe, slipping into the word of endearment unawares, as homely Yorkshire folk will do, when their hearts are won. "Noa, honey. His wife died when this gentleman was born; that mabbe was how t' oad man came to ■ sa despart strange. An' he was strange! Ah remember once when Ah was nobbut a liddle lass goin' about wi' t' Kesseninas wants to sing, an' we went trampin' all t' way up ■ Usselby i' t' snow an' darkness, an' what did t' oad t'istit do but throw up his winder, an' fire a gun right in among us afore we'd fairly gettin' started wi' 'God rest you, merry gentlemen'!"

"Oh, imagine it! Was any one hurt?" Genevieve asked in amazement.

"Noa, honey, so it happened. We ran off, despart frightened, an' we niver went there no more. I' oad chap died, an' t' son were sent away to school, an' it's but liddle we've heerd on him doon here till t'other daay. I nope we'll be seen' and hear'n' more on him noo. Davy was sitting still, waiting, looking wistful, but when his turn came he had very little to say, he could only smile and change colour and push his yellow curls nervously away from his forehead when Miss Bartholomew spoke to him. He was going to sea again, he said, after Christmas. The owners of the Flying had another ship almost ready to sail. "Jh, me!" said his poor mother, "he'll be like his father. KNOWERY The Saint & True, ed.

NORY BARTHOLOMEW spent a couple of hours over his sketch of the wreck of the Waldemar. His daughter sat near him awhile, but it was too cold for her ■ remain sitting there in the December breeze. Perhaps too she was in a less quiescent mood than usual. She went back again to the little hamlet after a time, asking George Kirkoswald to remain there by her father, who always liked to have a companion near him when he was sketching out of doors. She wanted to go in and out among the fisher-folk quite alone.

"They will talk to one person as they cannot talk to two or three," she said, speaking to Mr. Kirkoswald, who was accompanying her to the edge of the reef. "If I had a trouble I could never tell ■ to more than one person."

"Do you think you could tell it to me?" asked George Kirkoswald, speaking with a sudden effort.

Genevieve hesitated a moment, her head drooped a little, her colour came and went, but she spoke honestly, and without affectation.

"Yes; I think I could," she said in a low, penetrating voice. She knew that she made a great concession. George Kirkoswald knew that ■ was not made lightly.

Was it fortunate that they were parting just as the word was said? Genevieve was saved from further embarrassment. Kirkoswald, with a glance that might mean mere gratitude, went back to where the white easel gleamed upon the dark reef. Genevieve went forward to the village in the rocks, happier than when she left it a little while before.

* * * * *

An hour later they went up Soulegrif Bank together, Genevieve, her father, and George Kirkoswald. The two men were talking over certain suggestions that had arisen out of the day's events; Genevieve was silent, and her face told of a certain amount of sadness.

"You have not been accustomed to what clergymen's wives turn 'parish work,'" said George Kirkoswald, passing round to her side.

"Then the result of what you believe to be my first attempt ■ visible?"

"Not the result, but the effect upon yourself. . . . It ■ very saddening, I admit; even in a place like this, to feel your way light into the lives of the very poor."

"I thought I knew," said Genevieve. "I thought I understood it all better. I have read about it, and thought about it, but one has to see, to meet ■ face to face, to know how deep ■ goes, how entirely suffering and endurance ■ their life; how ■ enters into everything, the food they eat, the clothes they wear, the beds they lie on, and the fires they burn. And what strikes one is the quietness one finds everywhere, the extreme patience. I have been talking to an old woman over seventy years of age, who has never once in her whole long life known what it was to be sure of the means of existence for a week beforehand. And that woman's temper is as sweet, her faith as whole, as if she had never known an ungratified desire."

"That I can well believe," said Kirkoswald. "One fancies sometimes that such people must see farther than they seem ■ see; that they must feel unconsciously something of the influence of the wider laws of the world's onward movement, laws that compel them to take their part in the great human sacrifice that is always being offered up for the wheels of progress to pass over."

"Do you think they dream of that?" asked Genevieve. "Ah, it is such a hard thing to remember, to realise! And yet I believe, as James Hinton believed, that we are all of us helping, all of us who suffer, ■ work out the redemption of the race. It ■ beautiful, it is sad, ■ is infinitely great."

"Yes it is great; but, as you say, the idea has an element of sadness in it. Now and then one meets sad, aged, tired eyes fixed on one's face full of things altogether unutterable. They are the eyes of people who have lived through want, and wrong, and contempt, and pain, and lifelong neglect; but it is as if they said, 'And yet we have not lived vainly.' Vainly?—no, it is not such lives as theirs that are lived in vain."

"The great problem of how best to help the suffering poor," said Bartholomew, "is always more or less a painful one, unless you happen to be able to offer substantial help yourself in the cases that actually come under your own notice."

"That is true," said Kirkoswald. "But I fear that a great deal more than mere giving must go to the solving of the problem."

"It seems to me that there is almost in finite good to be done without any giving ■ all," interposed Genevieve warmly. "That is the one thing that struck me most of all to-day, the gratitude of the people for a word, a mere look of sympathy. I hey don't say they are grateful, but you feel ■ in their very accent, in their reluctance to let you turn away, in their wishful hoping that you will come again. Oh, if I could, I would ■ down there and live amongst them, live as they live, work as they work, endure what they endure, then I would tell the world what I had learnt at Soulegrif Bight."

"And you expect the world would listen?" asked her father.

"There are people in it who would listen, some who have no chance of hearing of such things, some who would not go out of their way to hear them. . . . Oh, the world is not bad!" said the girl, speaking out of her own bright human heart which no experience had as yet torn or bruised. "The world is not bad, it is not unkind, it is only stupidly inanimate. And it is not only where the poor are concerned. We show it in everything. I believe people hold aloof from each other as much from fear and dread of repulsion as from anything else. Sometimes—in London—I have felt half-wretched, half angry, to see a room full of people, one staring cockily, another contemptuously, another with sublime indifference, and no two people taking any trouble to get nearer to each other. And yet these very people . . ."

"Won't you finish what you were going to say?" asked George, drawing a little closer to her, and lowering his voice somewhat.

"I was going to say that those very people will, at least every Sunday, declare that they believe in some future life, and that one of the joys of that life will consist of bright and fervid and intimate intercourse with others, 'Communion of Saints,' we term it. But who are the saints? And in what is it supposed the communion will consist? I think sometimes that if we don't begin it beforehand, begin with small and poor beginnings here, we shall never continue it there."

"Then you don't consider that it is some thing of the nature of a solecism to introduce religious topics into ordinary social intercourse?"

"Religious? What precisely is religion?" asked the girl passionately. "Is it going to church on Sundays? Is it singing hymns? Is it even the scrupulous praying of one's daily prayers? Is that all that it means for us—all that it can be made to mean? If so, keep it silent then, keep it strictly in its place. If it might be made to mean something less pathetically unhelpful, less unprofitably dreary—if, for instance, it might be made to mean a more carefully beautiful human life, with finer and higher sympathies and manners for every day uses of life, if it might suggest a quicker and more keen-sighted compassion for unobtrusive sorrows, a less cruel contempt for uncomprehended failure and mistake, a less open and sickening worship of wealth for wealth's sake, a stronger and more fervent desire to lessen but for one day, one hour, some small part of the great crushing burden that we help to lay upon the hapless shoulders of others—if religion might but ever so remotely mean these, or any of these, then, in God's name, let us speak of it, and we shall cease to dread the commission of that unpardonable sin, a social solecism."

George Kukoswald had a long and lonely walk before him after he had said "good-bye" to the Bartholomews at Netherbank. Lately he had grown a little tired of walking alone, or so he fancied. To day he covered a good deal of ground quite unaware of loneliness.

It was not altogether thought of Genevieve Bartholomew that occupied his mind. It seemed to him that he had lived a tolerably long life before that eventful day in Soulguil Bight. He had lived much, he had endured much, he had made mistakes, and suffered for them. His early dreams, like the early dreams of all of us, had wrought for him some very painful waking moments. Still there had been good in his life as well as evil, gain as well as loss. The thing that impressed him most when he looked back was the enormous aggregate of the experience which had been crowded into his five-and-thirty years. Until quite recently it had seemed to him that if he should live another five and thirty years they would inevitably be years of comparative emptiness. There could be nothing to make them otherwise, nothing that could add any great zest to life, and make the natural ending of it seem particularly undesirable. He had ideas, and not vague ones, of the future and its work, but they had been very apt to round themselves off with an oppressive sigh.

He was thinking of the future now as he went striding over the dark brown moor, but no sigh followed upon his thoughts.

He had put away the past—he put it away with an audibly-spoken word—

"Oh, the difference!" he said, "oh, the unspeakable difference between one human soul and another!"

He was thinking of two souls as he spoke, and neither of them his own. One had been laid before him in that past from which he turned so willingly, the other was unfolding itself to him now. Another page had just been turned, fair, pure, glowing with human warmth, alight with intellectual fires, inspired by something beyond, finer and rarer even than these. What wonder that as he walked on he should lose the sense of time and distance? What wonder that, for that hour at least, the future that had seemed so irksome and infelicitous, should open before him like a vision of a new life, a life that he might live, entering upon its fair chances and far-reaching possibilities, with the hope and gladness of a man entering into possession of a great and unexpected heritage!

It is in rule of womanly reserve
To lip and his till now —Miss Brownmo

A WINTER'S afternoon, with a clear, deep blue summer sky, & a low sun slanting across the Marshes, making dreamy picturesque effects where you least expect to find them. A few stray cattle strid among the dead reeds, little pools of blue water reflect them. In the stubble-fields ■ Netherbank some great grey Royston crows jerk solemnly about, a flight of fieldfares rush past, Genevieve's pigeons come whirling down from the cote, and perch on the top of the old diaw well.

In the little sitting-room also there is an atmosphere of quaint and quiet beauty. The sun slants across the room, lighting up Genevieve's shining hair, and her pale, attentive face. It rests, too, on the soft silver-white hair of Canon Gabriel, who is speaking.

"And you think, then, that so far as you can see, the plan has answered?" the Canon asks, in a tone of deep interest.

"Yes; so far as I can see. But I am never quite sure how far I do see. And my father needs, what I believe most men of genius need, some one ■ see for him, to think for him—that is, so far as thought of anything but his own work is concerned. If he can concentrate his whole force continuously upon that, ■ is well with him."

"I see, but when the thread gets broken . . . ?"

"Then that particular thread ■ broken for ever. . . . He has not touched one of the pictures that were begun before—before my mother died."

"And is the work that ■ doing now as good as the work that ■ was doing then?"

Genevieve hesitated a moment, then she said, lifting sad eyes to Canon Gabriel's face: "No, ■ is not, not as a rule. I would not tell him so, not for the world; and, happily, there is no one else here to tell him. And I hardly know myself where it fails. ■ is not ■ design, and ■ is not in execution, so far as that goes he will do good work or none. The defect seems to arise out of failure of that staying power that ■ once had so abundantly. He changes his mind; he alters this and that, and so confuses the original conception. This has happened to everything ■ has done here, except the Æone, that is the exception ■ the rule. It is as perfect, perhaps more perfect, than aught he ever did. But his work ■ taking ten times as much out of him as it used ■ do, because of this very uncertainty."

"Ah! that is quite intelligible," said the sympathetic old man. "I have had my fears lately, but they were of another kind. Now I understand. That was partly why I came with Severne this afternoon, that I might see you alone a little, while your father and he were busy. . . . Is the Sir Galahad promising well?"

"Sir Galahad is here to answer for himself," said that benignant young man, bursting into the room, displaying his beautiful white teeth and his crimson blush. "I say, I've been tuned out of the studio! There's a lady there. . . . Miss Richmond!"

"Miss Richmond!" exclaimed Genevieve, in amazement. "She is in the studio? . . . Then I ought to go down!"

"I—I don't think I would, if I were you!" said Sir Galahad. "I beg pardon, but—well, you know Miss Richmond seems as if she didn't want anybody. That was why I came away. She looked awfully glad when I said I would go."

That Miss Richmond should be described as looking "awfully glad" was, to say the least of it, a little incongruous under the circumstances.

There was something in her face and in her manner that Noel Bartholomew would not have attempted to describe at all. It perplexed him, and he was perplexed, too, by her coming in the manner she had come.

"I will let my daughter know that you are here," he said, moving as if to follow Mr. Severne. But Miss Richmond detained him, as much by her look as by any word she said. Already ■ was becoming evident that she was in one of her "desperate tranquillities."

As usual she was dressed with a studiously-careless magnificence. She wore a purple silk dress, which made her look paler than she was, and the white shawl which she had thrown artistically about her shoulders added yet more to the look of pallor, almost of sufficing, that was upon her face. She threw her hat rude as she had a habit of doing on every possible and impossible occasion knowing that she could afford to dispense with the shield of it. Her thick, dusky hair curving downwards over her forehead, rude suffice not shade to add intensity to her eyes had they needed adventitious aid, but she, did not, they were dark enough, charming enough, inscrutable enough for any ordinary use of life.

She sat upon a low sofa, over which Bartholomew had thrown some antique embroidered stuff that he had been prunty from. One hand grasped lightly the cushion by her side, the elbow of the other arm was placed on her knee, her head rested on the white fingers that were turned under her chin. Her pug nose was wrapped about her feet.

She sat quite silent for some moments—thus, too, was a way she had at the beginning of even ordinary intimacy. It was unpretensive.

Her half-closed eyes seemed as if they were scrutinising the picture on the easel with an extreme judicial scrutiny.

Bartholomew looked wated, wondered.

"You have come to make me an offer for the Anone, Miss Richmond?" he said at last, smiling. He spoke under his grey moustache.

Miss Richmond raised her eyes slowly to him, not fully unclosing them.

"No," she said, speaking in a low, quiet, deliberate way. There was no smile about her mouth. Her prominent upper lip curved forward, the under one was drawn in. "No, I have not come to make an offer for the Anone."

There was another silence. It was broken by Miss Richmond, speaking always with the same forceful calm.

"I was desirous of seeing your picture," she said, "I have heard of it."

"Have you, indeed? Do people talk of pictures in the neighbourhood of Mark-Maushes?"

"They talk of everything in the neighbourhood of Mark-Maushes. They talk of you, and they talk of me."

"Ah! that is more conceivable," replied Bartholomew, instinctively keeping to a light and lively tone. "That is much more conceivable, but I should like to know what they say of the picture—I should like to know all they say. That is the drawback of being surrounded by non-critical people, one hears only the praise."

"Do you like to hear blame?"

"No, I don't. There are people in the world who tell one their adverse opinion with a kind intention, no doubt. They think it must be a good thing for an artist to be made aware of his faults of the mistakes he has fallen into. ■ never seems to occur to them that he has probably been very early and bitterly aware of his shortcomings. ■ though. A man seldom sees mistakes of any kind till he has made them. and as a rule that is too late. The best plan undoubtedly, is to put your failures in the first if they can be put there. . . . But you have not yet told me what you have heard and of the Anone?"

He drew the easel forward into a fuller light as he spoke. The picture on it was large, the figure of Anone standing there in her white Greek drapery, leaning on a fragment twined with vine, singing her sad music to the stillness of the mountain shades of Idre, was striking and distinctly suggestive figure. The fascination of the picture was, of course, centred in the face of the beautiful browed maiden. It was purity itself—faultless purity and it had in it an unsparkable loveliness, a most sweet and touching sorrow. The pale countenance was uplifted, the eyes closed supplicatingly, the wavy yellow hair floated down over the neck and robe, the lips were parted as if uttering the words that were to be given as Lynote to the picture.

On the Ida, many fountains flow,
Dewy oaks shade the sacred glade.
Here we for the weak and the ill,
Blessed with my tears, and my sighs,
Come slowly to rest, slowly to sleep,
A child that is fit to be Laid to rest in the tomb of the dead.

Altogether, the work had been made to seem what indeed it really was, an echo in colour of the poem that had inspired it.

"It is Icarus's Anone, rather than Homer's," said Bartholomew, "and Pennysson's scenery. The background, the pine trees and the flowers, the lawns and meadow ledges, the suggestion of Ithaca in the distance of swimming vapour, these things are all taken from the singer of To Dry."

"So I have heard, and I have read the poem that I might be able to understand the picture. I read it this morning. . . . I could not help wondering how much you had comprehended it yourself!"

"Then now you can see?"

"No pardon me. I cannot, not altogether."

"So far then, my intention has failed?"

"Not if your intention was simply to paint a beautiful picture," said Miss Richmond. "I can see that it is beautiful. I can see that the face is the face of a lovely and sorrowful girl. But it is different from my ideal, the ideal I used in me by the poem itself. It is not the face of a despairing, forlorn woman, long, in, passionately for death to end her despair! I yearning to weath, crying aloud

 ■ lull on the hills —

It's a bit happy and a bit sad
It's a bit happy and a bit sad

Your A none is not therefore the A none that I find in Jenson's.

You think it needs more vividness?

"I do not know. It needs something it has not

"My idea," said Bartholomew, anxious apparently to keep the conversation as unincisive as possible, "my idea has always been that either a writer or poet is the greatest in his art if he can succeed in heightening his effects by repression, by understatement, rather than overstatement. It would be equally possible to make the Aloune shush down!

"I suppose you could never understand that a woman might be driven to shriek aloud?" said Miss Richmond, in tones that were as far as possible from shrieking.

One has to understand such things, said I artiholemen, at a loss I know what to say. The feeling was gathering about him that he was standing on the very verge of some precipice, and that he had stood there before. He could only turn his face, refusing to look downward.

Miss Richmond looked at him for a moment as he made this reply. It was a look of appeal of suffering, of such tender ness as he had never thought to see on the face before him. It was only pain to him to see it there.

When she spoke again she spoke as if the silence had been full of continued speech.

"Have you forgotten so completely?" she asked in a tone that almost startled him by its intensity.

He might, without cruelty, have asked to what particular incident of his life she was referring, so little impression of my lasting kind had been made upon him by that part of his existence which had been lived within Miss Richmond's ken. But it was about all that could be said of it, that he had been lived within reach of her influence. Her question is to whether he had forgotten awoke no sense of shame, of regret. If any touch of embarrassment was upon him, it was not for his own sake.

He was not a vain man now, he had not been vain twenty years before. He had always been conscious of his own exterior disadvantages. He even believed himself to have been seduced by the want of the power of making a suitable impression at first sight. When he had been able no longer to balk from himself his M. S. K. Chimon law, upon the trial, he had a favorable impression upon him. He had a excellent, and some set in down to her, let's to be, and the heavy eyes that were in on at a well. Croft, lastly, tall and splendidly formed as she was, he had but looked upon her as a child, an untanned, inexperienced, and rather dimly unwise girl of seventeen, while he was a man of well nigh thirty years. In point of fact the whole affair had amused him first and then annoyed him, without once awakening in him any real interest.

Now that he was thus asked if he had forgotten, it was but natural that a keen and vivid memory like his should bring back the time with many of its small incidents. I passed across him like a fish that one summer when he had been half-cured to find that he could not sit up his ears anywhere in the neighbourhood without soon or later seeing Miss Richmond coming, toward him or being her step behind him, she had sat beside him talked to him looked at him questioned him, and even read to him, until his mind being glad to see her he had grown to dread her coming with a strong and really well-defined dread. She had discovered this and in the event there had been reason. Was it of this that she was thinking as she sat there on the studio sofa among the emeralds?

I am 7 and I forget very few things, Miss Richmond, he said at last. He was feeling some compassion, some desire to make his resistance as little hard and cruel as might be.

"If that be so, then, at least you can understand me," Diana Richmond went on, looking into his face with eyes expressive only of human pain. "I forget nothing. I have never forgotten. Indeed, it does but seem as if all through these long weary years every feeling had been growing, intensifying itself. And once I thought I had forgotten, you will have heard of that. And that was one reason why I came to day to tell you the truth. I thought, too, that I might have led you to make wrong inferences the other day when I told you the story of my friend. You remember?"

"Yes, I remember quite distinctly

"And you discovered that I spoke an allegory—that I meant myself when I spoke of another?"

GOOD WORDS.

"Yes, I may admit it since you ask. I thought that you alluded to your own experience, and I was sorry."

"You were sorry?"

"Yes."

"May I ask why you were sorry?"

"To learn that you had suffered so much. It is natural that one should feel regret at another's pain."

Again Miss Richmond looked at him wonderingly, appealingly.

"You might have saved me from all the pain I have ever had," she said at length, in low, wistful, beseeching tones. Then her head drooped, her face slipped downward till it was hidden by her white hand. "You might have saved me!—you might have saved me!" she murmured in a wild, piercing way.

Noel Bartholomew sat with clasped hands, looking into the fire. The grey hollow of his cheeks looked grayer, the deep intensity of his eyes seemed deeper for this strange perplexity. There was safety only in silence.

Miss Richmond raised her head presently; there was a new look on her face—a look as of one torn in conflict and overpowered.

"What was it I said of George Kirkowald just now?" she asked, evidently trying to remember.

"You said nothing," replied Bartholomew, "that is, you did not mention his name."

"No?" I should be glad to know that his name need never pass my lips again. I ever felt hate in my life, if I know what hate is, then I hate that man. It has not always been so, I know that, and sometimes . . . but no, no, I do hate him, and I wanted to tell you so. I wanted to tell you, knowing that it was safe with you." Then Diana Richmond changed her tone for a moment, and added, "There may yet be reason why I should be glad to know that that fact had only been confined to one person, and that one a gentleman."

"I think it will be safe with me," said Bartholomew, with as little expression of any kind as he could use. He was not sorry to know this thing. He could conceive of nothing just then that could make him wish to disclose it.

"And that is all you have to say?" asked Miss Richmond with surprise. "That is all your reply? It is no relief to you to know that I do not care for another?"

The only reply that Bartholomew could have made truthfully would have seemed pitiless, almost inhuman under the circumstances. Again silence only was possible to him, but it was not a silence that could be mistaken.

There was a new softness in Miss Richmond's tone when she spoke again.

"I am not a child now," she said. "I need not tell you that I know all that this means—thus that I am trying to you. I know what the world would think of it, and of me, and it shows how I trust you, how I recognise you for what you are, that I can say . . . all. But do not think it is easy, do not think it is costing me nothing. . . . Nothing? . . . is my life."

Bartholomew did not look at her. He was still looking with grave grey eyes into the dying fire. The sun was low now, and had gone over the hill tops, and the studio was dim, the air chill and heavy.

"It is not easy to me—this part that I have to take," he replied after a time. "You will understand that, and, therefore, you will believe it."

"How can I understand?" she asked, speaking with a subdued passionateness. "How can I understand that you should be so incurable—so impassive? . . . Answer me this—at least answer me this—do you hate me? Am I hateful in your sight?"

Noel Bartholomew looked at the face before him. It was beautiful at any time, it was much more than beautiful now in the new light of suffering and tenderness.

"Only one answer is possible to that question, Miss Richmond," he said, "and I hope I hardly need make it. I do not hate you, most certainly I do not. I am not conscious even of the faintest antipathy."

Diana Richmond looked up. A smile came over her lips, it was the first smile that had been there that day, and it was full of sadness, but, despite the sadness, there was a touch of wonder and disdain.

"You are not conscious even of antipathy?" she repeated slowly. For a moment or two she sat silent, stirless, looking out from under her dusky hair, away into some vague distance. A keen observer might have seen by her heavy breathing, by her dilated eyes, by the quiver of lips that seemed firmly closed, that some strong conflict was going on within.

It was even so. She fought with a wild temptation, and she won. Her impulse, hearing this man's quiet, indifferent confession of indifference, had been to rise to her feet, to stand before him, to pour down upon him her wrath, her contempt, her utter scorn for a thing so callous, so apathetic, so obtusely imperturbable. This she could have done effectively without doing one iota of the love she had—that she had undoubtedly always had—for this man, whose love was not for her.

Another thought crossed her mind. There was a temptation that she might throw down before him. There were men in the world, she said to herself, who, if they could not give their affection, would at least consent to sell a semblance of it for a fair price. Miss Richmond was not so wealthy as the world supposed her ■ be, but she knew that she could offer a price that might surely seem fair to a non provident and not too successful artist. . . . She thought of it a moment, then she put the thought away. This man was not as other men.

She rose ■ her feet suddenly, at last, and drew her shawl about her. Her hat had fallen to the floor. Bartholomew stooped for it, handed it to her with a look of pain on his face, and Miss Richmond took it quite silently. She did not offer her hand as she went out into the twilight. Her carriage was there. Noel Bartholomew would have gone with her to the gate across the fields, but she turned to decline this last attention. She said no parting word, but Bartholomew, watching as she went, saw the clapping of white hands, the passionate upturning of a despairing face, he heard, too, a cry, a low subdued cry that touched him more nearly to the heart than all that had gone before. Long afterwards he heard it echoing, echoing plaintively—

"Is there no hope? . . . none? . . . Will nothing win back hope?"

CHAPTER XXIII.—USSELLY HALL.

"Sometimes from her eyes
I did receive fair speaking messages"
Marchmont of Venice

GENEVIEVE BARTHOLOMEW watched the Christmas customs of Murk Marshes in something of an antiquarian spirit, and so watched they were not devoid of interest.

The mummers came, a dozen or so of men and boys with blackened faces, and fantastically ordered attire. They sang an old carol, they performed antics, Keturah pretending to wild alarm—she had been wildly alarmed for several Christmases past. Ishmael Crudas had sent a handsome fir-tree top for ■ Christmas tree, which Genevieve hung with small gifts for the children who came to the door on Christmas morning shouting, "Ah wish ya' a merry Kessenmas an' a happy New Year, Mr. an' Mrs. Bartlemew, an' Keturah Glead!" The first boy who crossed the threshold had to be a fair-haired boy, Keturah was mindful of that. A dark-haired lad would certainly have heralded a dark fate for the coming year.

Did any one think of the flaxen whiteness of the little head when the snows of next Christmas fell? Was anybody's faith shaken by finding that Fate had ignored the Saxon fairness of the first to enter the cottage ■ Netherbank?

Another point of antiquarian note was the turning of Wassail Cup into Vessel Cup. Old Mrs. Craven could remember the time when a real wassail bowl full of spiced ale had been carried from house to house in the villages. It had been carried always by young girls in her time, and the tasting of it had been a matter of scrupulous observance in all well ordered households.

The name remained under its changed form, and it stood for a ceremony, but no wassail bowl was carried now. Instead of a band of rustic maidens an ancient woman came, who carried a box with a waxen Babe of Bethlehem, lying in wide eyed placidity among sprays of laurel and red-berried holly. The old woman sang quaveringly, a tear or two dropped from Keturah's eyes—the girl was strangely emotional, and the coming of the Vessel Cup was, traditionally, of the nature of a consecration.

Miss Craven had provided the bowl of "firmity" for the Christmas eve supper, firmity being, as perhaps every one knows nowadays, wheat poundage, eaten with sugar and spices. The taste for it is an inherited taste, doubtless, and doubtless also the most patriotic of Yorkshiremen would admit that it might be difficult of acquirement. The fact that it had been eaten at Netherbank was much appreciated in the neighbourhood of Murk-Marshes.

It was Miss Craven too who lent the large round pewter dish to contain the gingerbread and the big cheese of her own making. Genevieve had ■ be instructed concerning the dispensing of cheese and gingerbread, the lighting of Christmas candles, and the preservation of the charred remains of the Yule log. These remains were ■ be put under a bed, to preserve the house from danger by fire throughout the coming year!

A few invitations came, a few were accepted, but it was not an easy matter going about that rugged country on moonless nights. Bartholomew went for his daughter's sake, his daughter went for his sake; and as a rule they were both of them glad when the small sacrifice was completed.

It was a satisfaction to Genevieve ■ know that George Kirkorwald was not spending his Christmas in loneliness at Usselby Crag. He had come down one day from the Hall to tell them that he was going to York for a week or so, to St. Aldhelm's Vicarage, his friend, John Warburton, being Rector there.

"I hope that fortune and the weather will favour us when you come back again," said Bartholomew. "I am ashamed to think that we have never yet found our way to Usselby."

"I always hold professional people excused from conventional observances," replied George. "Besides, I have a fear that I have never given you any very strong impression that I should be glad to see you. Truth to tell, the place looks so desolate, nay, worse than that, so dilapidated, that I am half-ashamed of it. Nevertheless, come. It will seem less desolate when you have been there."

He had spoken to Bartholomew, but his eyes had sought Genevieve while he uttered the last sentence, and she knew that he spoke to her alone. Her colour came, and deepened, a little pleasantness died away from her lips unaided. Did he know what these seldom recurring admissions and revelations were to her? Did he dream what solemn weight they had? How full they were of grave assurance? Already it seemed that she could need no further assurance. This love was definite enough for this life.

So it was that there could be satisfaction in his absence, contentment in his silence.

Never in her life had there been a time of such full rest, such full sweetness, such full faith in a large and liberal future.

She asked no question of herself, none of him, there were none to be asked. The unspoken understanding that was in a glance, in a tone, authenticated every thought of the days to be. It was a time of stillness, the stillness that precedes rapture, and it held opportunity for an almost spiritual reverence of the latent felicity that the next moment might unfold. There was no desire to hurry its unfolding, rather was their desire for the continuance of the present beautiful strangeness, the present immaterialities, the present half-acknowledged sympathies. No certain knowledge could overpass this sweet uncertainty.

The day when the long-promised visit to Usselby came to be made was a bright, windy January day. The leafless trees on the edge of the moor rocked and whitened in the sun shine; the wind blew pale hollows in the fleeces of the black-faced moorland sheep, the sea in the distance heaving and heaving in wild ways for leagues away.

It was a day on which to be strong, to be glad, to put away fearfulness if you had any.

The white stony road went winding all the way by the bold edge of Langbarough Moor. Below the moor there was a great sweep of common all dotted over with grey boulders. To the left a vast dark fir wood bounded by fissionic walls covered the sloping land that lay between the moor and the low lying marshes.

The entrance gate to Usselby was a common five-barred gate in the wall of rude unshapen stone. The drive, which wound between the fir-trees, was a narrow road, full of deep ruts. Tall fronds of fern, still green and graceful, were curving out from belts of worn pine-needles. A squirrel crossed the road, a large handsome magpie dived slowly down ward from the blue mystery of the pine tree shade, another following. Presently some waterfowl rose up suddenly out of a little streamlet, and went chuckling and fluttering away as if quite conscious of providential escape.

The house itself was not out of keeping with its wild surroundings. It was ancient, but you did not think of its date in looking at it, nor did you ask any question as to its architectural order.

It stood a little below the road, the dormer windows of the upper story projected over the lower, the red tiles of the gabled roof were green and grey and yellow with lichens. Dark yew trees stood in the terraced gardens, wide grass grown steps led down under the shade to the great arched doorway. A sun dial stood in the middle of the lawn.

The old brown door seemed to open of itself, a tall eager figure came hurriedly forward, holding out a hand to Genevieve, uttering words of cordial welcome. "Come in, come in!" he said—"to think of your walking so far in such a wind as this! You will have to come in here, it is my study, there is no fire anywhere else, Jael won't allow it as a rule, but she would have made an exception if she had known you were coming. Is there a chair free from books anywhere, Mr. Bartholomew?"

"I think I see one in the distance," was the reply. It was a room that had a distance, a long old-fashioned room with a low ceiling, and unexpected recesses. Despite its shabbiness there was a prevailing dark warm tone that lent an air of comfort. It might be gloomy on a gloomy day, just when you desire of a room that should have some brightness, but all days are not days of darkness. It was not dark to-day. The sun was slanting athwart the mullions of the low window at the other end of the room. Far away beyond, over the green of the cliff top, there was a streak of dull blue sea against the brighter blue of the sky.

Kirkoswald had been writing, and the contracted lines about his great, square fore head did not smooth themselves out all at once. There were books on either hand, newspapers on the floor, sheets of manuscript still wet on the table.

"I am beginning to have a suspicion that we have interrupted you," said Genevieve, taking the chair he had placed for her by the fire.

"You have, but just at the very point when interruption was needed. I was writing an article for the Quintic Review, and it is already too long. I shall have to spend as much time in cutting it down as I have spent in writing it."

"You might make a pamphlet of it."

"So I might. But do you think anybody reads pamphlets in this epoch of magazines? Perhaps it might get itself read if I called it a monogram. But thanks for the suggestion I shall think of it. If you will let me I will talk the thing over with you some day, before I send it off. I know you would be interested. It is connected with something we were speaking of the other day—the life of those to whom life means nought but labour. I would have asked you to listen a little now, but Jael is coming with some tea, and I want you to see the house. I want Mr. Bartholomew's advice about it. What am I to do with such a place?"

"Are you speaking disrespectfully of it?" asked Genevieve, opening her violet grey eyes a little wider.

"Do you wonder that I should? Do you like it?" asked Kirkoswald with an almost boyish eagerness.

"I like it so much that I feel as if I had always liked it, always known it," said Genevieve, speaking with guileless unreserve. "Indeed, it is strange," she went on, "ever since I saw the twisted chimneys, and the gables, and the dormer windows, I have had quite a strong impression of having seen the place before."

"It is probably some picture that you remember," said her father.

"It may be," said George, "or it may be another instance of this feeling of reminiscence with which we are all so acquainted. I believe the secret of it to be a sudden sense of affinity. If you meet a man towards whom you feel about to be strongly drawn, between whom and yourself any valuable intercourse is likely to be possible, you never meet as strangers meet. The first glance does away with six months of preliminary acquaintance."

Was he thinking of a glance that had met his in Soulsgrif Bight as he spoke? Was he wondering if Genevieve had any glance of him that she cared to remember?

The tea came in presently, the sight of Jael bringing to Genevieve's mind for the first time all that Ailsie Drewe had told of bygone days at Usselby Hall. The old woman's narrow forehead, her suspicious glance, her penurious gown, her independent speech, made that inconceivable piece of local history to be conceivable in a single moment. Genevieve looked round, wondering from which window the irascible old man had fired upon the carol-singers, wondering, too, if his son knew all the strange traditions that were being handed on. Looking at George Kirkoswald she could imagine that there had been pain and darkness somewhere in the unforgotten past.

They went over the house, up stairs into a wide drawing-room with windows that looked seaward, it was hung with frayed and faded satin damask. The carpet was faded, too, and the worn yellow satin of the gilt and white chairs looked too dingy to be spoken of as yellow any more.

"I have been told that my mother used to like this room," said George with a quiet echo of a dead sadness in his tone. "She used it always till my sisters died, after that she never left her own room again. . . . That is her portrait," he continued, taking a miniature from its case and putting it into Genevieve's hand with tender touch and movement. It was not a beautiful face, even on ivory, but it was strong, and pure, and compassionate. The eyes were her son's eyes, dark, full of thought, comprehensive of human pain.

There were other portraits in the dining-room below. Ladies in lavender impetred with cold, pale lips, tall old women with double chins looked threateningly down from frames of shabby gold. There was a puffly hunting-man in pink, a naval officer in blue, a legil ancestor in wig and gown. It would have been a curious study to try to make out the spiritual hueage of the present owner of Usselby Hall by help of these ancestral portraits of his ancestors.

Remembering some such study he would it not be possible to find in it a certain feeling of satisfaction that one's ancestors had never been painted at all, that one stood alone and distinct, so to speak, unhaunted and undaunted by a painted cloud of witnesses ■ one's heritage of meanness, weakness, vanity, hardness of heart, or general moral obliquity?

There were not many of the portraits that George Kirkoswald could turn to with any feeling of gratification, or even of content. Some day he would remove the greater part of them; he said to himself this afternoon, looking at them through another's eyes. And even as ■ said so his imagination printed for him another picture to fill the frame where a faded lady in orange satin stood leaning against a brown tree. The orange-coloured lady's hair, with some one else's to help it, was built up a quarter of a yard above her head, she had puffy cheeks and tiny bead-like eyes of a dull brown. Kirkoswald could hardly help turning to the living picture that stood beside his undignified and unbecoming ancestress. For one moment he had a wild impulse to ask Bartholomew then and there if he would paint this daughter of his as she stood at that moment, with her fine, sweet face turned upward toward the picture, her curved lips parted with half a smile, her rich masses of golden hair blown into picturesque confusion by the winds of Langbough Moor, and touched now by the last slanting ray of sunshine.

Could any artist that ever painted paint such loveliness as this? And if he believed that, could he achieve something more, could he put on canvas the inner light that was in the eyes, the charming meanings that passed so swiftly across the mouth, the revelation that was in the hectic lines of the lower part of the face, the vigorous intellectual activity that stamped the upper part? If it could be done it ought ■ be done now, he said to himself, feeling instinctively that ■ was the kind of face that ten years of life would harrow with the wear and tear of twenty. "But, heaven helping me," he added, "there shall be little wear and tear that I can keep away from her."

Just then something—was it a mere passing shadow?—came suddenly down upon him, darkening his forehead, showing the strong lines about his mouth, the cleft that crossed his lower lip, and was visible again on the broad, firm chin. Genevieve, meeting his eyes, could not but wonder at the sudden change ■ had come like a shadow, so it departed, leaving light and gladness behind it. Another room or two had ■ be inspected, and Mr.

Bartholomew had to give his opinion on the capacity of each for improvement. The furniture was of all kinds, so, too, were the ornaments, but things had been so long in their places together, they had ministered so long to the needs of the same people, that they had acquired a certain harmony that was not without a beauty of its own. There was little beauty of any other kind. The priceless and abundant treasures of ancient china and glass were all packed carefully away out of sight in garrets and cupboards, and the keys were in Jack's pocket—they had been there for close upon five and thirty years now.

CHAPTER XXIV—ETHICS AND AESTHETICS.

"What is the duty of the artist?"
 Being better to one's self than to the world.
 A. B. C. of ART.

GENEVIEWE listened quite silently while her father gave the opinions that were asked of him, and she recognised the fact that they were worthy of being listened to. It seemed as if the old place had stirred his decorative instincts to even more than usual activity.

His ideas were not, of course, the latest modern ideas. He made no mention of sage green or of peacock blue, he did not insist upon screens, or dados, or hilly pots.

"I want to have the thing done once for all," said Kirkoswald, "and therefore will do it."

"And, of course, you know what precisely the thing is that you wish to have done?"

"Yes, I believe so. I wish to have this house made into a home, a home that shall be a desirable place to live in because of its beauty. And, moreover, I want it doing as soon as may be, since it is evident that I cannot ask Warburton to bring his wife here till it is done."

"If you do all that I should do in your place it will require time," said Bartholomew. "You will want an artist, perhaps two, down from London, who can paint in fresco. I should recommend the Gambier Parry process."

"Yes, you are thinking of the staircase? And there is the drawing room. The paneling below the picture space has been painted white. It might be scraped, I should say it is oak."

"Probably. But you would not care for the effect ■ dark oak in that room, especially as there would be nothing to balance it. Why not have the panels decorated—some of the lighter and brighter historical scenes, for instance? ■ would have to be done in flat painting, and in the palest possible tints. The wall space above might be gilt and diapered, and above that again you might have a frieze painted to accord with the panels."

"That promises well!" said Kirkoswald after musing over it a little while. "But if the tints are all to be so flat and pale how would you get a look of warmth into the room?"

"By means of the hangings, something Indian, nothing can equal the Indian things for good subdued harmonies of rich colour. And you would have your carpets and rugs in keeping."

"And the dining room?" asked George.

"The dining room I should leave as it is," replied Mr. Bartholomew, "and this room also, that is so far as the walls are concerned. Nothing could be finer in its way than this old wainscoting. You might have fireplaces of carved oak, and you will want some tiles, both for the fireplaces and the floor of the hall. You will have to be careful about choosing your tiles—good ones are to be had."

Genevieve had taken no part in the conversation so far; she was not even looking at the two who were carrying it on, but one of them was watching the varying expression of her face somewhat closely.

George Kirkoswald had not forgotten that day in the studio, the girl's cry for a reconciler; nor the instance she had given of need for reconciliation.

"I need hardly ask you if you approve of your father's plans and designs?" he said presently, turning to her with his usual gravity.

"I am thinking them out," she said, "trying to resolve them. At first I objected to the idea of Indian hangings in an English room decorated with English historical scenes. Then it occurred to me that the histories of the two countries are now so twined together, that it would be rather interesting to have combined associations."

"Think you for that idea, I agree with it. And you like the rest?"

"I think the result will touch the thing you aim at—beauty."

"Yes," said George, "unquestionably. And the aim? You sympathize with it only so far?"

"Only so far."

"And suspect yourself of wrong-doing even in that?" said her father.

"By the way, I believe you have never explained to Mr. Kirkoswald what I am sure must need explanation, the non Puritanical nature of your own dress, and of such surroundings as you possess at Netherbank?"

"No, I have not. I have left Mr. Kirkoswald to suppose for himself a fresh instance of feminine inconsistency."

"Or rather a fresh instance of graceful and womanly concession," George interposed, "which is above all inconsistencies whatever in such matters as this. I have understood."

"Have you also understood my attitude in the matter?" asked Bartholomew. "I do not understand it myself. I never pretend to understand the strong human craving for mutual beauty. Men will ruin themselves to possess it, though they know that the possession will add a new anguish to death itself. Think of Cardinal Mazzini dragging himself from his death-bed to walk round his picture galleries for the first time, exclaiming, 'See this beautiful Correggio, and this Venus of Titian and this incomparable Deluge of Antonio Caracci! Ah! and I must leave all this, I must leave all this!' ■ ■ ■ millions of men ache to read of it, but it does not enable one to comprehend the secret that lies behind. I dare say you know the second volume of 'Modern Painters' and I know the idea that all pure beauty is neither more nor less than a shadow of something to be found in God Himself. ■ ■ ■ that be so and I think it is, it will account for much that we take no note of now, it will make plain much that we misconceive. Who can explain in words the effect upon his own soul of a sunset or a storm at sea, of truly grand music, of a really good picture of a really fine virtue? And these latter are but form and colour, and sound.

'Only form, and colour, and sound,' repeated Lukoswald. 'And yet so long as a man's soul can be reached through his senses it is important to consider what shall be put before him for his senses to entertain. There are men who can be stirred, uplifted, through their senses alone. It seems as if the straight soul avenues of thought, of spiritual perception were closed for them. Over men of this stamp music often has a power that is quite incalculable. Others find form and colour more stimulating, and again there are men who can be moved by all three. Perhaps I am among the latter, so you will understand why I am inquisitive to arrive at some sufficient reason for making my house beautiful, or leaving it unbeautiful.'

'Is there no middle course?' asked Genevieve, smiling. 'Must you either spend some thousands of pounds, or go on with faded curtains and faded carpets?'

Softly, Genevieve, dear!' said Mr Bartholomew. 'Softly. I think you should leave the question of cost till Mr Lukoswald raises it himself.'

'Then I must leave one of the most important issues of the whole matter,' said the girl speaking firmly. 'If these things that you suggest could be had without money, I would say, have them by all means, and as soon as possible, let us all have them. There is no inherent harm in them, it is conceivable, as you say, that there may be good, they are most certainly full of delight, quite pure delight. It is the idea of the money they represent that takes the delight out of them for me. If I were walking up your firewood staircase I should hear the cry of children who cry for hunger. I should see the white worn faces of women worn with working, for I read

There was a silence, a somewhat lengthened silence.

George had Oswald sat looking into the fire, it was icy, blazing, he felt the comfortable warmth of it, but he felt also a chilliness that the fire could not reach.

A minute or two before he had seen his painted walls, his historic panels quite plainly now it was as if he saw them fading before his eyes. The knowledge that the old drap stains were still there was a satisfaction to him.

Genevieve broke the silence.

'You will not misjudge me, she said, turning an earnest face toward George. 'Lukoswald, "and you will not suppose that I am judging you, or meaning to legislate for you for a single moment. I told you the other day," she went on her lips breaking into a smile as she spoke, "that I had not stirred my case effectively. So far as I remember, I did not state it at all. I hadn't the courage and went on wandering outside of it. Let me try now to say what I meant then.

I did not mean to imply that there was ■ ■ ■ could be any special wrong in surrounding one's self with any and every kind of material beauty one could obtain. It is possible that the time may come when every desire of the kind may be satisfied without a hint from conscience of anything, but approval, ugliness, commonness, uncereliness, will be considered as blots, mistakes. . . . But has that day come yet? . . . Can any of us dare to say to ourselves in our best and most secret and most sacred moments that this is the time to decorate finely, to dress rarely to add picture to picture, and ornament to ornament while all about us the poor are crying silently, or suffering patiently, or turning to stone, in the effort to endure the hardness we do not even see they are enduring. We do not want to see and they know it. And yet they take off their hats and curtsy, and do us little kindnesses when they can, as if they would express a penitence for their unprosperous days. In all this world there is nothing more pathetic, more stringently touching, than the bearing of the respectable poor towards the heedless or apathetic rich. I believe firmly that the poor man is better skilled in the science of soul-reading than the rich man is. Your well-dressed and well-fed man, with a balance at his banker's, hardly cares to brood over what may be passing in the brain of the man whose very soul faints with chronic hunger. He will pass him in the street, and never see that his eye is dim by reason of sorrow, and his lip closed hardly by pressure of long despair, while, if you could know what the poor man says to himself, nine times out of ten you would find that his thought had shaped itself into an excuse. 'They don't think, bless you' rich folk never think!' That is how they beat, how they find patience, how they find a courteous humility so grandly and greatly possible . . . If I might ask for a gift that should be more to me than all else in this world, I would certainly ask for the pen of a ready writer, ready enough and powerful enough to awaken the souls who are at ease concerning their daily bread, and who never see on any human face a sign that is significant to them of human need for the compassion that is divine. . . . 'These are they who will ask in such amaze—Lord, when saw we Thee an hungry?'

The conversation did not end there. It went on gravely awhile, moving in and out, being, as it were, the silver thread that the Master workman uses to draw His work together.

Genevieve and her father went home in the twilight, and George Kukoswald went with them to the farther edge of the moor. As he went back alone a young moon, like a tiny tickle of pure gold, hung over the dark purple distance, the sky was one vast, clear gradation of tint and tone, from faint amber to indigo blue. Late as it was a robin was chirping and swinging on the curve of a long spray of huar.

And George Kukoswald was questioning himself as he went. Seeing Genevieve Bartholomew at his own home that day, watching her as she moved about his rooms, listening to her foot on the stair, to her voice as she spoke, he had recognised the things that alone could make his home homelike. Two souls with one high aim, two minds with one strong will, two hearts beating in tune to one impulse—the rest might be there, or not there. Would she decide? Had he ground enough for hoping that one day she would come and say, "This let us do, for the sake of seaminess, and that let us not do, for the sake of Christ?"

Then, thinking again, he knew that she had said these things. If she never came ■■■ Ussethy, nor spoke of it again, she had done a for him ■■■ line over which he knew that he could never step untried.

CHAPTER XXV.—OUT OF THE PAST.

"But do they move to it at all by itself . . .
I try to find it out about it . . .
And let go but getting in the way . . .
For it depends upon that love . . .
SOLAKIAN AND V. net ACII

It was acknowledged throughout the district that the downward tendency ■■■ things at Hunsgrath Higgs was in no way attributable ■■■ ignorance or mismanagement on the part of Miss Craven.

There was not a farm of its size in the neighbourhood that had been more carefully dealt with in respect of rotation of crops, abundance of lime, and almost beastless tillage. There were fields of Miss Craven's, where the labourers seemed almost ■■■ live; but these same fields were not profitable. The soil was stiff clay, the water stood in pools between the lands, not seeming ■■■ find its way to such drainage as existed, and the yield of corn was only good in unusually good years. As for the pasture lands they were full of moss and whin and picturesque bramble-brakes, and therefore failed to feed the number of cattle they should have fed.

It had been different once, Dorothy said. Labour had cost less, there had been no American supplies to cause fluctuations in the market, and more than that, there had been no lack of capital. It would have been hard to say exactly how the capital had been drained away, the draining process had probably been going on a long time when that historic snow storm had buried Joseph Craven's splendid flock of sheep in the hollows of Langbarough Moor. The old man had felt that ■■■ be a kind of final stroke, and he never rallied from it.

There had been a touching scene one morning. Old Joseph had lain awake all night—perhaps he had lain awake many nights; but on this particular morning he felt as if his night's sleeplessness had wrought some change in him. He had gone ■■■ his daughter's room quite early—it was hardly light—and she had been roused ■■■ a very keen and startling dread by seeing him standing there with an account-book or two, and a box with a few sovereigns in it. There was a strangely haggard look on his face.

"There's nobody but you, Dorothy—nobody but you," the old man said in a faint, plaintive voice. "■ you'll not take things ■ hand there's nobody else; they must go, Dorothy, if you don't look to them."

Dorothy watched him silently for a moment, then she made him sit down by a little table, while she prepared him a cup of tea. A rose tinted light was coming up from the sea, flooding all the room, the old man's white head was bowed over his trembling hands. He could hardly turn the pages before him. He seemed as if he found it difficult to understand what he himself had written there. Yet Dorothy could see that he was, so to speak, watching himself; that ■ had mental insight enough to know that that insight was failing. The effort he made was heart rending, though he made it so quietly. There was money borrowed here, money owing there. "You're listening, Dorothy?" ■ said, now and again. "You're trying to understand?" And Dorothy assured him to his satisfaction that all was plain to her comprehension, all that so far had been placed before her. But there was a good deal behind yet, confusions, intricacies, arrears of rent, arrears of interest. The old man's utterance grew less clear, less firm, his voice trembled, then it gave way altogether.

"I can't see, Dorothy—Dorothy, I can't remember, I can't understand!"

That was the end of effort—a passionate burst of wild, unrestrained weeping that would not be comforted, of sobs and tears that seemed like a great upheaval of the strong man's strength . . . That was the end. He was never himself again after that, and it was Dorothy's turn ■ be strong—strong and faithful. From that morning she had done her best, the best that might be done by a woman in a world of hard and unscrupulous men.

She had had offers enough of help, some of them from men who had professed themselves her father's friends, but no keener strokes had fallen upon her life than those that had taught her what such offers meant. She was not an over-sensitive woman, but many a time her brain had almost reeled under the sense of her own helplessness against wrong and oppression.

Still Dorothy Craven had borne up and borne on bravely, fighting where fighting was ■ be done, and enduring where fighting was of no avail. None but God took count of it. None but God. In all the wide world there was neither man nor woman to whom Dorothy could turn when her soul faunted under her burdens. Some of the people about saw that she had burdens, they did not fail ■ gossip of that, and they all of them knew that deep under her business trials she had another trial lying still, if indeed it did ■ still.

It had all happened long ago, when Dorothy Craven was quite a girl, ■ proud, handsome, dark-eyed girl not yet twenty, too proud to be on cordial terms with the daughters and sons of the other farmers ■ the district . . . When the worst came the old proverb that declares that pride always goes before a fall fitted in finely, and Dorothy was made to perceive how pleased her neighbours were to have the satisfaction of fitting it. She had never forgotten that.

Genevieve Bartholomew had never heard the history, but, as it has been said, she had reasons for believing that there was a history.

Of late the Bartholomews had known, as everybody else had known, that something very like a crisis was coming on ■ the Haggs. There had been five bad harvests in succession, cattle had been found dead in the fields, a horse that had fallen over the edge of a stone quarry on the moor had had to be shot, and the result of all this had been that Mr Damer, the agent for the Yarell Croft estate, had had to consent to take Miss Craven's rent by instalments. Further than this, it was known that she was wanting to sell one of her best milch cows, of course people said that this was in order to enable her to meet the tithes.

The confirmation of it all was there written on Dorothy's face. Her mouth had compressed itself till the droop at the corners was a settled thing, her colour was fading, leaving only a net work of fine red lines on her thin cheeks, her eyes looked out at you with strangely mingled expressions, pain, defiance, endurance, each came by turns. Had there been a little weariness mingled with these of late, Genevieve asked herself? A little wonder if anywhere in the world there might be compassion?

One fine February day Genevieve set out for a walk, she would go up to the moor, she said to herself, and she would call at the Haggs on her way. She had not seen Miss Craven for some days, and the last night of her had not been reassuring. There had been signs plain enough to be seen, but not easy of comprehension.

There was not much promise of spring anywhere. A few pale snowdrops stood with folded petals in the garden, some hily bulbs were thrusting up strong green leaves, there was a thrush singing in the boughs of the ash-tree by the stile.

Genevieve went upward in the sunshine as lightly as a bird. There were a few daisies by the road-side, a young oak-tree had some red crisp leaves on it, last year's leaves. A man was coming round by the bramble brake, whistling "Barbara Allen," looking hot and angry, swinging his arms about.

"Eh, it's you then, Miss Bartholomew, is it?" shouted Mr. Crudas, his grey whiskers seeming to stand out on either side of his keen red face a little more fiercely than usual. "You'll be going up to see Miss Dorothy, Ah reckon? Well, I hope she'll be civil to you. It's more than she's been to me. Ay, it's more than she's been to me for many a year back. But I hev'n't given up hopin' yet, an' what's more Ah don't mean to give up. You can tell her that if she gives you a chance o' speakin'."

Genevieve could only guess what it was that Mr. Crudas was determined to hope for so persistently. Perhaps she looked rather perplexed.

"Ah'll nut keep va stannin', miss," said Ishmael, with polite thoughtfulness. "Ah'll turn about, an' walk up t' hill a bit, Ah can say what Ah want to say better, so . . . Ah've thought many a time 'at mebbe you could put things afore Dorothy in a different way fra what Ah can put 'em. Ya'll know all about it, Ah reckon?"

"I don't know anything about it," said Genevieve. "I cannot even guess what should make Miss Craven ungracious to you. I fancied—well, I fancied you were old friends!"

"Friends! It doesn't seem to me so very many years sen we were lovers—just on t' point o' bein' married! 'Tis a good but too Dorothy was only turned o' nineteen, an' Ah was but just thirty. All t' county side knew on it, for there was money a better-like, an' better ■ do chap nor me would ha' married Dorothy Craven if she'd given 'em a chance. Not but what we were well anuff off, my father and me, an' them 'at said we'd gettin' t' but we had w' smugglin' tell'd a lee—beggin' yer pardon, miss. Ah might ha' said a lie, as Ah's talkin' t'iv a lady!"

"Smuggling! But was there smuggling in this neighbourhood so recently as that?"

"Ay, an' not a little neither, an' Ah'll nut say but what Ah knew more about it nor Ah sud ha' done. An' Ah'll nut lay t' blame o' them 'at is dead neither, for when a man's gettin' on for thirty years of sage he's oad aneaf to know right fra wrang. An' Ah knew it was wrang all t' time, an' for that reason Ah never meddled w' no't o' t' sort, but when Ah couldn't fairly help myself. An' Ah couldn't help myself that next, an'

Dorothy knew that ■ weel as Ah did, an' if she'd had mair puty an' less pride she'd ha' had an easier life nor she hes had. An' it's as much for her sake as my own 'at Ah want her to go away ■ last. But she's as stiff as a stoan—ay, as stiff as ■ stoan in a wall, she's been fra that day ■ this."

"Then she thinks that you were to blame?" asked Genevieve, knowing that she must be well up in her case before she undertook to plead with Miss Craven.

"Ay, an' she's right anuff there. Ah was to blame. But what could Ah do? We were goun' to hev a bit of a spree at Swarth-cliff Top—we'd allus had a spree o' my bithday—an' poor old father, he kept it up to the last. An' that year 'at Ah's talkin' on he'd set down to goa to Blakehouse Bay ■ day afore, an' just ■ few hours afore he sud ha' started he was ta'en bad all of a sudden w' rheumatics, an' Ah was forced ■ goa r'stead. Ah wasn't nut to say eager to goa, but goa Ah did, an' got my two tubs o' Hollands—two stann sized tubs they were, an' Ah slung 'em one on either side o' t' oad galloway, an' kept 'em partly covered w' t' skirts o' my father's great coat. Of course Ah didn't start fra t' Bay till t' was darkish, an' when Ah gat te t' toon, 'twas as dark as onybody could wish. But as bad luck wul ha' t, t' bridge was open for a ship to go through, an' she'd stuck i' the bridge way, an' there was a gay few folks waitin' to be across, an' Ah was about i' t' middle o' t' crowd afore Ah saw 'at there was one. Ah durstn't turn back then for fear o' raisin' suspicion, an' Ah durstn't stand still for fear 'at folks wud see t' tubs. Ah was in a delp pest takin' for awhile, when all of a sudden Ah bethowt me to use my spurs a bit, and mak' t' oad galloway rear. 'I was almost laughable to see t' folks flyin' back, an' Ah was left i' peace a bit. But t' crowd scan closed in again, one pressin' behind another to get ower t' bridge as scan as t' was shut, an' I had to keep usin' my spurs ivry noo an' then. Another minute an' Ah sud ha' been saafe, when up comes a man out of a dark corner. 'Let us have a look at those kegs, my friend!' he said, in a sort of a mincin', south country tongue. An' Ah knew 'twas ■ up w' ma then. He was one o' t' coast guard, an' there was mair on 'em behind, an' folks com' clustern' round like bees round a buzzle . . . Well, the up-shot was 'at Ah didn't see Swarth-cliff Top i' a mair, well, t' next winter. My poor old father had been buried just a week when I got home. An' fra that day to this Dorothy said, looking out with weary eyes across to where the sail-studded sea was gleaming "I don't know how it is. I feel as if years ago I'd passed beyond the point where giving way was possible. I've hardened myself till I couldn't yield if I would, an' if I did it seems as if life would be as bitter as gall when I'd done it."

"And yet—yet you said just now that you do still care for Mr. Cruda?"

"Care! Some day you'll know what such care'n' means, if you don't now," said Miss Craven, catching the sudden pink flush as it rose to Genevieve's cheeks. . . . "But no, you don't know what it is you're speakin' of, no more does he. He never knew that I'd all my weddin' clothes lyin' ready, down to the last thing. I was young, an' eager, an' over sure o' things, an' I made all ready as if there weren't no chance o' nothin' happenin'. Think of it, o' my weddin' gown an' bonnet lyin' locked away out o' sight ever since afore you were born! The day had been settled on, everybody knew it, an' when it came, an' him 'r' jerson, I felt as if I'd be glad to know 'at never another day 'ud break for me."

For Dorothy it was as if it were all happenin' over again as she stood there, it came back so vividly, so full of strong pain, and even Genevieve felt as if it were hard to realise that the whole of her life, and more, was lying between.

"You say you promised that you would say a word or two for him," Miss Craven went on, "but I don't think you'll say much 'at I haven't said to myself. I've had time enough. All the best o' my days has gone 'r' sorrow—they're gone! If I marry him now will they come back again? Could I ever be young again as I was then, an' full o' hope an' happiness? . . . Happiness! I've forgotten what it's like. I've forgotten what everything's like but loneliness, an' hard work, an' dread o' ruin'. Do you think I could forget these things now, an' take up my life again where he broke it off? If I could forget, then I might forgive, but I don't feel like forgettin', nor forgivin' neither. I've known what it was to feel a good deal more like goin' mad w' tryin'."

"Is that your greatest difficulty—that you can't forgive?" asked Genevieve sympathetically. "Do you know I think I can understand that. I have always felt as if forgiveness of a person who had actually and wilfully wronged another was one of the very hardest virtues that a human being could be called upon to practise. But then, the kind of wrong that I think I could not forgive must have been done deliberately, and out of malice prepense. This wrong that was done to you was not like that; there was no thought of wronging you at all. And surely it has been repented of? I think I could never help forgiving a person who repented, who was but ever so little sorry for having done me harm!"

"Well, wait till you've tried! I hope that'll never be; but if it is think o' what I've told you to-day. Do you think I wouldn't forgive if I could? Do you think I like livin' out all my days full o' sourness, an' bitterness, an' hardness toward all the world? Do you think I wouldn't like to be as you are—gentle, an' pleasant spoken, an' kind to everybody? . . . Sometimes I've hated to look at you, because you were so young, an' free from trouble, an' had such an easy, light-some sort o' life. The contrast was brought over near. But don't go dwellin' o' that. It's past. I'm glad you came to day; I'm glad there's one to understand a little. There's been nobody to care. I've never said as much to any human soul as I've said to you."

"You will not repent having said it!"

"Yes, I shall. I shall be wick wi' myself for a bit. Then I shall be glad, maybe."

"And after that?"

"After that it'll all be as it was agone."

"Then I have made no impression whatever?"

Miss Dorothy hesitated a moment, then she smiled a little—a strangely sweet smile for so sad a woman.

"It won't do Ishmael Crudas no harm my knowin' 'at you take his part. Nobody never took as afore to me."

"I cannot help it. I cannot but feel sorry for him because of his long repentance, of his keen desire to make up for the ill that was done. Has his patience never touched you at all, not even a little?"

"He's been more than patient," Miss Craven admitted. "He's done me many a good turn 'at I've only found out after from others, an' he's borne more frae me than I ever thought any man would ha' borne from a woman. An' I've seen all that, an' more, plain enough. But if ever I've had a thought o' relentin' I've had ten o' bitterness an' desire for revenge to make up for it. . . . But I haven't felt so vengeful lately. I've been over much broken down w' other things. An' that's what folks 'ud say if I was to give in now. I should be a laughing-stock for the country-side. It 'ud be said 'at

"I had to go to Swarthcliff Top to save myself fra havin' ■ go to the workhouse."

Genevieve sighed. It was very perplexing to her inexperience to find what a strong reserve of motive Miss Craven had accumulated; still she had an instinctive feeling that some of the arguments were being brought forth in the hope that they might be met, that they might be overthrown ■ the meeting. Genevieve did her best. She expressed amazement at the idea that any one should care for the gossip of "the country sile," and she almost surprised herself by her own boldness in daring to suggest that Miss Craven had strengthened herself in her pride until pride ruled as her master—but she did dare. "Is not that the root of all your bitterness?" she said, speaking gently and pleadingly. "Is not that the secret of your inability to yield? . . . You must forgive me if I say anything I ought not to say. Think that I am your sister; and let me speak as a sister might; let me try ■ show you what I think I see. It seems to me that if one can see rightly where a hindrance or a difficulty lies, it is so much easier to get over it. And I do want you to get over this difficulty. I do want to know that you are not intending to go on darkening the days that might be so bright, so different for yourself, and for another. And why is it all? What is the real strait through which you cannot pass? What ■ it but a feeling that you can neither define, nor defend?"

Miss Dorothy listened in silence, but it was easy to see that it was not offended silence. No, there was no offence in it, but only pain, only a keen sense of isolation. The heart knoweth its own bitterness, and no other heart can know it. This is true always, but more sadly is it true when the sorrow is one that has linked itself with the years, woven itself with the life, coloured every thought, darkened every joy, and embittered every grief. How should this girl understand? How should she be able to go back over such a life, ■ enter into its fine mesh of misery, its coarse humiliations, to have sympathy with its calm despairs, its wild unrests, its ceaseless longings for some reparation that should be as great as the suffering had been? If Miss Craven had a favourite passage in the Bible it was certainly that passage of the grand Psalm of Moses, wherein he prays for adequate compensation. "Comfort us again now after the time that Thou hast plagued us, and for the years wherein we have suffered adversity."

not carry with her much sense of assurance. No word had been said that could ■ construed as a word of actual concession. Yet surely Ishmael Crudas had some ground for his hoping; surely he had seen, as Genevieve had seen, that there was, unsuspected perhaps by Miss Craven herself, a tremulous wavering or emotion, a balancing of thought, a sense of fainting under the strife, betokening anything rather than a continuance of stern unyieldingness.

How could it be that such unyieldingness had been possible so long? Genevieve wondered over ■ as she walked up the Ravengates towards the moor. She would just go up there and watch the sun sink down into the far distance. ■ was worth while walking a long way to see that, ■ watch the warm purple of the moor quivering into the haze of pale daffodil yellow that hung across the west. The sun was only a little way from the horizon now. The fuzzy hillocks all about caught the lingering light, kept it awhile, then it faded slowly, tenderly away. It was like watching a friend who was saying "good-bye," saying it so gracefully that sorrow lost itself in adoration.

But no, it was not "good bye" that the friend was saying, it was "good evening" Genevieve had heard this step, and recognised it even before she turned. Her face flushed with a sudden crimson as George Kirkoswald took her hand in his, and held it for a moment, with a strong, warm clasp. They were silent save for the word that the one glance said.

There are always some moments in the one true love of a lifetime that are to be remembered when other moments are forgotten. They have no equal in them, there is nothing to be described unless you could describe the stillness of them. They are not moments of hopefulness, nor do they hold the fruition of hope, they hold nothing—nothing but the still, sweet sense of the sureness of all things—all things worth knowing, or being, or having, so far as this life ■ concerned.

"I have been down to Netherbank," said Kirkoswald, breaking the silence at last, "and I also called ■ Hunsgarth Haggas, in the hope of finding you there."

"Did Miss Craven tell you that I had come up to the moor?"

"Yes. Poor Miss Craven! Did you leave her in tears?"

"In tears! No, but very sorrowful. She is in trouble, and I am troubled for her. I was thinking of her when you came, wondering if one could do anything to relieve her mind but a little from the terrible strain of responsibility. . . . Do you know what her life has been?"

"I have heard something of it—only lately. It is a sad history altogether; but one cannot help being struck by her bravery, I mean with regard to the farm, by her splendid perseverance. As for the other matter, well, perhaps I admire her less there. But, then, I do not understand, perhaps I do not know the truth. Do you know it? Do you think she ever really cared for Crudas?"

"She has cared always—she cares still. I think ■■■ grander than all else in her that her love has never changed—never wavered. She might have been married many times—my father told me that—but she has never cared except for this one man, who has made all the best of her life to be one long sorrow. . . . I think ■■■ is beautiful!"

"Yes, it is beautiful!" said Kirkoswald, looking into Genevieve's face, and seeing there the deep interest, the keen animation that awoke there always to the lightest human touch. "It is beautiful," he said again. "I think love is always beautiful!"

"If it be true," said Genevieve, watching the descending sun and the deepening yellow haze. The two were still standing by the edge of the furze brake where they had met.

"Yes, if it be true," repeated Kirkoswald, a sudden inquiry leaping, so ■■■ speak, into his eyes. "What made you say that?" he asked in a low tone that had concern in it.

Genevieve smiled at his seriousness. "I said it because we were speaking of love that ■■■ beautiful; and it seems to me that its whole beauty lies in its truthfulness—in its unchanging truthfulness."

George Kirkoswald remained silent awhile. Lately he had been conscious of unrest—of dread. This great and growing love that was dominating him so utterly could hardly be said to have sole possession of his faculties. There was room for fear—fear for the effect of disclosure and confession. How could one so simple minded, so noble in intent, so direct in aim as Genevieve understand a blind swerving, an almost inexcusable self-delusion, and all that had followed upon such a delusion? And if she should not understand, what then? Would she have pity? Would she condemn? Would her love shrink back in disesteem?

Kirkoswald had made up his mind that he would confess that long-past mistake of his before he urged his love, and the resolution was a hindrance in his path already. The confession would be so hard to make. Had not the word that had just now been said made it even harder?

"I suppose," he began after a time, "that you could never understand that there might be two kinds of love?"

"Yes," replied Genevieve, "I think I could. I think I could see that there might be a false love and a true."

"And what should you think of a man who had been betrayed, so to speak, into a love that was not true?"

"I should say that he had betrayed himself!"

"And you would hold him in contempt?"

"Not without knowing something of the circumstances," said Genevieve in her gentle, serious way. Was there anything like a suspicion dawning across her mind, a suspicion that George's earnestness had a personal motive behind it? Be that as it might, she had made an opportunity. Here, if anywhere, was an opening for Kirkoswald to speak. Never could any moment more favourable than this await him. The very word had been said that could more than any other word charm out from his heart that hidden thing that lay coiled there like a snake, certain to spring sooner or later, unless it should be drawn out by some sweet note of human music. That note had been sounded, but the lip that should have moved to its sounding remained closed. There was a pause, and the sun dropped down behind the moor, putting an end to the day, and marking the oncoming of the long, drear night.

Stay from blaming Kirkoswald. The strongest men have moments of weakness, of failure of insight, and it must be that some such moments are fatal.

He could not have told you; not then, nor later, what it was that had held him from this thing that he had required of himself. He had decreed that it should be done, and he was not given ■■■ the making of vain decrees. Perhaps ■■■ was the unexpectedness of the opportunity; or ■■■ might be that the moment was too sweet to be rudely broken in upon without consideration as to the manner of doing it. There was no point at which he had said, "I will not do ■■■ now." He had waited, overmastered by his own emotion even as he did so, for some impulse to compel him to his task; but there had been no movement strong enough to be called an impulse. His sole satisfaction afterwards lay in the fact that he had not made resistance, there had been nothing ■■■ resisted.

There was no idea in his mind then that the moment had been decisive in any way.

There would be other opportunities; and he would be better prepared, more on the alert to take advantage of them. It was less easy to talk seriously now that they were going down the rugged Ravensgate. They went silently for the most part, silently happy, silently certain of happiness to be.

"You are not to brood too intently over Miss Craven's troubles," said George as they stopped at the stile to exchange a parting word. He spoke with all the tender inhoritativeness that Genevieve loved so much to hear. "If you will promise me that, I will promise to think the matter over myself," he added.

"Ah! then you are thinking of something already," Genevieve exclaimed, turning her face to his with delight written on every feature. "You see you're glim of hope, or you would not speak so."

"I see some very brilliant gleams of hope," said Kukulswild, speaking, with a quiet yet ardent eagerness, and taking Genevieve's hand in his as he spoke, he held it there in his strong grasp. "The whole world is radiant with hope to me now," he exclaimed, "and it is such a radiance as I have never seen before, nor dreamed of. . . . Heaven keep it unclouded!"

He used Genevieve's hand, pressing the small white wrist with a passionate respectfulness to his lips for one moment, then, with a glance that paled eloquently for passion he turned away.

For an instant it seemed cruel that he should go—stronger that he should be so equal to the pun of parting. But it was only for an instant. The echo of his footsteps died softly into the distance, the silver tune came out overhead, the enchantment of still, sweet restfulness came down through the twilight. It was an enchantment that did not depart with the twilight, it stayed, and dwelt under the thickened roof, over which the darkness was clustering and mauling the life lived there one to the act of fervent gratitude.

GEOLOGY IN GREENLAND.

By DR. DUNDAS OF ARGYLL.

THE article recently published in this magazine by Mr. Whymper, entitled "Explorations in Greenland," is a most interesting contribution to our knowledge of facts which are of the highest scientific interest. In some points of view there is no one well-defined part of the earth's surface more curious than Greenland. In the first place let us observe its enormous extent. Look at it on any general map of the world, and it will be seen to occupy a far larger space than many of the areas of continental importance in geography, and of corresponding importance in human history. It is far larger than the whole of British India, with its population of 250,000,000. It is at least 1,380 miles long from the southern point (Cape Foully) to the farthest point of the northern coast hitherto explored. At the broadest part it is nearly 700 miles across from sea to sea, and its whole area is not less than about 320,000 square miles. By far the largest part of it is within the Arctic circle, and its north-western point is the most northerly land which has been seen by the human eye, the nearest to this great object of laborious and abortive efforts, the North Pole. It is this extreme northerly position which, coupled with other facts, gives to it its great scientific interest. We are accustomed to associate this geographical position with extreme cold. But the rocks of Greenland tell us that, although this is the case now, it was not the case in some former ages, and consequently that there is no necessary connection between an extremely low temperature and a position near the Pole. They tell us, in short, that this association is purely temporary and accidental. It is striking and curious enough to find, in the bleak heathlands of the Isle of Mull, on our own coast, the leaves of an abundant forest vegetation—the large leaves of the plane tree, the ever-green needles of the yew, and of the pine, and mixed with these the frond-like leaves of the tree called by botanists "Salsburg," which is now an inhabitant of Japan. But the curiosity of this contrast between the present and the past, as regards climatal conditions, is nothing like the still greater contrast in this matter which is presented by finding the same fossil flora in the rocks of Greenland—rocks whose surfaces are now almost wholly bare of vegetation, and all the higher elevations of which are covered with eternal ice and snow. And yet even this contrast is not the contrast highest in degree which the rocks of Greenland present. The Miocene Flora, to which those leaf beds belong, is a very old Flora now, but there is another Flora much older, which we have never seen in life, and which, from its nearest living analogues, we are accustomed to think must have been associated with almost a torrid and stormy atmosphere. This is the Flora of the Coal measures. Yet the Flora, too, in London and the Miocene has certainly flourished on the area which is now occupied by Greenland. It is needless to point out what curious questions these facts raise. How came this great change of temperature? How could such warmth be maintained in so high a latitude? How could such plants flourish, even if the climate were as temperate as it is now, even if then as now, there were nine months of arctic cold and darkness and only three months of a little warmth and light? Or is it that we are all puzzling ourselves on a false assumption—that the pole of the earth's rotation has always been where it is now, whereas in reality, it has changed, and Greenland was really at one time as far from the pole as California or Japan are distant from it now? Or is it that temperature is the only real difficulty, and that there is no difficulty at all—because plants will flourish even in prolonged darkness provided the temperature be maintained at a sufficient elevation? All these questions, and many more arise out of the facts, and probably it may be said with truth that not one of them has been solved conclusively. The mathematicians, indeed, come in with their calculations and tell us that on physical data the hypothesis of a change in the axis of the earth's rotation must be dismissed as impossible. It is a comfort to have any one point in so many problems dealt with by methods capable of demonstration, and though the majority of us may have no conception of the process by which such a proof is arrived at, we may be well content when such authorities as Sir William Thomson and Mr. George Darwin tell us that "the rotation which the earth revolves must be a 'principal axis of inertia,' and that as such it cannot have been disturbed without 'such enormous transposition of matter on the earth's surface, or else such distortions of the whole solid mass,' as would prevent far greater difficulties of another kind than those with which we have actually to deal." I using the theory of any possible change in the position of the pole, we are driven back to other explanations of the change of temperature, and we are obliged to conclude that long darkness is a condition perfectly compatible with the growth of forests which now only flourish when the days and nights are more nearly equal throughout the year.

But these curious questions raised by the condition of Greenland in the past are not the questions to which I desire to direct attention in the present paper. Our questions are not so curious and interesting as are raised by its condition now, and the interest in these questions lies in this—that they have a direct and immediate bearing on certain favourite theories as to the physical conditions of the whole of Northern Europe in what is called the Glacial Age.

One of these theories is that during the Glacial Age there was what is called an "ice cap" seen in every map called an "ice sheet," which lay heavily upon the whole northern regions of the globe, and was of such immense area and dimensions that it occupied and filled up a great part of the Northern Ocean, and flowed southward like a mighty glacier, entirely covering or submerging all the mountains of Scotland, and of England, and of Wales.

I have always been an unbeliever in this theory because of two great objections. The first is that there is no proof whatever that such masses of ice, mountain high, ever existed. The second is that if such masses of ice had ever existed they never could have moved or acted as the theory is supposed them to have done.

As regards the former of the two great objections I shall say nothing here, it is because Greenland throws no light upon it and secondly because the geological monuments upon which the objection is founded are too technical and detailed to suit the purposes of a popular magazine.

But the second of the objections above specified can I think, be easily explained so as to be understood by those who are not professed geologists, and what, at the same time, a very important part of the argument is much confirmed by the fact described by Mr. Whymper and others in respect to the physical conditions now presented by Greenland and its adjacent seas.

My proposition is simply this, that great masses of ice lying upon any surface up to approximately level, still more such masses of ice lying in vast hollows—depressions such as the bed of the German Ocean—would not have any proper motion of their own such as is ascribed to the supposed ice sheet, and in particular that it would not "flow" as an ordinary glacier flows.

* See Paper by Sir W. Thomson in the Transactions of the Geol. Soc. of Glasgow, Feb. 22, 1877.

We all know that the causes of the motion in ordinary glaciers have been the subject of investigation and of much discussion among Physicists for a long period of years. De Saussure and Agassiz among foreigners, and the late Principal J. D. Forbes of St. Andrews, were among the most distinguished observers. Substantially, there is only one explanation. A glacier "flows" down its bed with some distant resemblance to a river. It flows more rapidly in the middle than on its two sides. The principal moving force is simply gravitation. The retarding force is friction along the bottom and along the sides. Some of the effect may be due to what has been called "distention"—the alternate swelling and contractions which accompany partial meltings and partial regelation. But as the advance is always downwards, it is clear that gravitation is the force which ultimately profits by every ancillary cause of movement. Almost all glaciers are gathered on steep mountain-sides. Down these sides they tend to fall, and although their own cohesiveness is considerable, and the friction must be tremendous, yet on the whole the glacier on the great scale acts as a plastic, or semi-liquid body, and as long as it is fed by the pressure and accretion of fresh snow from above, it continues to fall slowly but steadily down hill, until at last it reaches a level, where its own waste by melting is greater than its protrusion and growth from above, and there it terminates.

Now, in the "ice sheet" theory, it is assumed that masses of ice would always have a similar motion, whether they had a hill side to tumble down or not. It is assumed, further, that masses of ice on a much greater scale than any glacier of the European Alps, would not only move over level ground as they move down steep declivities, but that they would be so instinct with motion, and be possessed with such immense momentum, that they would not only move over plains, but ascend opposing slopes and climb up mountains from 2,000 to 4,000 feet. The idea seems to be, that ice under such conditions would "flow" almost as water flows in a pipe—or dash up as water does in a basin when it is poured in at one side, and runs over at the other. Such an explanation has actually been suggested to me by an ingenious and Glacial friend. I am not, indeed, prepared to deny that ice may be forced up against an opposing surface by some great pressure from behind. The pressure of the tides and currents of the sea has this effect on no inconsiderable scale with the floating masses of thick ice which are driven hither and thither on the Palæocystic Sea—as the Polar Ocean was called by our last explorers. By this means, effects of great power in the grinding, abrading, and polishing of rocks are produced along the shores of all the Polar Seas. I am, indeed, satisfied, that to action of this kind we must really attribute most of the effects upon our land surfaces which are usually ascribed to the land ice of the ice sheet, because as we know from other evidence that our mountains have been submerged to a great depth during some part of the Glacial age, it is certain that floe, or floating ice, would be brought into action at all levels in succession during the process of sinking and of rising again, or, perhaps, during both of these stages. But when we consider the theory that land ice has been impelled over our hills from lower levels without the intervention of water currents, we are compelled to ask what other kind of pressure can be invoked for the movement of mountains of ice up the sides and over the tops of mountains of rock? In reply to this question, the only answer we ever get is a reference to the action of glaciers. The action of the ice sheet is said to have been like their action, only on an enormously greater scale. Now this is precisely the question on which the condition of Greenland throws an important light. Here we have an ice sheet of enormous magnitude in respect to area. We have, too, this ice sheet resting upon a highly inclined land surface, so that, unlike the theoretical ice sheet which lay in hollows like the German Ocean, this Greenland ice sheet has all the advantages which gravitation can give to it in making it "flow" outward from the immense reservoirs of its thousands of square miles of snow-fall. Surely here, if anywhere in the world, we may expect to find proofs of the moving powers of an ice sheet—pressing outwards on all sides, and overflowing for great distances any opposing hills, and even invading the bed of the adjacent seas.

Now, instead of this result, which might go some little way to justify the theory, we find a set of facts which are wholly different. So far as the vast ice sheet of Greenland is overflowing the whole of the land area of that country, that it fails even to reach the coast except at particular spots where it comes down valleys, and appears as true glaciers terminating sometimes in the valleys themselves, sometimes in a field or arm of the sea. So inadequate is the motion of this immense continental mass of ice to carry it any distance beyond the subjacent slopes, that all round the West Coast of Greenland there is a margin more or less broad of country which is free from the ice-sheet, and is called by the Danish settlers "The Outskurts." Hills of comparatively low elevation in that region of country are free from the invasion of the ice sheet, and even far within the margin of the ice sheet itself, there is, at least, one solitary peak of about 5,000 feet, which that sheet is unable to overflow. And yet just let us try to conceive what that ice-sheet is. Mr. Whymper and Baron Nordenskiöld have both described it, and I think it must be one of the most impressive sights of our planet. When one of its terminal glaciers has been scaled, and the human foot is fairly planted upon the ice sheet, it is seen rising to the most distant horizon in one smooth unbroken slope of spotless snow. No man can know the maximum elevation to which it reaches, nor the distance to which it stretches. There is nothing to mark distance on that unscathed surface. It is open to the silent heavens, and receives upon its trackless surface, nothing but the cosmic dust of meteors.

If now we turn our faces the other way, and look at the sea which divides this enormous continent of ice from other lands, we find that on the west it is separated from the islands lying to the northward of the American continent by a channel nowhere broad as compared with the breadth of Greenland, but narrowing rapidly as we follow it northwards through Smith Sound and Robinson Channel, until at one point it is less than twenty miles across. Yet this narrow channel, which, as compared with the breadth of the Greenland ice sheet, may be said to be a mere ditch, is quite broad enough to constitute a complete barrier between it and the opposite shores of Grinnell Land. The ice sheet sends out into these straits and channels its broken fragments in the form of icebergs, which float away southwards, or become entangled in the intricacies of the coast. But the ice sheet itself does not occupy or even invade the channel. It is confined strictly to the land of its birth, it is just able, at certain points, to creep sluggishly to its shores, and along hundreds of miles of coast, it is not competent to effect even this short excursion from the hills which it buries in its embrace.

It is indeed true that we do not know what proportions, as to height or depth, the hills and the ice sheet of Greenland bear to each other. We do not know the maximum elevation of the surface. But Baron Nordenskiöld has mounted it at an elevation exceeding 6,000 feet, and it still rose before him to distant sky lines of loftier height. It is probable, therefore, that the buried mountains rise higher and higher towards the interior. Mr. Whymper estimates it at not less than 10,000 feet. If this mountain slope were indeed unbroken in its own surface, it would represent conditions under which the upper ice sheet would tend to "flow" most easily, and with a tremendous and accumulating pressure upon the lower portion of the ice. If, therefore, we were to assume such a land surface, it would indeed be an extraordinary proof of the low moving power of ice even under the most favourable conditions. But I do not make this assumption. I think it probable that the buried hills of Greenland are more or less undulating, or more or less broken by glens and hollows. Every one of these hollows represents at least one surface which opposes a high resistance to any movement of the ice sheet, at least in its lower strata, and the general result is that the vast ice sheet of Greenland is wholly unable to overcome the resistance so presented to its passage to the sea, except where valleys happen to lie in the direction of its movement, and down those it is just able to creep, and to show itself at a few points upon the coast, where these valleys happen to break its line of hills.

It so happens, indeed, that we have a detailed and most graphic account of the nature and behaviour of the Greenland ice sheet very near the highest latitude attained by man. This account will be found in the appendix to the second volume of Sir George Nares's "Voyage to the Polar Sea." One of his officers was sent in the month of May to examine a great inlet of the sea, called "Peterman's Fiord," in latitude about $78^{\circ} 5' N$. This great inlet, which stretches as far as the eye can reach into the interior of Greenland, in a direction S. E. by N. W., is occupied in its upper portion by an enormous glacier. The two sides of the fiord are formed by precipitous cliffs of limestone, from 1,000 to 1,100 feet high, and on the top of the cliff is seen in section the true ice sheet, properly so called, by which I mean the ice sheet, not as it is consolidated in the hollows into glaciers, but as it lies more thinly on all the mountain slopes. Moreover, the top of these cliffs is merely the coast termination of great masses of mountain land which rise to the height of 6,000 feet at no great distance from the coast, so that from the top of the slope, to the crest of the cliff there is a gradient of some 500 feet. Here then we have all the conditions under which the behaviour of the Greenland ice can be imagined—in the glacier one sees the belt of the field, and coming from a very distinct elevation, we have the motion of a true glacier whilst in the ice-sheet on the top of the cliffs, we have the motion of the universal Greenland mantle fulling down a much steeper descent. And what do we find? We find first the great Fiuma glacier as it is called by the natives of an arctic inland sea-lake with its front on the continuous ice-sheet on the top of the cliffs—supposed to have been about forty feet thick and extending of the surface at the characteristic blue-green colour, we perpetually having it close pushed over the piece by which the motion behind, and was all day long washing down the various lanches on the top of the hill how many fragments of rock upon them and projecting the same sometimes to the distance of many yards from the bottom of the cliffs. It is very remarkable that in so high a latitude and on mountainous elevations of so great a height the great Greenland ice-sheet should have been so different from its sister sheet. But this fact is very well met by our supposition as to the thickness of it which can alone be relied upon as having probably occupied the spaces of our own ice until during the Glacial epoch. At all events, the phenomenon of the ice-sheet is then explained on this theory as even the extent and mass do not fit in any manner with distances from mountains from which they come, in the ice-sheet is easily met by friction—by my objection it is met whilst on the other hand they fully confirm the opinion that the ice-sheet is not a mere glacial climatic, and even on high mountains—those elements, the only one done by glaciation is none by any means the mass of ice lying upon, and under, does, except mountain surfaces.

On the whole, then, the evidence supplied by the condition of Greenland is strongly in favour of the supposition that ice sheets have on level surface of the earth, or still more in the hollows of the sea, would have any tendency to flow or such as slowly as glaciers may be said to flow, and that there is no known cause of motion which could possibly drive them over rough and adverse slope.

Passing, then, from this question to another of great interest it seems to me that the facts connected with Greenland throw great doubt upon, indeed they do not altogether disprove, another theory, which is comparatively new, but which seems to be becoming popular among the speculations of geology. That theory is, that the crust of the earth is so sensitive to pressure as to be almost like an iron or leaden cylinder, and to be liable to sink with the slightest addition of weight applied to any portion of its surface. This theory is invoked to account for the accumulation of delta deposits at the mouths of great rivers—each layer of deposit sinking of the surface on which it fell, and thus by a multiplication of layers and a multiplication of sinkings forming at last hills of such depth and thickness as are found at the mouths of the Mississippi and the Nile. On a much smaller scale the same theory is invoked to account for the great subsidence of the land which is all geologists are now beginning to admit was an accompaniment of part of the Glacial epoch. It was the ice-sheet which sank it by the mere effect of weight. It is so remarkably attractive in this theory—it is so simple, and would account at least for so many facts. But here again Greenland is a great obstacle. The whole coast of Greenland, for many hundred miles covered as it is by an enormous ice-sheet is not sinking, but rising, and rising too, apparently, at a rapid rate. It is true that another part of the same coast is sinking, and the opposite movement, and sinking. But, unfortunately for the theory, it is the northern half of Greenland—that which is so remarkably most loaded with ice which is rising. The axis of these two opposite movements—the hinge point on which the land on which they turn—has some where it is but the 77th degree of latitude. A most interesting and graphic account of the appearances which prove these movements on the Greenland coast will be found in Dr. James' "Account of the Second Grinnell Expedition in search of Sir J. Franklin, in the years 1853-55" (London, 1866).

It is evident that we do not know the real causes of these secular movements of the earth's crust. It is best to confess our total ignorance. All that we gather recently from the facts, that we are constantly in the presence of forces which are capable of producing in comparatively short periods the most enormous changes in the dis-

In these days, however, we do not cross the North Sea as our forefathers did in Viking ships, but in swift and comfortable steamers of 800 or 1,000 tons' burden.

■ may seem curious that our passenger steamers have not yet found out the shortest route between Great Britain and Norway. The usual routes are from Hull to Christiania, from Hull to Bergen, and from Leith to Christiansand. The distance from Hull to Christiania is 600 miles, and the voyage occupies 56 hours. The distance from Leith to Christiansand is about 450 miles, and from the latter place to Christiania is 150 miles more.

But the seaports nearest to each other on the opposite shores of the North Sea are Fraserburgh and Stavanger. The distance is only 300 miles, and the voyage could be made easily in a single day. If Aberdeen were considered a more convenient port for embarkation on this side, ■ would not make a difference of more than one or two hours. If that route were adopted by a line of swift and well-appointed steamers, it cannot be doubted that the objection of nervous persons would be in a great measure overcome, and that the tourist traffic to Norway would be greatly increased. The difficulty that stands in the way of this route being adopted, of course, is that ■ present the passenger traffic is subordinate to the goods traffic, and that for the latter Leith and Hull are more convenient than more remote ports like Fraser-burgh and Aberdeen. Nevertheless, it may be worth the while of steamboat proprietors and speculators to consider whether they cannot in some way combine their own interests with those of the travelling public.

As for travelling in Norway, after the initial difficulty of crossing the North Sea has been overcome, its discomforts are as nothing in comparison with the pleasure it gives. Threading the maze of islands and penetrating the fjords of the West Coast ■ the small coasting steamers that ply regularly between Christiansand and Bergen, and between Bergen and Trondhjem, is delightful ■ and even luxurious travelling. It reduces the dolce far niente of touring to a system. You have no trouble, no cares which are not of your own making, no anxieties about baggage, or routes, or correspondences. You have committed yourself to a travelling hotel, which glides easily and comfortably from station to station. There is nothing ■ done but to give yourself up to the enjoyment of the constant and constantly varied succession of grand scenes through which you are carried hour after hour and day after day. You can read or write, you can eat and drink, or you can sleep and dream, as the spirit moves you. You can pass ■ pleasant hour in conversation with the captain or the mate; for the captains and the mates on these steamers as a rule speak English tolerably well, and are very intelligent fellows. When there ■ nothing more laborious to be done, you can be on deck with a cigar in your mouth and gaze upward, for that is the most convenient and most approved method of admiring the scenery of the narrow fjords, flanked by stupendous cliffs which are scented with picturesque waterfalls. At the many stations at which the steamer calls there is no lack of diversion. You see farming operations in progress. You see pleasant villages. You see boat-building going on. You see fishing and merchandise. Above all, you see the people of the country, and you have golden opportunities of observing their costumes and their manners and customs.

Travelling on land is not quite so luxurious, but it brings its own pleasures, it leads to new experiences, and it has its own trials. The tour may be pleasantly varied by quitting the steamer, and by crossing overland the peninsulas which separate the fjords. You may cross from the Eide on the Hardanger to Gudvangen on the Sogne Fjord, from Vadheim to Forde, or from Invik to Hellesylt, or vice versa in each case, and you may acquaint yourself thereby with the interior of the country, and with the pleasures and the pains of canoing. For my own part, I am bound to confess that I am not enamoured of the canoe, which is the typical conveyance of the country. The sensation of bowling along in "a one-horse chaise," with legs extended horizontally, is pleasant enough at first, but the attitude is apt to become tiresome, as well as painful in other respects which shall not be mentioned more particularly. The chief objection to canoing, however, is that it isolates the travellers. It is in fact the least sociable and the most selfish mode of locomotion that ever was invented. One of the greatest pleasures of travelling in company lies in the interchange of ideas and experiences, but if you wish to exchange comments with your companion in canoing, you must either shout to the detriment of your lungs, or call a halt for the purposes of conversation.

Then there is in canoing the inconvenience that you may be delayed provokingly at station after station, till fresh horses are procured. Knowing travellers send on a "forbid" to engage horses in advance, but that is not always effectual in preventing delays. The station masters are bound by law to be as obliging as they can be, but their powers in that regard are limited by their resources, and it is no uncommon occurrence that travellers have to wait two or three hours at a station till fresh horses are procured. I am bound to say, however, that the station houses in Norway, which are generally under government control, are now very well managed. Many of them have attained to the magnitude of hotels, and on the most frequented routes travellers have now very little to complain of.

It is not my intention, in these fragmentary papers, to inflict on my readers anything like a diary, or a detailed narrative of my tour in Norway during last summer. All that I shall attempt is to present them with a series of pictures of the most striking scenes that presented themselves in the course of my ramble, and that without giving much regard either to time or to place. In the first I shall begin with a reference to what is generally regarded as one of the chief attractions of a Norwegian tour, namely—

THE MIDNIGHT SUN

I may as well confess at the outset that I have not visited the North Cape, and therefore, I suppose, I cannot be said to have seen the midnight sun in person. I am quite satisfied, however, that one can get the full effect of continuous daylight without going much to the north than Trondhjem. The trip to the North Cape is one about which opinion differs greatly. It is in my view from with Norwegians was peak of it as being the finest excursion in Norway, not merely on account of the novelty of untrampled unsheltered days to be enjoyed, but quite as much on account of the splendour and grandeur of the coast and a kind of scenery through which the traveller is enabled for many days and nights to sail. On the other hand, most of the foreigners with whom I have conversed on the subject, and who have made the excursion, have expressed themselves as disappointed with it. They admit that the scenery is fine, but they complain that it is too rapidly the ordinary and of no very great interest. The excursion occupies ten to fifteen days, going and returning, and costs from £25 to £50 a head. They speak of the midnight sun as a delusion of a northern people, as the weather is so fine so often and so warm that no sun can be seen, and that the wretched little Lapps who live from it do not take the trouble to display their eyes and noses in the sun. I believe that the question of going or not should be determined solely by considerations of time. If the traveller has the time to give it his undivided attention by all means. If his time is limited he can occupy ten days or fifteen, in which the trip gives much more profitably in the fjords and valleys of the west coast.

Moreover, as I have said, a tour for you a safe and a practical purpose. You are on a voyage with parallel of north latitude—as far north as the south of Iceland. By making the voyage from Trondhjem to Mølle in favourable weather, you may practically see the midnight sun and also as much as necessary of the rock scenery of the coast. In June, the sun sets between ten and eleven, rises again before two, so that, though its orb is below the horizon for three or four hours, there is sun light all the while the night.

Such, at least, was my experience last June. In the far north we had streaks of clear, grey rose pink, orange, and purple, beneath which the sun suddenly dipped into the sea and went out of sight, but the glory of sun continued all night. The darkness of the dark hour was never greater than that of a summer evening in England. On deck we could read all night even the smallest type. The sea was smooth and clear as a mirror. All night long the sailing ships went on their course. All night long the seagulls and other birds, of which by the way there was much less in Norway, were flying over our heads, and the minutest object on shore could be distinctly seen. The effect was not due to the appearance of the moon, which was at the full, and just as the sun set in a warm glow in the north-west, the moon became prominent in the south-east, clear and cold and silvery.

As going to bed on such a night was out of the question, we remained on deck till sunrise, which came about two o'clock. As the sun appeared the glow in the north north-east became more intense. Suddenly the orb appeared in a niche formed by the intersection of two clouds, and sent out level rays which shone like a flood and the hull lay with you, bright.

Instantly, as the vapours on the rocky coast became condensed, a cold halo was formed around the orb, so that it seemed like the eye of a eagle looking out on the desert of waters. Deep and dark were the shadows cast by flying boat and rock. The hum of the rippling water was like that of midnight, and by the sun of clear of the horizon, rose hues like over the sky, and Nature rejoiced in the glories of a new day.

THE FJORDS.

No view in Norway is finer than that of Velhungenes with the Hornøi panorama behind it, as seen from Thorvik, on the northern bank of the Romsdal Fjord. The picturesque village of Velhungenes stands at the mouth of the river Rømm, on the seaward verge of an alluvial plain, which is surrounded by stupendous mountains rising perpendicularly from its sides to the height through which the river foams fretfully, now over the rocks, now under, now between them ■ ■ as if the giants had broken up a mountain and left the fragments in the valley.

The Romsdalen surpasses all the valleys I have seen in Norway, in respect of the number and the beauty of its waterfalls ■ ■ is, in fact, a dale of waterfalls. Their number is legion, and their variety ■ endless. Some are like silver threads striking the bare and dark coloured rocks. Some leap in masses from one ledge of rock ■ another. Some throw themselves from an immense height, and lose themselves in mist before they reach the ground. Some descend like showers of rockets bursting in spray. Highest of all is the Mongefos, a little way above Høghenn, in which a great mass of water leaps clear over a rock of fifteen hundred feet high. Very picturesque, too, is the triple Vermofos opposite Osmern, where the stream ■ broken up by intervening rocks into three separate cataracts, each of which would by itself make a striking object. But finest of all is the thundering Blettifos, about three miles farther up the valley, in which the whole volume of the Raumf rushes through a rocky gorge only a few feet wide, and seethes and foams in the natural caldron, which it has worn for itself in its solid bed. Though the height of the fall is not great, the effect of the tremendous rush of water is much grander, much more suggestive of relentless force, than that ■ commonplace cataracts, though hundreds of feet in height.

THE GEIRANGER FJORD.

The Geiranger Fjord is one of the branches of the Stor Fjord, near its head. Though small, ■ presents in a concentrated form all the most notable features of Norwegian scenery—steep and lofty cliffs rising abruptly from the water's edge, towering mountains, rushing waterfalls, dark ravines, dense and leafy woods. The fjord ■ one of the narrowest in Norway, and the rocky walls that flank it on both sides are steep, rising in many places sheer from the sea to a height of two thousand feet, with still loftier mountains in the background. The entrance to the fjord is guarded by two lofty headlands, and from these the fjord winds inland for twenty-five miles. On the north side, about half way up, there is a magnificent pile of rock, supported by massive buttresses, and surmounted by a bold horn which rises to the height of 5,500 feet. On the top of a prolonged ridge on the southern bank we see a deep layer of snow, the transverse section of which has the appearance of a wall fifty or sixty feet high. The echoes reverberating among these mountains, when the steam whistle sounds or when a gun is fired, are wonderful.

The walls of rock approach more closely, and become more precipitous and more picturesque, towards the head of the fjord. Here the wild grandeur is most impressive, and it is intensified by the grotesque profiles that stand out against the sky. The magnificence of nature is lavished in all directions. The waterfalls, which sweep over every ledge and fill every cove, add immensely to the charm of the scene. In some cases they are dissolved in spray before they reach the middle of the rock. Others appear to drop directly from the clouds, or to pour themselves forth from the overhanging mists. The finest of ■ is the group of falls called the Knyalaafossen, or the Seven Sisters, the streams of which cross and recross, separate and reunite many times, forming, when the water is abundant, an elaborate network of silver threads covering the whole face of a broad and dark precipice.

High up on the cliffs we see little gaards, or farm-houses, in positions in which it seems incredible that human beings can live. Some sixteen hundred feet up the cliff there is a grassy ledge not more than a hundred feet wide, and above ■ there ■ another cliff two thousand feet high. On this narrow ledge the hardy Norseman has built a log-hut for his family and a shed for his cattle. The farm can be reached only by a tortuous path, which goes zigzag up the bed of a roaring torrent. The supplies of the peasants must be carried painfully up this path, or must be drawn over the face of the cliff by ropes. When the parents go out ■ the hill to work, or descend to the shore to fish, they tether their young children with ropes, lest they should stray to the edge of the precipice and fall over. In these and in similar cases there is generally seen at the foot of the cliff a trim little boat-house with a skiff moored close by. It is as necessary that the Norwegian farmer should have a boat below him as that he should have a roof over his head, and he ■ as much at home on the billows as on the rocks; but, with all this, it is marvellous that such situations should have been selected for human habitation, and it is even more marvellous that it should be possible to extract the means of living from such places and out of such soil. There are many such instances among the cliffs of the Geiranger, and they cannot be said to sacroch on its grand solitude any more than the eyrie of the eagle mars the grandeur of the Alpine height.

OUR VILE BODY.

By L. B. WALFORD, AUTHOR OF "DICK NECESSARY," ETC.

"TO have as much work ■ do as one can do, and a little more," has been given as the best recipe for cheerfulness and contentment; but while readily concurring in the first part of the sentiment, we cannot but suggest that it may be, perchance, that very "little more" which is at the root of half the ill-health, pale faces, and fractious nerves of the present day. It is that last drop in the already full cup, that last straw on the already well-laden back, which is too much, just one degree too much for the sorely pressed men and women who are fighting in the fight of life, and it ■ that overplus from which they ought if they can to abstain.

They will not see it; they will not do it. Each allows that in the case of another, that other's duty in the matter is plain enough; but for him or herself—and then follow excuses, arguments, and obstinacy not to be shaken.

Now, as this short paper relates simply to the ill-usage of the poor body under the press and strain of daily overwork, or daily neglect, or the like, we will say nothing of the manner in which the soul and the mind, those two higher powers, likewise suffer under the effort to do too much, to undertake too many things, to see too many sights, to keep ■ too large a correspondence or acquaintance,—in short, to be twenty people instead of one. We will leave out of sight every higher consideration, but merely put in a plea for that hardly treated and long-suffering, yet marvellously fashioned and gloriously appointed image of our Maker, which it seems to us meets with but scant respect from many in the present day.

It is the fashion to hold it cheap, and to work it hard. What matter that it is hot or cold, tired or famished, when there is fame to be won, money to be made, admiration to be bought, or—and though we say it tenderly, yet the principle is wrong—souls to be saved? Those who give themselves to God's service, or to the world's service, are alike mistaken in their policy when "they make haste to be rich" in obtaining their desire. They will not bring in the best harvest who cannot wait for it, who must have ■ all at once; they who road themselves in wrestling for the prize cannot hold on, and another, who has husbanded his powers, obtains what they miss.

But how few consider this; how many float the idea when presented to them—at all events when presented as a home thrust! Everybody, ■ would seem, must attempt something over and above what he or she can possibly accomplish; everybody must drain a little more out of their worrying feverish brains than can be yielded consistently with only wholesome effort or energy; everybody must fly at game beyond their reach, ■ only ■ be within their sight.

Perhaps the most hardened offender of all is the earnest, anxious, middle-aged married man, who carries with him from hour to hour, sleeping and waking—for even his dreams are troubled—a settled burden of care which curtains rest, indisposes for recreation, and indisposes (N D) Undoubtedly it does not interfere with the appetite, or that gnawing hunger which presses for relief when no food has been taken for hours. That would be the lesser evil of the two, because the more palatable, and the more easily remedied, but it takes a bitter experience directly the meal is over. The hardest task-master could not use worse the body of another, than does the over-worked professional or business man a human being. It is not the work he gets through, not the hours of busy application, nor even of deep thought, which do the damage eventually, no, it is the sitting under a load which can not be borne, the pressure of patients in the which are impossible to be fulfilled, of engagements which cannot be carried out, of things such as these, which presently form into a cloud over the brow and draw lines round the eyes and mouth.

"Oh, it is all very true to talk," the man will tell you, "it is very true." Perhaps he may add, "It is very true, what you say, in the abstract, but you don't know, you cannot appreciate the circumstances, you are not in the secret of my affairs, I must do as I am doing," &c, &c, &c.

Or, he will go further and allow more. "Yes, yes, you are in the right," he will say, "cannot hold on much longer, he it is he ought to relax and take things more easily, and in his acquiescence he is so kind and sincere that you imagine the impression is made, and will be acted upon. But somehow or other it never is, you hear that your friend is still at it, still returning onwards and upwards at the same high pressure, and you meet and find him older, oh! so much older, all in a year or two, you feel that he is more engrossed, more submerged in cares and fears, and a looming over of needed fruits than ever, and presently—the strong cracks, this all."

So much for overwork, now for over of.

There is a member of our vile body which is so important, so useful, so influential, that he has been styled 'the father of the family'—in plain terms, the stomach. How wickedly, how wantonly, is this poor stomach maltreated by many of us, and that without knowledge, or at least reflection, or at any rate compunction!

It is allowed to go fasting and empty for hours and hours in defiance of the laws which cry aloud to be heard, then all at once it has thrust upon it, bolted down, a heavy voluminous reeking hot meal, the last mouthful of which is scarcely down ere the chair is empty and its late occupant off anywhere and everywhere, feeling miserable and unstable it is true, but ignorant, the cause and preventing, from day to day, in pursuing the same course. Well, he can't do it without paying the penalty. 'Indigestion is the consequence of the stomach,' says a waiter of to-day, and its warning voice nothing can silence. Can any one be happy, cheerful, amiable, can he be benevolent and forbearing towards his fellow-men, or even take the full measure of comfort and support out of life on itself, who is neurotic, who never knows what it is to be well, or a jester in his side, or an echo in his heart, or a sinking sickness within? Such a sufferer will doubtless affirm that he is "only a little out of sorts," or that it is nothing which signifies, and he never stops to ask himself honestly and practically why he should care so much about that extra letter he has to write, or the extra half mile he has to walk, or the little matter that is not wrong. But the doctor—he knows, his practiced eye sees to the root of the matter, and he will tell you, though you may laugh at him until you believe it by bitter experience, that life itself becomes a burden scarcely to be borne by the victim of simple indigestion.

Then another thing this poor body needs is sleep. We turn now to those whose days are comparatively easy and who, having, from morning till night to work in, to read in, to talk in, to benefit others and enjoy themselves in, persist in sitting up late, slaying into the night just because 'it is too early to go to bed.' The toil worn by day live an even more for prolonging their scanty time for recreation, but this is for those who, having no reason to take for sitting up so late the midnight oil, have fallen into the habit, and have persuaded others to do as they do.

It is hopeless to tell people who are not easily mischievously nature of the glances of the summer morn, of the fragrant scents from the meadows, the dewy colwubs on the grass, and the graceful lights and sounds to be met with ere the bustling day is awake, but when they sit up night after night when there is nothing to sit for—it is always a worth while on occasion of course, when there is any late sight to be viewed, or music to be heard, or company to be enjoyed—but when there are only the same faces to be seen that have been there all day, and only the same things to be done that can be done in the day, then we do affirm that it is cruelly hard on the poor body to be forced to breathe the gas lit or lamp lit air, and to work the eyes by artificial light when the hour for "beauty sleep" arrives, that sleep which would make the slumberer wake in the morning fresh, vigorous, joyous—or, at any rate, not indisposed by the discomfort and weariness of the flesh for the morning devotions and the after duties and pleasures of the day.

Cold air, cold water, plenty of exercise, and abundance of recreation, are all very necessary for and too often denied the duped and defrauded body we think in some ways so little of. You can dance, young ladies, admirably, you can ride, you can skate, you can play lawn tennis for hours together, but you do not know how it is you do not, if you own the truth, like walking. When there is anything to be done, you say, you do not mind, you can chop, you can visit, you can dawdle in and out of your neighbour's houses, or if you taste and principles are higher, you can engage in mission work, teach children, pass from one cottage to another, trudge miles to church to hear a favourite preacher, but you shudder at the bare idea of a good, brisk, healthful walk for walking's sake. Ah, but you do not know the pleasure of it—the exhilaration of spirits, the glow in the veins, the delightful well earned fatigue of the limbs so different to the fatigue of the head and in which the blood hunger that finds everything good at the time, and nothing troublesome afterwards. And—let none despise this—the erect carriage, the elegant poise and graceful movements are to be obtained, legitimately not used, by exercise, by merry dances, and sports, and plays, not by a miserable compulsion, that worst torture of the poor body, about which so much has already been said that it is unnecessary to say more, the bright complexion is to be won by fresh breezes, not by—but this is outside our province.

Each one of us knows his own weak point, his own temptation, and it is hardly too much to say that it is two things among us do wistfully and mischievously and ignorantly thwart and injure our own flesh and blood. But why be thus unkind, why thus unjust? You would not so treat another; your voice would be the loudest, your arguments the most urgent, if it were not yourself whom you yourself were thus at war with? Then, why not recognise once for all claims so manifest? You can not, be assured, long go on holding your own body at bay, as it were, you cannot make of it a drudge, or a drone, as the case may be, without bringing down a retribution which you will not like, my friend, and which, perhaps, if you are piously disposed, you will refer to Providence, and endeavour to submit to with patience and resignation. But, my we, with all reverence suggested that Providence has nothing to do with the victim's revenge on her own injuries?

You men who will not curtail your long working hours, who will not limit the what you know you cannot possibly do, who consider it a trifling, perhaps beneath your dignity, to be more regular, and skilful, and careful in your diet, you women and girls who will gape and yawn in each other's faces, instead of laying your tired heads on the peaceful pillow, who will huddle over the fire, or the desk, or the sewing machine, instead of letting the fine wintry air fill your lungs and ruddy your cheeks, you will all pay for some day. Some day? You are paying for it every day, every day of your lives. You are paying, for in fitful peevish tempers, low spirits, rashes, pains, moods, offences against God and your neighbour, all of which you probably yourself deplore, and the most of which you are fain sorrowfully to attribute to your "un-Christian state of mind."

So it is, very un-Christian. Christ, your Master, would have you honour and preserve that poor body you despise, would have it sound, vigorous, clear, instead of aching and dawning. And take a bracing blow in the flesh outer air, instead of wailing a lamentation in your diary. Tear up your diary and open your windows. Don't come shivering in and shivering out of church on the Sunday school because you have no more comfortable way to throw around you and don't fly along from one overheated busy busy place to another all the holy day of rest. When you are tired out, when your head or your eyes or your back is aching, be content to accept the willing substitute who offers to do your work, and believe that some one else besides yourself is good for something in the world. True it is, indeed, that one may and does not infrequently hear of or behold a brave and devoted God-worshiping His wonder through some poor afflicted, agonised saint whom He has stricken, but surely it is not unreasonable to conclude that where He has bestowed full powers, talents, and faculties, it is not pleasing in His sight that these should be slighted and unfulfilled, nay, may go a step farther, and claim that the servant who serves Him best is he who, with every energy of the mind and every aspiration of the soul strengthened and animated by the soundness and vivacity of a perfect body, yields with a willing cheerfulness and an humble gratitude the fruits of these at the feet of his Creator, after whose image that body itself was created.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE.

By THE EDITOR.

AMONG the many memoirs which have been published of recent years, few have created greater interest than the auto biographical notes left by the late Mr Anthony Trollope. We regret that we have been unable before notice, in GOOD WORDS, the life of one who for many years past contributed to its pages, and to whom our readers were so much indebted.*

His reminiscences are full of interest and instruction. Professing to be chiefly literary, and teeming with literary criticism and delightful literary gossip, they also contain a self-revelation in which no detail is omitted necessary to the understanding of his life. In common with all who knew him only after he had achieved distinction, we were surprised by the picture he draws of the hardships of his early life. For no trace of sorrow, no memory of disappointment, could be detected in that bluff and cheery presence. He seemed to revel in the fresh air of a healthy, happy, and useful existence. The loud manly voice, the bang emphasis and straightness of leap with which he plunged into any matter of discussion, had something in them of his favourite amusement of hunting. He addressed you as a man trotting alongside, and in the teeth of a strong breeze, might address you. There was the ring of the "Vie-hulloo" in his heartiness. His countenance beamed with thorough honesty and kindness. And yet he describes the first twenty-six years of his life as "years of suffering, disgrace, and inward remorse." We are disposed to make large allowance, in these statements, for the influence of a sensitive temperament. His "craving for affection" probably made him exaggerate the slights which he was exposed. A coarser nature would have forgotten many of the incidents that left deep scars on his kindly spirit. But the picture he gives of his school days is none the less touching. The son of a barrister of some ability, who was afflicted with poverty, a bad temper, and thorough inaptitude for business, he was born under a conjunction of evil stars. His mother, the celebrated novelist, was the one solace of his youth, but by a hard fate he was long separated from her. He thus describes his first experience at school—

"I was only seven, and I think that boys at seven are now spared among their more considerate seniors. I was never spared and was not even allowed to run to and fro between our house and the school without a daily purgatory. No doubt my appearance was against me. I remember well, when I was still the junior boy in the school Dr Butler, the head master, stopping me in the street and asking me, with all the clouds of Jove upon his brow and all the thunder in his voice, whether it was possible that Harrow School was disgraced by so disreputably dirty a little boy as I! Oh! what I felt at that moment! But I could not look my feelings. I do not doubt that I was dirty, but I think that I was cruel. He must have known me had he seen me as he was wont to see me, for he was in the habit of stopping me constantly. Perhaps he did not recognise me by my face."

Later on, when he was at Winchester College, he was as miserable as before.

"I suffered horribly! I could make no stand against it. I had no friend to whom I could pour out my sorrows. I was big, and awkward, and ugly, and, I have no doubt, I knocked about in a most unattractive manner. Of course I was ill-dressed and dirty. But, oh! how well I remember all the agonies of my young heart, how I considered whether I should always be alone, whether I could not find my way up to the top of that college tower, and from thence put an end to everything!"

He had other sorrows meet before he entered on the business of his life in connection with the Civil Service. The beginning of his career in the Post Office was equally unfortunate with that of his boyhood. His superior officers at "The Grand" found him unpunctual and careless, while he thought them overbearing. He seemed to him as if he were doomed to ill-usage. Yet even during those unhappy years there were the stirrings of literary ambition, and tokens of the shape which that ambition was to take. He was haunted with a passion for castle building.

"For weeks, for months, if I remember rightly, from year to year, I would carry on the same tale, binding myself down to certain laws, to certain proportions, and proportions, and unities. Nothing impossible was ever introduced, nor even anything which, from outward circumstances, would seem to be violently improbable. I myself was of course my own hero."

The two turning points of his career were his transference to Ireland and his marriage. In Ireland he found, for the first time, congenial surroundings, and he threw himself with enthusiasm into his official duties. His marriage added a new stimulus to his ambition. He determined to increase his income by the gains of authorship, and accordingly sat down to his first novel. This was in 1841, when he was twenty-six years old. Fortune however frowned on this first attempt, as she had frowned on every commencement he made in life. But a new spirit of courage was in him, and he faced the world with a determination to succeed. With that dauntless energy and perseverance which became his chief characteristic, he girded himself for his conflict with fortune. It was not, however, till 1855 that he gained his first success. It was then that 'Barsetshire Lowers' appeared, the earliest of that series which included "Tramley Parsonage," and "The Last Chronicle of Barset." In this series his fame will chiefly rest. From 1855 his place in contemporary literature was recognised. If it was not the very highest place, it was close to the highest. He would himself have been the last to claim equality with Thackeray or George Eliot. They had genius, Trollope had talent, but it was talent of rare quality. He seemed exhaustless in productive power, and capable of bringing its full strength to bear on every production, however rapidly executed. If his work never rises to the loftiest range, it maintains an excellence that is astonishing in view of the speed with which story followed story. He describes his method of working with perfect frankness. He despised the idea of a writer waiting for inspiration. "Genius," he once said to us, "is but another name for the length of time a man can sit." "I was once told," he says in his Autobiography, "that the surest aid to the writing of a book was a piece of cobbler's wax on my chair. I certainly believe in the cobbler's wax much more than in inspiration." No cobbler's wax, however, could have held him so firmly as did his own determination.

"According to the circumstances of the time," he writes, "whether any other business might then be heavy or light, or whether the work which I was writing was or was not wanted with speed, I have allotted to myself so many pages a week. The average number has been about forty. It has been placed as low as twenty, and has risen to one hundred and twelve. And as a page is an ambiguous term, my page has been made to contain two hundred and fifty words, and as words, if not watched, will have a tendency to straggle, I have had every word counted as I went. In the bargains I have made with publishers, I have—not, of course, with their knowledge, but in my own mind—undertaken always to supply them with so many words, and I have never put a book out of my hand short of the number by a single word. I may also say that the excess has been very small. I have prided myself on completing my work exactly within the proposed dimensions. But I have prided myself especially in completing it within the proposed time, and I have always done so.”

It was indeed a comfort for any editor to have Trollope as a writer, for there was never any anxiety as to “copy” being forth coming at the appointed time. We remember the surprise we experienced when, on the occasion of our first arranging with him for a story, he asked, “How many words do you wish?” “On what day do you wish copy?” was the next question. A jotting was then taken of the agreement, and it was observed by him to the letter. Such methods cannot but appear inconsistent with any preconceived notions of inspiration, and as being too mechanical for the accomplishment of the best work. Yet we believe it had no such trammelling influence on Trollope, whose temperament was such that he could reach his highest power whether he was flying in an express train or being pitched about in a steamer in a gale. With unflinching regularity and decision he could concentrate his mind on his allotted task—sometimes even timing himself with his watch for the production of so many words in so many minutes. We question, however, whether the consciousness of having to fill so many pages, while quite consistent with the maintenance of a certain literary proportion, did not sometimes lead to undue “padding.” If he worked hard, he very properly expected to be paid for his work. He had no false sentimentalism as to money in connection with art. “It is a mistake to suppose that a man is a better man because he despises money. Who does not desire to be hospitable to his friends, generous to the poor, liberal to all, beneficent to his children, and to be himself free from the carking fear which poverty creates?” The profits which he reaped from his works amounted in all to some thing between £70,000 and £80,000. It seems a large sum, but when we consider the talent and industry employed, and think of what this same talent and industry might have gained had they been engaged at the bar or in commerce, we cannot estimate the result of his life’s work as at all extraordinary.

His conception of the moral purposes to be served by the writer of novels is a noble one, and he is justified in his claim to having honestly tried to fulfil his ideal.

“There are many who would laugh at the idea of a novelist teaching either virtue or sobriety—those, for instance, who regard the reading of novels as a sin, and those, also, who think it to be simply an idle pastime. They look upon the tellers of stories as among the tribe of those who pander to the wicked pleasures of a wicked world. I have regarded my art from so different a point of view that I have ever thought of myself as a preacher of sermons, and my pulpit as one which I could make both salutary and agreeable to my audience. I do believe that no girl has risen from the reading of my pages less modest than she was before, and that some may have learned from them that modesty is a charm well worth preserving. I think that no youth has been taught that senselessness and fleshiness is to be found the road to manliness, but some may perhaps have learned from me that it is to be found in truth and a high, but gentle, spirit. Such are the lessons I have striven to teach, and I have thought it might best be done by representing to my readers characters like themselves, or to which they might liken themselves.”

His life, in spite of its incessant toil, was an exceedingly happy one, and he recognised its happiness in the full. His duties afforded him the opportunity of travelling extensively. Egypt, the West Indies, America, Australia, South Africa, became familiar ground to him. When at home he had his four hunters ever ready to carry him to the covert side, and (what was more difficult) to carry a rider across country who was so short sighted that he could never form a judgment of fence or ditch, and who boldly rode straight at everything. From his habit of rising every morning at 5.30 A.M., he was able to have his literary work over in good time, and the day free for any other duty or amusement. Loving his own fireside, he yet enjoyed going into society, and seldom in his later life did he miss, when in town, the afternoon visit to the Garrick, and the afternoon rubber at which there. Never making any very loud professions of religion, and regarding all that was innocent in life as open to his free enjoyment, all his friends knew him to be a reverent and sincere Christian.

From the affection and admiration with which we regard him, he is painful for us to draw attention to one passage in his Autobiography in which his memory has evidently betrayed him, and in which he writes in a tone which, for many reasons well known to us, has filled us with surprise. We refer to the following passage—

“‘Rachel Ray’ underwent a fate which no other novel of mine has encountered. Some years before this periodical called Good Words had been established under the editorship of my friend Dr. Norman MacLeod, a well-known Presbyterian pastor in Glasgow. In 1863 he asked me to write a novel for his magazine, explaining to me that his principles did not teach him to confine his matter to religious subjects, and paying me the compliment of saying that he would feel himself quite safe in my hands. In reply I told him I thought he was wrong in his choice—that though he might wish to give a novel to the readers of Good Words, a novel from me would hardly be what he wanted, and that I could not undertake to write either with any specially religious tendency, or in any fashion different from that which was usual to me. As worldly and—if any one thought me wicked—as wicked as I had heretofore been I must still be should I write for Good Words. He persisted in his request, and I came to terms as to a story for the periodical. I wrote it and sent it to him, and shortly afterwards received it back—a considerable portion having been printed—with an intimation that it would not do. A letter more full of wailing and repentance no man ever wrote. It was, he said, all his own fault. He should have taken my advice. He should have known better. But the story, such as it was, he could not give to his readers in the pages of Good Words. Would I forgive him? Any pecuniary loss to which his decision might subject me the owner of the publication would willingly make good. There was some loss—or rather would have been—and that money I exacted, feeling that the fault had in truth been with the editor. There is the tale now to speak for itself. It is not brilliant, nor in any way very excellent, but it certainly is not very wicked. There is some dancing in one of the early chapters, described, no doubt, with that approval of the amusement which I have always entertained, and it was thus to which my friend decried. It is more true of novels than perhaps of anything else, that one man's food is another man's poison.

When we remember the truthness of the friendship which existed between Mr. Trollope and Dr. Norman Macleod, and which was not even disturbed by the incident of "Rachel Ray," we are at a loss to account for the narration which this passage betrays. Still more unaccountable is his narrative of the rejection of "Rachel Ray," and his supposition that the only cause for it was the occurrence of some dancing in the early part of the story. To show the groundlessness of the reason he attributes, we have but to recall to our readers the song once written for Good Words by Norman Macleod himself.

"Dance my children! lead and dance!
Cut and shuffle down and fro!
Piper, pour from every chamber Hurricanes of Highland ro!
Like the old burn shallo with I sighs,
At its flooring like a drum
Rattle it with I alligorn!
All the storm without is dumb!
Two p in circles like a whirled,
All across like meteors glancing
Crack your heels, about in gladness,
Think of dancing but of dancing."

But Mr. Trollope ought to have had no difficulty in divining the reasons for "Rachel Ray" not being accepted, because he had these reasons given at length by Norman Macleod in a letter which we published in the memoir of our brother, and part of which we here reproduce, not only to show that there is very little trace of "wailing and repentance," but also to give our readers an insight into the principles upon which the former and present editors have tried to select fiction—that most difficult of all elements in a periodical with the aims which Good Words has always put before it.

"N.B.—This letter will keep cold till you are at peace with all the world, with a pipe well filled, and drawing well. Read it then, or a bit each day for a month."

"Glasgow, June 11th 1863"

"You are not wrong. nor have you wronged me, though I more than you have been the cause of the misunderstanding. What I tried to explain and wished you to see when we met here was, the peculiar place which GOOD WORDS aimed at occupying in the field of cheap Christian literature. I have always endeavoured to avoid, on the one hand, the exclusively narrow religious ground—narrow in its choice of subjects and in its manner of treating them—hitherto occupied by our religious periodicals, and, on the other hand, to avoid altogether whatever was antagonistic to the truths and spirit of Christianity, and also as much as possible whatever was calculated to offend the prejudices, far more the sincere convictions and feelings of fair and reasonable 'Evangelical' men. Within these extremes it seemed to me that a sufficiently extensive field existed, in which any novelist might roam and find an endless variety of life and manner to describe with profit to all, and without giving offence to any. This problem which I wished to solve did not and does not seem to me a very difficult one, unless for very one-sided 'Evangelical' or anti-Evangelical writers. At all events, being a clergyman as well as an editor—the one from deepest convictions, though the other, I fear, is from the deepest mistake—I could not be else than sensitive lest anything should appear in Good Words out of harmony with my convictions and my profession. Well, then, was I wrong in assuming that you were an honest believer in revealed Christian truth? I was not. Was I wrong in believing and hoping that there was many true Christian aspects of life, as well as the tawdry I ambug ones, with which you heartily sympathized, and which you were able and disposed to denigrate? I was not.

"Perhaps I had no ground for hoping that you would give me a different kind of story from those you had hitherto published. If so, forgive me this wrong. Possibly the wish was rather to the thought. But the thought did not imply that any of your former novels had been false either to your own world within or to the big world without—false to truth or to nature. It assumed only that you could with your whole heart produce another novel which, instead of showing up what was weak, false, disgusting in professing Christians, might also bring out, as has never yet been done, what Christianity as a living power derived from faith in a living Saviour, and working in and through living men and women, does, has done, and will do, what no other known power can accomplish in the world, for the good of the individual or mankind. . . . Why, when one reads of the good men in most novels, can hardly be discovered where they got their goodness, but let a parson, a deacon, a church member be introduced and at once we guess where they have had their badness from—they were professing Christians. Now all this, and much more, was the substance of my sermon to you.

"Now, my good Trollope, you have been, in my humble opinion, guilty of committing the fault, or, as you might say, praiseworthy in doing this good, in your story. You hit right and left, gave a wife here, a sneer there, and thrust a nasty pony into another place—cast a gloom over Dorcas Societies, and a glory over bells lasting till four in the morning. In short, it is the old story. The shadow over the Church is broad and deep, and over every other spot sinfulness reigns. That is the general impression which the story gives, so far as it goes. There is nothing, of course, bad or vicious in it—that could not be from you—but quite enough, and that without any necessity from your head or heart, to keep Good Words and its Editor in boiling water until either or both were boiled to death.

“... I know well that my position is difficult, and that, too, because I do not write to please both parties, but simply because I wish to produce, if possible, a magazine which though too wide for the ‘Evangelicals,’ and too narrow for the anti-‘Evangelicals,’ and therefore disliked by both classes, may nevertheless rally round it in the long run the sympathies of all who occupy the middle ground of divided, sincere, and mainly Evangelical Christianity.”

We have only to add in reference to another remark made by Mr Trollope—that such have been the changes in public opinion that the once rejected novel would probably now be published without question in Good Words,—that having just finished the perusal of “Rachel Ray,” we thoroughly endorse the judgment of the former editor.

We will close this brief sketch of the good Anthony Trollope with a story lately given us, which is both amusing and will serve to show how hearty was the friendship which existed between him and Norman Macleod, long after “Rachel Ray’s” rejection had been forgotten. They were both with Mr John Burns (the well known chairman of the Cunard Line) at a little Highland inn, when, after supper, stories were told, and the laughter became loud and long, lasting far into the night. In the morning an old gentleman, who slept in a bedroom above where they were, complained to the landlord of the manner in which his night’s rest had been disturbed, and presumed to express his astonishment that such men should have taken more than was good for them. “Well,” replied the landlord, “I am bound to confess there was much loud talking and laughter, but they had nothing stronger than tea and fresh herrings.” “Bless me,” rejoined the old gentleman, “if that is so, what would they be after dinner!”

EAST-LONDON LIFE AND WORK.

By THE REV HARRY JONES, M.A.

THIRD (AND CONCLUDING) PAPER.

THE East of London is reckoned to be dull, and certainly it stands in need of more wholesome public amusement than it now can conveniently realise. But its social life is often unfairly judged by a few who miss the society with which they have been personally familiar. Some time ago, e.g., an Oxford East end clergyman wrote letters to a paper signing himself “An Exile.” From what was he exiled? Trams and trains are frequent, cabs are numerous, and it used to take about thirty-five minutes for us to drive from Ratcliff Highway to Mayfair when we happened to dine with friends in that fashionable region, but our “Exile” was of course separated from the immediately contiguous touch of “University” men, from that of such as kept butlers, rode on horseback, and quoted Latin accurately. He was not cut off, however, from a very fevrid, sagacious, and outspoken set of people amongst whom my wife and I reckon warm friends. There is, moreover, much East end middle class interchange of hospitality, and such an estimate of current literary culture as many “West enders” would be surprised at. One day the Bishop of Manchester was preaching for me at George’s, and in his sermon took occasion to deprecate a notable article in that month’s Fortnightly. Our Junior Warden, living and trading in Ratcliff Highway, said to me afterwards, “I’ve got the magazine at home, and am glad that he gave Clifford a dressing.” At another time, during one of our choir suppers, the conversation ran without forcing or pretence on the last number of the Nineteenth Century. Every now and then I was struck by the way in which subjects of high general interest came up in local society, and realised the influence of popular educational periodicals on the scope and tone of its conversation. The prevalence, too, of little “parties” among eastern working people was, it seemed to me, more notable than in the west, where they have few parlours in which they receive their friends. Still, there is sore lack of wholesome recreation, and chiefly to this end the scheme of a People’s Palace was started at a Mansion House meeting in December last. The gathering was remarkable, and one of the speeches, by Professor Huxley, gravely startling. He told us that he well knew one poor parish forty years ago, and had never forgotten it. He said that since then he had been round the world, and seen many kinds of savages, but he solemnly asserted that if the choice were given him between the life of a savage and that of a dweller in the place which he remembered so well—a wretched waterside district—he would distinctly choose the life of a savage. This was an awful sentence, but though avowedly forty years out of date, and by no means specially applicable to East London—I know more about that than the Professor does—the case of some people in all our great cities might justify it now. Matters have mended in many ways, notably since Hogarth photographed the streets, but the present amusement of the poorest is woeful. Many must have had more mirth in the dark ages, with their fairs, church festivals, miracle plays, and May-poles; though they were sparse jerkins, slept on straw, and were much kicked about by the upper sort. Certainly the most superstitious pilgrimage on foot gave a better knowledge of the country than a modern excursion, when people are packed into a third-class carriage and projected out of one set of public-houses into another. That is what a "Holy day" often comes ■ in these enlightened times. A sad business. Once perhaps this land deserved the name of "merry." Now we have so blundered that many poor children, especially boys, even in the country, do not know how to play with corporate interest, when they get the chance. They have not spirit of self-sacrifice enough ■ realise the true taking of sides, and of a sound corporate licking. Their play is individual, such as cat, peg-top, &c. Though it is pursued with greediness and noise, they break off in a moment to crowd and grin around a white-haired drunkard, or a tearing fight between two women, whom God forgive, for they know not what they do or say. This scent of the social air is, however, ominous, and we may trust that the Mansion House meeting, which moved quite out of usual ruts in the Egyptian Hall, and left Gog and Magog something to think about, will bear fruit. An appreciation of sound learning and wholesome play for the people was certainly then shown, and if the people themselves are employed in ■ realisation, we may have turned a useful social corner, at least in respect to London. I happen to have been made by the Charity Commissioners one of the trustees of the "Beaumont Trust," out of the ashes of which we hope to see the People's Palace rise, and I may be allowed to take the opportunity of saying that we want fifty thousand pounds.

The time has not come ■ which to form a just judgment of the elementary education now being given to the working class. There are, nevertheless, several things in it which seem wrong to me.

I would instance the combination of compulsory attendance and a payment of fees. The former, or ■ least the attempt to realise it, makes school stink in the nostrils of too many. The very babies in our crèche used to play at "school visitors" by themselves. One would come in peeping about with infant severity, whereupon the others fled, or affected to hide themselves. This indicated not merely general and profound domestic distaste for compulsory school, but a frequently successful evasion of it. If we have Board School visitors they should be shifted, and not be allowed to remain so long in the same place as to be immediately recognised at the corners of streets. We made one capture once, at St. George's, of which I am keenly ashamed. After our recreation ground was opened, truants naturally frequented it. The ground is entered by two large iron gates. One day, at about eleven o'clock, we shut these and put a visitor in the midst. It was like lowering a terrier into a pit of rats. They squeaked and ran; in vain. We caught fifty-seven palpitating recusants. But I must be allowed to say, gladly, that we were not moved to repeat the process, however piteously comical.

To return to the economy of schools: the small ordinary fee of a penny or twopence is enough to suggest resentment when demanded after compulsory attendance, and at the same time ■ is not enough in respect of the benefit received and cost incurred. It ■ urged by many, that people do not value what they do not pay for. Very true sometimes. But they do not, and know that they do not, pay for the schooling of their children when they send the weekly pennies. The looking after these, too, takes up much of the teachers' time. If we must have compulsory education, I, for one, would like to see those schools free in which it is applied. They need not ■ all. The attendance at the greater number of schools in a district ought, I venture to think, to be voluntary, but in some cases—I would not be too hard on little girls minding babies which are half ■ big as themselves, and pull them lopsided—the presence of children might be enforced. Again, the part payment of teachers by results, so far as these are measured by government inspections and grants, obviously tempts masters, who are no better than the rest of us, ■ shirk the profitless instruction of the most backward scholars. They should be paid a fixed income, and fined for failures, heavily for gross ones.

In respect to instruction generally I have, of course, realised the resentment with which it is generally met. Very few in any class or condition like to be taught anything, but I confess to disappointment when I provided lessons in cheap and toothsome cookery. I was full of enthusiasm about it, but nobody cared twopence for the matter. I had a room properly fitted up for the purpose. There was the bright, white aproned teacher from Kennington, with her pots, pans, kinks, wrinkles, and sniffs about nice dishes to be made for next to nothing. The resultant viands were set on the table, ■ be smelt and eaten, and they smelt uncommonly good. But, no, our people would have none of it. They came in crowds to the opening lecture by Mr Buckmaster, cheered lustily, and then stayed away. "Oh," said some, by no means the poorest, "give us meat, and we will find a way to cook it." This was, perhaps, natural, but all the same provoking, for these cynics really ate meat on most days, but did not know how to prepare it well. Thus, I am pleased to see cooking form part of elementary education in a growing number of schools, for it is one of the most important matters which need to be taught. Certainly it is more useful than grammar, with which dry stuff many poor children have hitherto been crammed, to the great discredit of us managers, pastors, and masters. I look, too, with mixed thought at the huge Board Schools which hunch up their backs above the flats of tile and chimney pot, inasmuch as they seem greedy to swallow up family life. This ought to be treated with the more respect where its influence is likely to be tainted, but I take comfort in the knowledge that many in those battalions of children under their roofs find appreciative friends in teachers, and that veins of love traverse the lumbering scholastic carcase. I am thinking just at this moment of a flower cross sent by children of an East end Board School to be laid on the little blue coffin of the care-keeper's baby. What a profoundly joyous and consuming career might be found in elementary teaching by many young ladies who deserve a better fate than success in lawn tennis! The worst of it is, that however charming, they are often too ill instructed to teach even the most ignorant. But the opportunities open to the younger and most capable among them in these educational days are incalculable.

While recalling the "remedial" factors in East-London society, and passing in mental review the many polyglot institutions and invitations for our sailors' benefit on the borders of the docks, I might dwell on the Wells Street "Home," which has beds for several hundred tars, and stalls under its roof for the purchase of whatever they really need, and which supports itself, but I stop to say a word about the "Ratcliff Highway Refuge." I am still an acting member of its very small board of management, or whatever it is called, and go there occasionally, but it is managed by Miss Steer. I will not write what I think of this lady's rule, for it combines more true tact, love, and sense—with a wholesome vein of sad humour—than I know how to set down the record of, but I must pen a sentence concerning the Refuge itself. It came about in this wise. Down Old Gravel Lane, which leads out of the "Highway," there is a dock bridge, popularly called "Bedford's Trap." ■ was thus named, not after the genial bishop who has made so many love him in East London, but after a coroner who was continuously sitting on the bodies of the people who had thrown themselves from it to be drowned. The water there was not only stagnant and deep, but poisonous. This was probably caused by the copper bottoms of those ships which lay long in the docks, and which, indeed, defiled them in other ways. People said that the swallowing of a pint of dock water was enough to kill you, even if you were drawn out before you were dead from suffocation. The stone sides of the wharf are high, steep, and slippery, defying after thoughts of self-extinction. Here "unfortunates," weary of "Highway" life, betook themselves so frequently that a special police constable was obliged to watch the bridge, and if possible stop fatal maddened leaps. The provision of a better door of escape was one of my hopes at St George's, and it eventually arrived in the shape of a "Ratcliff Highway Refuge," a few doors off that thoroughfare—at No 26, Prince's Square. Its title is written up plainly outside, so that she who runs to destruction may read, and at any time, day or night, a penitent meets with a kind and smiling welcome. The house is always full. Some who come in are moved on ■ larger institutions, a few go away ungraciously, or are inevitably dismissed till they can approach the place with such honesty and decency as the most forbearing must require, others are sent home to their friends. All the abandoned frequenters of the Highway know of this harbour of refuge, and are thus tempted to prefer it to "Bedford's Trap" when they would turn from the evil of their ways, and make a change into another sort of

■ No importunate public appeals are issued for this excellent work, but divers of those who come ■ know of it send money to help Miss Steer, who lives in the house, which at first was mobbed by sons of Bilal. Hers is not a post which many could fill. It is surrounded by devouring anxiety and exposure to strains of foul unrighteousness, but its guiding spirit had not broken down when I saw her last—this afternoon. God helps her.

I need not dwell on the various directly religious or spiritual influences which are employed and invoked to move and cheer the people in that part of London where I have last lived. They are numerous and manifold. No doubt, though ■ an impossible feat anywhere to live without God in the world, there are those who seem ■ do so at St George's in-the-East, as well as at St George's, Hanover Square, but offers of religious ministrations, when they are perceived to be genuine and self-sacrificing, are gladly received before very long by many, at all times, and in all places. And I do not think that the "opinions" of those who offer them much affect their acceptance. Opinions, especially when advanced with acrimony, are always imperfect, and mostly repulsive in any one. This is not inconsistent with the truth that enthusiasm is a prominent factor in the movement and conduct of the world of men, nor with another truth, sic that there must be some form of belief. It is impossible to build upon a sentiment alone. The most worldly material spirit must have a task to hold it, if it is to do good or harm. But given a sober man with an open eye, a loving heart, a touch of true humour, and a big faith in the power of right over wrong, and he inevitably affects his fellows for good. I knew, and knew of, men credited with curiously different views, who were all doing excellent work, and setting me a wholesome example in various ways, though I tried to preserve my individuality, and had my own notions about their religious fads. They were more or less known—often less—sturdy personal inglorious evangelists, with a belief and trust in a living God, and Jesus Christ who loved to call himself the Son of Man. I could dwell ■ length upon many varieties of religious machinery and motive, but much is written on these things, and I do not now want to add my pebble to the heap. I will only say, in a last word about East London, that nowhere have I more clearly seen the worth of the man weighed rather than that of the party to which he was supposed to be long

A SAIL THROUGH LOWER EGYPT AFTER THE WAR.

By LADY BRASSLEY, AUTHOR OF "A VOYAGE IN THE 'SUNBEAM,'" ETC.

PART II.

HURSDAY, February 1st—To day we went with Lord Napier, Major Napier, General Harman, and some of the staff, including Colonel John, Captain Sinclair, Mr Errington, and others, to the lines at Caft Dowar, and thence to Ramieh. We drove first ■ the Mahmoudieh Canal, and then for some distance along its banks, past beautiful palaces and gardens, which had all fortunately escaped the violence of the mob, though they now look sadly desolate and deserted, their owners having fled and not having yet returned. Near Mr. Antonades' garden (the best, by the way, in Alexandria) some of the British troops, under General Harman, were encamped for several weeks and, to their credit be it spoken, not a tree, shrub, or flower was injured during the whole time. Just before the camp was broken up, they had only a few days' water supply for horses and men, and were getting very anxious indeed, when the change in the tide of affairs turned the water into the canal once more and ■ was well. Here we found horses in readiness for us; but it was now raining so hard, and the weather looked so unsettled, that we were obliged to wait more than an hour for it to clear up. The time was, however, not at all unpleasantly spent in listening to various details of the campaign from the lips of some of the actors therein. Rain is the last thing one expects ■ encounter in Egypt; and we were all beginning rather to despair, when the heavy clouds passed away, and the sun came out once more: The General had kindly lent me his favourite pony, a dear little Arab, taken at Cafr Dowar. Accustomed to be ridden by his master in front of everybody at a hand-gallop, he did not at all approve of going at a comparatively slow pace in the midst of a lot of other horses. He stuck his nose straight up in the air, and jumped about and bit at his companions, and capered and slipped on the muddy ground, till I thought we must inevitably come down and probably roll into the canal together; for the rain had formed a sort of greasy paste on the top of the hard ground, which made riding rather dangerous.

Presently we arrived at a very ill-repaired iron tubular single-line railway bridge, of which some plates were gone, and others, full of holes, looked as if ■ would not be long before they followed their example. Altogether it was a most unsafe-looking structure. However, safe or unsafe, if we wished to continue our ride we must cross it; and that in spite of the objections of some very decrepit railway officials, which received little or no attention. Every one dismounted; and after a short delay and a little difficulty, all the horses were led across in safety. We mounted again on the other side, and had rather an exciting gallop, which I much enjoyed, along a narrow raised causeway, built on the top of a steep embankment, for a single line of rails, between two lakes—or rather across one. General Harman, knowing the peculiarities of his pony, and seeing my difficulties, kindly suggested that I should lead the way, as we could only proceed in single file. The difference was marvellous. The pony flew like the wind, without pulling an ounce; and was as quiet as a lamb. The General advised us to make the pace pretty good till we reached the junction to Melhalla, as the down train from Cairo was nearly due, and there would not be much room, ■ any, for it ■ pass us. "Still," he added, "if we do meet the train, you have only to get off and let the pony stand on the embankment" (which was very steep) "close to the line, and he won't mind it a bit." I have no doubt his master knew the animal's ways; but I was very glad not to have ■ put this proof of his steadiness to the test, and that we reached Melhalla junction just before the train arrived there.

■ was along this causeway, over which we had just galloped so fast, that the armoured train, of which we heard so much during the war, used ■ come slowly out from Alexandria, to reconnoitre the enemy and throw shells into his lines. ■ was very interesting ■ have the operation explained and described on the exact spot where it had been carried out, for we had of course all seen the pictures and read the descriptions of the train, which appeared ■ the time in the newspapers, and we wanted very much to know more about it.

From Melhalla we had a less exciting ride, below the embankment, on the marshy ground beyond the lake. Here we were shown the various outworks and lines, and the small, covered ditches, along which the Egyptians crept in shelter until they were close ■ our advanced posts. Just before reaching Cafr Dowar, we saw a very dirty Egyptian, riding a miserable-looking donkey along the railway. "Here," said General Huxman, "is the place where all the pachas, and the thousands of men who occupied those works, laid down their arms to us." I asked how many were there to receive them, and was told, "Only Sir Evelyn Wood, myself, and our staff." What a triumph of mind over matter, of moral over physical strength! The works themselves look formidable, and, I believe, with good men behind them, would have been perfectly impregnable by any army, however determined and numerous.

The modern Egyptian, when not properly commanded—as was the case in the late war—seems to be rather a despicable enemy, running away directly he is hard pressed. I believe that immediately after the surrender of Cafr Dowar the sudden dissolution of the army of thousands of men was perfectly marvellous. Having laid down their arms, they retired to their villages, some of them far distant, resumed their ordinary fellah's dress (or the want of it), cultivated their fields, and were no longer distinguishable from their more peaceful brethren.

We had to cross the ditch inside the fortifications, to make a return journey alongside the Mahmoudieh Canal, in order to see the other lines. The General crossed first, with some little difficulty, for his horse did not like facing the water. I followed, with a jump, a flounder, a splash, and a scramble. Then came Lord Napier, the place, of course, getting more difficult with every jump. Captain Sinclair tried a new place a little lower down, and got over all right. Mabelle came after; and her horse, who evidently did not much like the look of it, caught his foot in a wire

On the Mahmoudieh Canal

(laid down originally as a trap by the Egyptians), and rolled completely over into the water. Mabelle came off on the other side, and hung by her habit, the horse rolling and plunging furiously. ■ Colonel John, who was following, had not jumped into the water up to his neck, and Captain Sinclair, who had already crossed, had not also dismounted and rushed ■ the rescue, she must have been drowned or crushed. It was a horrible thing to see! After one roll I thought she would never come up from under water again; but in what was really a few seconds, I suppose, though ■ appeared many minutes, she was half led, half carried to the shore, dripping and nearly drowned, but perfectly cool and collected, and not much the worse apparently. There are only about two or three trains a day each way on this line; and as one to Alexandria had just passed, there was nothing for ■ but for her to continue her ride just as she was, and to hope that the sun, which was now shining fiercely, would dry her clothes, and that the brisk exercise would prevent her taking cold.

We rode close to the canal, on which were numerous dahabiehs sailing up or rowing down; those coming down being laden with cotton, sugar-cane, and jars from Upper Egypt, those from Alexandria with all sorts ■ stores from other lands for the interior.

We saw the "one-tree picket," of which we have all often read: so called because of a curious old forked tree, which is conspicuous at this spot. In the said tree, perched in the fork, Sir Evelyn Wood used to pass many hours, seated on an old carriage cushion, watching the operations of the enemy. Other pickets, advanced works, and small mud intrenchments were passed; till at last, after riding through a large mud village, we again reached our old rotten bridge, which we once more crossed safely. Then we turned to the right, and came to a village situated in the midst of a fine grove of palm-trees, through which an avenue had been cut, by Sir Evelyn Wood's orders, to prevent their masking the enemy's fire or concealing his approach. The owners only charged £5 apiece for them (by way of compensation), which I should have thought was hardly as much as they were worth. Close by was established the battery of heavy guns, brought here with great skill and labour by the Naval Brigade, and placed under the "Red House Fort,"—or, in other words, the waterworks, with a large tower adjoining, which made a capital look-out station during the war. In fact, it was the chief point of observation for all the pickets about Ramleh and towards Cafr Dowar; commanding, as it did, a large extent of country. Thence a short ride took us to the Khedive's Palace at Ramleh, from which he was rescued with so much difficulty, and on the roof of which he used to sit in an arm-chair, provided with a pair of opera-glasses, to watch the effect of the bombardment. Here are now quartered the 46th Regiment, old friends of ours at Gibraltar: and very pleasant ■ was to meet them again, and to be hospitably entertained by them at lunch, in the marble hall of the palace; for we were all pretty tired and hungry after our long morning's work.

Friday, February and.—This morning we went by special train, with Lord Napier and much the same party as yesterday, taking donkeys with us, to see the forts at Aboukir. A three-quarters of an hour's journey brought us to Aboukir Station, where was a large quantity of fish of various kinds, including a porpoise, waiting to be sent up ■ Alexandria.

Leaving the train, and mounting our donkeys, we had a quiet ride across the sand to Fort Tewfik, as it is now called;—the oldest of all the forts, and one that was specially mentioned in Nelson's despatches; since which time it has, of course, been much modernised and strengthened. There were still some very heavy Armstrong guns lying on the ground, ready ■ be mounted, and stores of the most modern English ammunition, sufficient in quantity for a prolonged siege. It was a lovely day; and the waves of the (sometimes, not by any means always) blue Mediterranean looked bluer than ever, seen through the white embrasures of the fort, or in contrast with the yellow sand and green feathery palm-trees surrounding the little village of Aboukir. There was Nelson's (or Aboukir) Island; to the shoreward of which he so successfully manoeuvred his fleet, notwithstanding the numerous sandbanks, over which the crisp waves were curling to-day, before the light northerly breeze. I am not sure that I did not take more interest in recalling the events of that battle than in listening to the description of recent events.

On our return to Alexandria, we went to the Gabbari Hospital, where most of our sick soldiers now are. It used to be a cotton store, and having no windows—only shutters—is somewhat dark; but it is large and airy, and contains commodious wards. There were a good many patients, mostly fever cases, some very ill, and all looking haggard and drawn—even more so than those we saw at Cyprus in 1880, I thought. But they were evidently well cared for, and there were any number of doctors to look after them; in fact, more than were necessary, we were told; perhaps, by way of compensating for their insufficiency on the scene of operations during the war. A very pleasant young surgeon showed us round, and gave us many interesting particulars. We next went on board the Carthage hospital ship, which is to go home to-morrow, as she is no longer wanted here, and rather an expensive luxury to keep, costing £20,000 a month, although her accommodation is extremely limited. She is beautifully fitted up, and is now provided with regular navy cots, instead of ordinary passenger berths; which is a great improvement. The sisters in charge told me that what they went through first, before this change was made, in their endeavours to nurse cases of broken thighs and fractures of various kinds, where it is so necessary to be able to get at the patient on either side, was terrible. Miss Stuart showed me all round the ship, and told me a great deal about her work and her patients, past and present. The Carthage is pretty full just now, the sick from Cairo, who are delighted at the idea of going home again, having arrived on board to-day. Almost all the wounded have been sent home already; and only sufferers from fever and other sickness are left in the hospital here. Those with severe coughs or any similar affection are to remain in Egypt until the milder weather sets in; and quite touching it has been to see how they have tried to conceal their symptoms, in order to get back to the dear ones at home in England.

A "nursing-sister!" I wonder how many who read that word realise all that it means, the strict discipline and the total abnegation of self which such a vocation involves. I have the very highest respect for all the sisterhood; especially do I sympathize with those who have known, not better—for that would be impossible—but brighter days. They have the most interesting of all work, I think, to perform, and are encouraged by the knowledge that they are doing immense good in the relief of suffering humanity. Still, in the lonely watches of the night, during the long weary vigils of an anxious case, the tears must sometimes unbidden flow, as memory recalls the days that are no more, and thoughts "retrace their hurried footsteps" to the time when existence was more pleasurable, but not so noble as at present.

Saturday, February 3rd.—We started at ten o'clock this morning for Cairo—a long weary journey, in the comfortable carriages; for the rolling and permanent stock of the line is in very bad condition. An unconscionable time was wasted every small station, half-an-hour being allowed at one place for dinner. Lord Napier and Major Napier were in the same train, and a good many officers and soldiers. On our arrival, an hour late, at Cairo, we found a waggonette awaiting us at the station; and a quick drive through the ever-busy streets brought us to Shepherd's Hotel, where the most polite of managers, Mr. Gross, met us on the steps. The hotel, as usual at this hour of the afternoon, was crowded; most of the European visitors and residents assembling here to listen to or relate the news of the day. We met so many friends, that it was some time before we could escape to the same comfortable suite of rooms we occupied on our way home from our voyage round the world, 1877.

Sunday, February 4th.—Tom and the children breakfasted with the Duke of Sutherland, who arrived yesterday, and has kindly asked us all to go with him by special train to Tel-el-Kebir to-morrow; thus affording Tom a chance of visiting that place before he returns to England. Later on we went to a rather small and very stuffy church, where we heard Dean Butcher preach.

Monday, February 5th.—We started about nine o'clock, in a saloon-carriage attached to a special train, for Tel-el-Kebir, the party consisting of the Duke of Sutherland, Mr. Chaplin, Sir Samuel Baker, Sir Arnold Kemball, Captain Maxwell, Mr. Maxwell, Captain Hunter, Mr. Greg, Mr. Leigh Smith, the Earl of Caithness, Lady Fanny Sinclair, Mr. Stewart, and some others; besides Tom, myself, and the children. The latter were rather young for such an expedition, I thought; but the Duke kindly insisted on their accompanying us, and ordered a special supply of oranges and sweets for them. I think they enjoyed as much as anybody; and we did not see any of the ghastly sights I had heard of and feared for them. We stopped at Zag-a-zig for a short time, and saw the telegraph clerk who so cleverly mystified the Egyptians by his messages after the battle, causing train after train to be sent into the station by the enemy for our use.

Our arrival at Tel-el-Kebir put me somewhat in mind of our South American experiences, the donkeys we were to use having been brought with us from Cairo, just as we used to take horses with us in cattle trucks, in readiness to ride across the Pampas from any station we might stop at. Here the donkeys were quickly got out of the train; and after the usual bustle and confusion, and the special and vociferous recommendation of each particular animal by his attendant owner or driver, the whole party were mounted. Those who were very keen, and had breakfasted before starting, went off to the line at once. Those who were not so well prepared—and they were by far the more numerous—went straight on board a comfortable dahabeeah that has been towed up here by the ever enterprising Mr Cook. There are eight or ten sleeping berths on board, a saloon, and a large covered deck, where an excellent meal was served. I was rather amused the other day to hear of a man who, after considerable hesitation had at last hardened his heart to make the expedition to Tel el Kebir. He provided himself with a tent, tinned provisions, revolvers and I don't know what besides, and talked a great deal about the hardships of camping in the desert. His disgust at finding that there was a floating hotel on the spot, where three meals a day were provided and where donkeys a discretion were to be obtained on which to visit the field of battle, may be imagined. A young officer of the 79th, Mrewart, has a tent pitched close by the station, and has been surveying for some weeks, all by himself. It would be terribly dull, but that he is hard at work all day, and that generally the train brings somebody in the dahabeeah for the night, and gives him a chance of not quite forgetting how to speak his own language.

A mile of a little more than a mile from the station brings you to the first line at Tel el Kebir, which is altogether seven miles long, with five redoubts at intervals, to increase its strength. The second line is not so long, and has no redoubts. About four hundred yards in advance of the first line there is a detached fort, which every reconnoissance from our side failed to discover. As is the case sometimes with an island, which, viewed from the sea, does not detach itself, but appears to be part of the mainland, so this fort did not detach itself from the main line, but, in spite of the closest observation, seemed to form part of it. By some extraordinary and almost unparalleled piece of good fortune, our men, when advancing in the darkness to the attack, passed the fort without attracting attention, for if once they had alarmed the sentries and drawn its fire, the warning of their approach would have been conveyed to the main line and what a different tale of loss of life that of the 15th September would then have been—even if the tide of battle itself had not been changed, as was quite possible! For those four hundred yards our men must have advanced against the deadly fire of the enemy, over a bare sandy plain, without a single irregularity of ground, or bush, stick, or stone, to protect them. The main line itself looked a formidable place to assail, with a deep ditch in front of it, which the assailants must either jump across or scramble through or over as best they could; the bodies of those who fell forming stepping-stones for their more fortunate companions.

Many, in fact most, of the relics of the engagement, possessing any special value or interest, have of course been collected and carried away, either to be kept or sold by their finders: but there are plenty still left. Shot and shell and cartridge cases still strew the ground, interspersed with water-bottles, broken articles of various kinds, and the heavier parts of a soldier's kit; while here and there a larger quantity of cartridges, used and unused, and of spent bullets, show where was the thickest of the fight, and where the struggle, short as ■ was, raged most fiercely; helmets and tarboosha or feses ■ close proximity proving that the contest must have become a hand-to-hand affair at last. Here and there, in various directions, huge mounds mark the spot where many a brave man lies buried, close to where he fell. The painful work of interment was not properly performed in the first instance, the bodies not being sufficiently deeply buried; so that it subsequently became necessary ■ send out detachments of soldiers to complete the task. The officer who was in charge of these burying-parties told me it was the most painful and disagreeable duty he had ever had to perform; which one can well believe. Black crosses in some places now mark the graves of non-commissioned officers; other black crosses, with a number upon them, show where many men of one regiment fell together.

Having ridden nearly the whole length of the first line, and returned by the second, we dismounted and studied the plan of the field of battle, and also examined various parts of the ditch. Mr. Stewart pointed out the place where his men had got in easily, which still shows traces of the conflict; and we also saw where the side of the ditch had been thrown down and the artillery had charged right across it, the marks of the wheels being still plainly visible. It was, indeed, a plucky exploit: but one can scarcely realise how difficult and dangerous ■ was, without actually seeing the depth of the ditch which the guns had to cross. In some of the redoubts there were still large quantities of shot and shell—some that had done their work, and some that had buried themselves harmless in the sand.

After our examination of the Egyptian lines, we were shown the place where the British cavalry came up, and whence a portion of them continued their ride to Cairo. They did not actually cross the lines, the depth of the ditch in front rendering this impossible, but passed round one end of them. The plain between the two entrenchments was more or less strewn with relics, including shells, both live and exploded, with some of which the members of our party loaded themselves. There were very few traces of the conflict near the second lines, the fighting having been practically over before our troops reached them, and the Egyptians having thrown down their arms and fled. By the next day the whole of their army had melted away like snow in a hot sun, and hardly a soldier was to be seen, for they had been forced to fight against their will, and were only too glad to return to their peaceful occupations. During the attack they had, as a rule—perhaps owing in some measure to the angle of the sand parapet—fired much too high, their bullets passing over the heads of those for whom they were intended, and doing almost as much harm to our second lines as to the attacking party. They were either unacquainted with the use of the bayonet, or else were too frightened to avail themselves of their knowledge, for while the Egyptian killed and wounded had many bayonet wounds scarcely one of our men was so injured.

A quick ride brought us back to the station, and we reached Cairo again at seven o'clock. At ten Tom was obliged to start for Alexandria, on his return to England, leaving the children and me to feel very deserted and lonely. I should dearly have liked to have gone back with him, for many reasons, but my cough was still very bad, and the doctor would not hear of my returning to a colder climate. Even here the weather is still treacherous, a hot sun and a cold wind making the risk of taking cold very great. We are one and all glad to get round the fire in the early morning and in the evening, and yet the mosquitoes are most troublesome, and buzz hungrily, angrily, and annoyingly, outside the curtains, when, as is too frequently the case, unable to sleep, I write or read for two or three hours in the morning, before daybreak, by the light of a candle.

Wednesday, February 7th — Mr. MacLennan Wallace, the children, and I started at eight o'clock for the Pyramids. It was a lovely day, though the wind was rather cold, and we had a pleasant drive, rendered specially interesting by the presence of our companion, who pointed out to us several places where some of the principal incidents of the occupation had taken place. There was Arabi's prison, a little corner room in a house close by the present headquarters staff, and there was the large square in the centre of the Gezireh Barracks, where Arabi was publicly degraded. It was a very unimposing ceremony, I hear from those who witnessed it. Few people were present, and the sentence was read out in an almost inaudible voice by an insignificant little man in an Egyptian uniform. There was no breaking of the sword, nor any of the usual forms which are gone through on such an occasion, and when it was over, and Arabi drove away, the English soldiers quartered in the barracks, who were looking out of the windows or hanging over the balconies, cheered him—I suppose as a mark of sympathy with a fallen foe. After his sentence, the justice of which is difficult of comprehension to the Egyptian, and perhaps to a few other minds, those who saw most of him say that he was chiefly occupied with considerations of his own comfort, and the arrangements to be made for his journey to Ceylon. His wife was not well enough to travel, and is still here, but is to follow him in a few months. The general impression seems to be that he was a puppet in the hands of cleverer and more unscrupulous men than himself, rather than the actual instigator of the rebellion. He was, of course, the nominal leader of the movement, but the others are responsible for some of the worst plots and crimes, which he had neither the brains to conceive nor the courage to execute. At first, bitter disappointment was felt here that Arabi was not hanged. That feeling had subsided somewhat, but has recently been revived by the evacuation of the men who were concerned in the murders that took place at Tantah in July last.

On the Gezireh Budge, and for many miles beyond, we met crowds of Arabs, with their camels and donkeys, coming in laden with berseem (a sort of clover), and sugar cane.

Arrived at the foot of the Pyramids of Cheops, we were surrounded by the usual crowd of shrieking, gesticulating Arabs, anxious to take us to the top, or in all events to exhibit their own skill and agility by running in the shortest possible space of time up and down one and then to the top of another, which is paved at the summit, and affords but little hold for the feet. Then we went on donkeys round the Sphinx to see several tombs and temples, now more or less imbedded in the sand, and to get a good view of the Pyramids. Marvellous monuments are they of the greatness and yet the littleness of human power! That one man, in those far distant days, should have had authority to command such a lasting monument to be built, and cause it to be completed, in order to commemorate himself and his dynasty, and yet that his very name should be lost to posterity! Surely, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity."

We got back to Cairo before one o'clock, and in the afternoon went to the Victoria Hospital—or Lady Strangford's Hospital, as it is generally called here, since it was she who, at much personal trouble, inaugurated it, collected the subscriptions for its establishment and maintenance, procured the gift of Arab's house from the Government, and, with her excellent staff of trained nurses, managed it throughout the war, and for some time afterwards, thereby earning the gratitude of many.

Thursday, February 8th—This morning we went to Helwán by the 11.30 tram, which we very nearly missed, being stopped on our way to the station by the funeral procession of the Russian Consul General, M. de Lox, which was nearly two miles long.

Helwán is situated in the desert, about fifteen miles from Cairo, on the opposite side of the river to the Pyramids of Sakkarah, and the ruins of the city of Memphis, the most ancient capital of Egypt. The sulphur springs for which the place is noted are supposed to possess peculiar efficacy in some cases of disease, and a large hotel has now been built, where people stay in order to take the waters and inhale the fresh, pure air of the desert. On account of the well-known healthiness of the spot, a large camp of cavalry and infantry has been established at Helwán. I believe the men find it a very dull place, but the officers manage to get up to Cairo pretty often. Colonel Chapman, of the 7th Dragoon Guards, met us at the station, and we first went with him to see all the horses that were coming to be watered in troops at some primitive water troughs. They seemed fearfully thirsty, poor beasts, and some could with difficulty be restrained until the troop before them had finished and retired, and the bugle sounded for the next troop to advance. Most of the horses had been through the campaign, and they almost all looked well, though I was surprised that, in spite of the heat, many had not yet lost their winter coats—some, indeed, looking just like bears, so rough and woolly were they. We went all through the camp, which was much like other camps, and seemed extremely comfortable and well arranged, and visited the mess-rooms, the canteens, and the recreation room for the men, which had a nice little theatre at the end, and was well supplied with newspapers. The mail had just arrived, and groups were gathered round every illustrated paper, the vagaries and flights of imagination indulged in by some of the artists, in depicting the various scenes and incidents of the war, giving rise to much laughter and many amusing remarks.

Friday, February 9th—Lord Dornier called for me at ten o'clock to take me to the bazaar. A very pleasant morning we spent in the most picturesque of streets and shops, sometimes only gazing on the many living pictures which every corner presented, sometimes bargaining for curtains and carpets. I delight in all Eastern bazaars, and some of those in Cairo are specially good. The carpet bazaar is the most picturesque of all, and therefore my favourite. The curious overhanging balconies and quaint stone niches, each occupied by a Persian or Arabian carpet merchant, in long flowing robes of bright colours, form a fitting background to the rich dark colours of the rugs and carpets, brought from Persia, Smyrna, and elsewhere. If you wish to see ■ to full advantage you must try to choose a moment when there are no Franks in that special corner of the bazaar at which you are looking. Without them, you may imagine yourself living once more in the time of the Arabian Nights; but a party of tourists soon dispels all illusions, and brings you back from dreamland to the prosaic realities of every-day modern life in Cairo.

In the afternoon we went to the races at Gezireh. The racecourse is close to one of the Khedive's palaces, on the very spot where the English army were encamped when they first arrived in Cairo. A portion of the centre of a temporary-looking grand-stand was raised off for the Khedive, his ministers, and the foreign representatives and their wives. The Khedive sat in the middle, in a gilt chair, with red velvet cushions, having Lady Helen Blackwood (her mother, Lady Dufferin, not being there) on his right, the French Minister's wife on his left, and the other diplomats, with their wives and daughters, close by. Tewfik is a pleasant-looking man, with the most agreeable manners, but with a weak face, which, when you look at it, makes you cease to wonder that he should have been able to do so little ■ relieve the troubles of his country. His handsome though somewhat effeminate features, his pink and white complexion, his embonpoint figure, and his languid attitudes, were in striking contrast with the bearded and bronzed soldiers and the various foreign Ministers; and, in fact, with the whole of his European surrounding. All the royal princesses were present; and on one side of the stand was an enclosure entirely reserved for the harem carriages, well guarded by slaves and eunuchs. The stand was crowded; and as every officer was in uniform, the scene was a gay one. I always like soldiers' races: they are so cheery; and when the riders are all gentlemen, and one knows most of them, one's interest is greatly increased. Mr. Stewart rode a horse called "Sunbeam" ■ one of the steeplechases, his colours curiously enough being a light blue, exactly like that of the frocks that the children were wearing. They of course were greatly interested in this race, and particularly in the water-jump which we went to see. Unfortunately poor "Sunbeam" would not look at it, which caused great disappointment; and we hurried back to the stand just in time to see the favourite, Prince Ahmed Pacha's "Obeyan," win.

In the evening I dined with Lord and Lady Dufferin, and had a long talk with Sir Evelyn Wood, from whom I heard a great deal about the Egyptian army. He seems well pleased with the soldiers, and says they are only too good; and that ■ is quite a novel experience for him to have so many men under his command, without a single complaint being made against any of them. The only fault ■ has to find with them ■ that they are altogether too meek and mild. He has been trying to teach them to salute instead of to salaam, and to look up instead of down; a work ■ which he finds some difficulty, the change being so entirely opposed to their notions of respect ■ their superiors. He has made himself extremely popular among them by reforming some of the abuses of which they had reason to complain. They now get their pay regularly—much to their surprise—and every hundred men have a hundred rations issued to them, instead of only ninety-five or ninety-seven as was formerly the case, the rest having been kept back as backsheesh by the contractor, who naturally does not approve of the new order of things.

People here differ as widely as they do at home about the future of Egypt. One man, who ought to know, expressed an opinion that in two years time, under our rule, Egypt would be quite a different country, and that it would be our own fault if it were not so. Another, with equally good opportunities of forming an opinion, said he thought we were not severe enough, and that we should never do any good until we were; another that all the Egyptians wanted was "the stick, and plenty of it;" another, that a couple of years of Russian rule was what was required.

Sir Alfred Hornsford has just returned from his trip up the Nile, and gives a favourable account of everything, so that I hope our proposed expedition will be a success. It involves giving up Madam Nubar Pacha's dance on Monday, and General Dornier's bal-poudre on Tuesday. The latter, judging from the accounts of his bal-costumé, ■ more to be a pretty sight and a great success. Most of the princesses from the harems went to the last ball and enjoyed looking on immensely, I believe. They were put in a room behind curtains hung across an archway, whence they could survey the novel scene. I wonder what they thought of their Western sisters' manners and customs, which they could never have had the chance of seeing before, though it is perhaps possible that they may have read about them.

NIGHT

By CHARLES GRINDROD,

AUTHOR OF "PLAYS FROM ENGLISH HISTORY," ETC

THE sunset fades into a common glow
 A deeper shadow all the valley fills
 The trees are ghostlier in the fields below
 The river runs more darkly through the hills
 Only the Night bird's voice the coppice thills, Stirring the very leaves into a sense
 A witching stillness holds the breath of things
 Earth hath put on her garb of reverence,
 As when a nun within a cloister sings
 To mourn a passing soul before it wings.
 Silent as dew now falls the straight winged Night.
 Clear overhead (God's still imaginings),
 Shining like Hope, through very darkness bright,
 Star follows star, till heaven is all alight

SUNDAY READINGS.

Revelation and Luke xii 13-21

I PROPOSE to take for our Sunday evening readings during this and the following month, The Seven Words or sayings spoken by our Lord upon the Cross We must ap proach the consideration in the spirit of devotion rather than of criticism, and with a deep sense of how shallow at the best must be our apprehension of their meaning For we must love as He loved before we can fully understand what "was for Him" to be despised and rejected of men," we must be holy as He was ■ before we can comprehend the horror with which sin affected Him, and we must share His fellowship with God ere we can measure the weight with which "the reproaches of those who reproached" the Father "fell upon Him."

On the Friday morning, when Jesus was led from Jerusalem to Calvary, He had for several hours been undergoing the severest mental and physical strain, and now, between eight and nine in the morning, He was led forth to die. We can somewhat understand the physical suffering, but who can measure what it was for Him to contemplate the true meaning and consequences ■ what these men were perpetrating? That His mind was then filled with some such thought is evident from what He said ■ the women who were touched by the spectacle of One so pure and gentle being led to torture, "Weep not for Me, but weep for yourselves and for your children." Outside the gate, close to the city walls, was a garden, and the "place of a skull"—not a hill, as Calvary is so often called. It was near the public road, so that the crowds of pilgrims streaming into Jerusalem became witnesses of the dreadful scene, and there also, hurried along by the seething mob, were Mary the mother of Jesus, and St. John, and Mary Magdalene, and others whose hearts were breaking.

Crucifixion was not a Jewish, but a Roman form of punishment, and was generally reserved for slaves and murderers. Its cruelty consisted in the protracted nature of the suffering it inflicted. The victim generally lingered three or four days, and died eventually of fever and exhaustion. The Roman cross was not high, as generally represented in works of art, but was so low that the crucified was elevated only two or three feet above the crowd. Nor did the sufferer hang by the nailed hands and feet, being chiefly supported on a projecting piece of wood, which served in a measure as a seat. Again, it was usual to attach the victim to the cross before ■ was raised to its upright position.

And thus we may imagine the manner in which the events recorded in the Gospels actually occurred. When Jesus arrived at Calvary they handed Him the beverage of wine mingled with myrrh, which it was the merciful custom to give to the condemned to deaden sensibility. But He ■ made the alleviating draught. He would drink with unclouded consciousness "the cup which His Father had given him to drink."

Jesus was then stripped, stretched on the wood, and nailed ■ it. And it was in all probability as the cross was raised, when not only the first pang of suffering was experienced, but, for the first time, when thus lifted above the crowd His eye fell on the sea of faces around Him—not a face in it which did not seem to say, "I hate you!"—and when there rushed upon His soul the sense of utter rejection; that then, looking up from those dreadful facts to the calm heaven, He breathed the first majestic word from the cross, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!" "All they that see me laugh me to scorn, they shoot out the lip, they open their mouths as a ravening and roaring lion. . . . But Thou art holy, ■ Thou that inhabitest the praises of Israel." That glance down on the hell of hatred boiling around Him was for Him the first stab of death. "He had come to His own, and His own had received Him not." At such a moment His bodily suffering would be forgotten. For what father among us, were his own child to smite him on the face, would care for the pain of the blow, compared ■ the hatred of which it was the expression? And so was it that in Jesus all thought of self was forgotten under the acute agony of His wounded Spirit. He had ever been revealing God's own truth and goodness, and now they have crucified Him between thieves, and every voice around the cross shouts its scorn. "Verily, now have they seen and hated both me and my Father." But He, "being reviled, reviles not again." He meets it all with the prayer, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

These words may impress us as the most wonderful illustration of the Spirit which He had always enforced in His teaching. His love being tried was revealed in power. And they also show the love that is in God. Except He had known that there was that in the Father's heart to which He could appeal, He could not have prayed, "Father, forgive them!" He knew that His own love was in harmony with the love of God, and so, not as trying to change the Father's mind, but as knowing the Father, He gazed up beyond the storm of suffering and shame to the cloudless glory of the Divine Goodness, and said, "Forgive them!"

And His prayer was a righteous prayer. "They knew not what they were doing." If they had known it, and ■ full consciousness of the act had rejected the Divine Son, Jesus could not have so prayed. But so far were they from knowing it, that they thought they were doing God service. Many a one who that day was reviling Him was soon to be crying out at Pentecost, "What shall we do?" Many a voice then blaspheming Him is now joining in the anthem of the redeemed. And so methinks may the same righteous intercession ■ going on still for many who may ■ ignorance be crucifying the Lord afresh. We are encouraged to believe that many who in our judgment are enemies of Christ, may nevertheless draw forth from His lips only the prayer, "Father, forgive them, they know not what they are doing." For, alas! how many pure, generous minds have there not been in all ages among those who have pierced Him! How many too who deemed they were loyal to the God of Truth when they rejected Christ? They did not know Him. They had rejected, perhaps, man's misrepresentations of Christ, rather than Christ Himself. And can we doubt that He who understood the real meaning of their lives felt for them and interceded for them as He did for those Jewish fanatics, "who knew not what they were doing"?

APRIL 13TH.

Read Psalm lxxv. 1-21, Job xx. 29-47.

When the cross was raised, then, for the first time the title fixed on it by Pilate became visible. It was placed there by him in three languages to throw discredit on the Messianic hopes of the people. It was really an unconscious prophecy of Christ's glory. But when the inscription was read by the crowd, in which were pilgrims from all parts of the world, the studied affront which Pilate had inflicted on the nation was understood. Immediately deputies, headed by the High-priest, went to the Governor to have it removed. They were met by the stubborn refusal, "What I have written, I have written." It was probably at this time, when the bitterest of our Lord's enemies and the more fanatical of the mob were away, and when there was a certain pause in the storm of mockery, that the friends of Jesus found ■ possible to approach near to the cross. The Roman soldiers were too absorbed casting lots for His garments to interfere with them. When the other disciples had fled then these women and St. John, almost womanly in his tenderness, passed through the horrors of the crowd and went up to the terrible cross. Of this sort is indeed the strength of woman. St. Peter might draw the sword, and be willing to die fighting for his Master, but, stronger than man in the might of her love, it is woman's part to draw near ■ the wounded, and to suffer the sight of blood and pain, if she can only soothe by her presence the agonies of the beloved.

"When Jesus, therefore, saw His mother, and the disciple standing by, whom He loved, he saith unto His mother, Woman, behold thy son! Then saith he to the disciple, Behold thy mother!"

(1.) There is here a certain tone of farewell. As on other occasions He addresses his mother by the name "Woman," which according to Greek usage was not ■ disrespectful form of address. Yet that there should never be an instance during His ministry of His calling her by the name "Mother," ■ a suggestive fact in the light of the after history of the Church. And now, as He dies, he acknowledges indeed His relationship, and by His care for her temporal wants, He reveals the tenderness of His love; yet His farewell ■ couched in such terms as to convey the further thought—"Though thou hast known me after the flesh, yet, now henceforth thou shalt know me no more. Behold thy son!" And so we find the new relationship recognised by her. Only once again do we meet with Mary in the New Testament, and she is then a believer among the believers—one of the hundred and twenty who were waiting in Jerusalem for the Promise which they had received from Him.

(2.) There is a certain farewell of another kind. It may have been that she, like the other disciples, expected some sudden deliverance. "God will surely deliver Him"—they might have thought—"seeing He delighted in Him." But His mercifully dispels that dream. The other son and the other home of which he spoke, indicated plainly that separation and death were inevitable.

(3.) And this saying illustrates, too, our Lord's faithfulness to the commoner duties. Nay, there seems in this word to St. John a further hint of tenderness and consideration, as if He had said, "Take her away, let her not see it all!" St. John seems so to have understood Him—"from that very hour he took her unto his own home." And thus was she in His love spared the spectacle of the indignities and the terrible darkness, and the heaving of the piercing cry.

(4.) And may we not see ■ that new home where Mary is with St. John, a faint picture of the new fellowship in Christ which in the subsequent history of the Church has bound hearts together in ties closer than earthly relationships? How often have not the same words been spoken in the name of Jesus, and desolate mothers have found sons, and orphan children have found parents, through the love of Him who gave Himself for us! It is Christ's love which alone can inspire the spirit of a boundless charity. For let us hear what that same ■ John who took Mary to his home has written—"Hereby perceive we the love of Christ, because He laid down His life for ■ and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren. But whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him? My little children let us love not in word or in tongue, but in deed and in truth."

Road Psalm cxxx I who 22 : 35-43

The most cursory reader of the Gospels cannot fail to notice that the sequence of the events of the Crucifixion is not given in the same order by the different Evangelists. One omits a circumstance related by the other, and the other brings into prominence what is only alluded to by the rest. We are, therefore, at liberty ■ construct for ourselves that sequence which recommends itself as being most likely to have been the true one.

Last Sunday evening we pictured the approach of the women and St John to the cross, as having occurred when the priests and scribes, and the most fanatical of the mob, had gone to Pilate to beg the removal of the title from the cross. But on the return of the deputation, followed by the wilder enthusiasts, the storm of mockery broke into redoubled fury. Baffled in their petition to the Governor and enraged that He who had claimed to ■ the Messiah should bear the very title for assuming which they had crucified Him, they level all possible scorn ■ Him. The people going past on the road join them, the rabble shout and jibe, and the soldiers rejoice to insult the Jews by insulting their would-be king, and during all this time, the priests and elders and scribes were moving among the crowd and stirring up their passions. For there is a suggestive difference in the form of speech adopted by the leaders from that which the people used. The populace speak to Christ, "Thou that destroyest the Temple and buildest it in three days, save thyself." "If thou be the Christ save thyself and come down from the cross." The soldiers also speak to Christ, lifting up a cup of their sour wine, as if pledging Him, while they cry, "King of the Jews, save thyself!" But the priests speak about Christ as if they were busy rousing the multitude to a wilder rage. "He saved others, Himself he cannot save." "He trusted in God, let Him deliver Him, seeing He trusted in Him." "If He be the King of Israel, let Him come down from the cross, and we will believe Him."

These were bitter words, and yet they were unintentionally a wonderful confession of the glory of Jesus, and a revelation of their own sinful unbelief. Truth and falsehood were mixed up in them. They said, "Himself he cannot save." In one sense that was false, for He could have summoned the legion of angels for His deliverance. He had "power to lay down His life and power to take it again." And yet they expressed the deepest truth. "Himself he could not save." There were moral restraints which made that impossible. He could not save Himself and let the world perish. "Save self!" cried the priests, and their words were the echo of the very Kingdom of Satan. Thus had been the devil's lie from the first. "Save Thine own will, Thy passions, Thy comfort, Thy self—life in whatever form it may please Thee." Such had been the temptation in the Wilderness, when the devil tried to lead the Divine Son to use His power for self independent of God. And now in that which was "the hour and power of darkness," these priests and rulers become his mouthpiece. But Jesus, with hands stretched to the nails, revealed the glory of the new kingdom of the Son. It was His to yield self as a living sacrifice.

There was a further element of truth in their taunt. "If He be the King of the Jews, let Him come down now from the cross and we will believe in Him!" But what would they then have really believed about Him? They would have accepted Him, ■ may be, as Messiah in their false conception of what the Messiah ought to be. They would have regarded Him as a great magician—a political leader who by means of His magical powers might fulfil their ambitious dreams. But they could not, thereby, have learned to recognise the real glory of Christ, as King in the spiritual kingdom ■ righteousness, obedience, and self-sacrificing love. That glory was shining in its fullest radiance on the cross of sacrifice. That was the very throne of His true power.

We have to recollect this for our own good. If we really confess that He who thus would not save Himself, but obeyed God even ■ the death, is the One we worship and serve, let us take care that we ■ so in our lives by following in His footsteps, and that we accept for ourselves the laws of that Kingdom in which love reigns supreme and self is surrendered.

APRIL 37TH.

Read Psalm XXXII, I also xv 7-10

And while the storm of mockery thus raged against Him, Who, in His patience was firmly submissive to the Divine law of love and obedience, a new voice joined in the tide of cursing. One of the thieves began to rail at Him.

■ is probable that the crimes for which these robbers were dying were connected with some of those bands of marauders who, under false Christs, then infested Judea, and, under the guise of patriotism, were no better than fierce banditti. They thus combined a certain religious fanaticism with a life of crime. One of these robbers was now dying in agony, and his passion turned itself into blasphemy against Jesus. There is a wild, half-despairing hope in his cry, "Save Thyself and us." He thinks of Christ's power as a power which may be used at will—no matter the purpose—and as Christ heeds him not, his anger is the deeper stured, so that he rails at Him. But the torrent of rebuke receives a sudden check. The other malefactor calls past Christ to his old companion, "Dost thou not fear God, seeing we are in the same condemnation? And we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds: but this man hath done nothing amiss." And then with earnest accent he prays to Christ: "Lord, remember me when thou comest in thy kingdom." Jesus, whose silence under reproach had never been broken, at once responded to this cry: "Verily, to day shalt thou be with me in Paradise."

When we first read this prayer and the rapid answer, and recollect that the man who prayed was a robber suffering deserved punishment, we may experience some surprise at his sudden acceptance by Christ. We ask, "Is there not something arbitrary here? What of the necessity, elsewhere expressed, for repentance and faith?" Further consideration will show that ■ far from being an exception the case of this man is an illustration of the law, for that ■ had indeed passed from darkness to light before he entered the promised Paradise.

There can be no doubt as to the sincerity with which a man thus on the brink of the grave would speak. Now notice the solemn thought which was uppermost in his mind—"Dost thou not fear God?" he asks his dying companion. Here ■ the key to his penitence. He realises the glory of the unseen Judge before whom he is about to appear, and his own responsibility to Him, and this produces a deep sense of sinfulness. He confesses, "I am justly condemned, I receive the due reward of my deeds." He makes no excuse. He has no glimmering hope that his sentence may be mitigated. He condemns himself, and meets the righteousness of the law which had condemned him with an "Amen," because he had deserved it all.

Again, consider not only "his repentance towards God," but also "his faith towards the Lord Jesus Christ." "Lord," ■ says—not "Rabbi" or "Prophet"—but "Lord, remember me when thou comest in thy kingdom." Such faith at such a time is marvellous. He thus addresses One Who is weak, blasphemed, dying. ■ was when Mary and John had gone away, and when, among those around Him, there was not one that believed in Him, but when every representative of the Church and of the world was scorning Him, that this thief called Him Lord, and spoke of Him ■ coming in His kingdom. He was perhaps the only person in the world who at that moment recognised the full majesty of Jesus, and was willing to trust Him. We wonder what previous circumstances could have suggested such faith. Had he formerly heard Jesus and seen His miracles? Had he listened to His confession before Pilate? And had the events of that day, and the sublime bearing of the great sufferer, revealed the deep meaning of it all? That we cannot tell. We can only marvel at his faith now, under such circumstances. His prayer is not only full of faith, it is touching in its humility. He makes no definite request, he utters but this simple "remember me" of penitence and desire. Like the woman of Canaan who would take the place ■ the very dogs, if she could but gather the crumbs that fell beneath the Master's table, so does this man cast himself entirely on the mercy of Christ. We were, I think, therefore warranted in saying that his was an instance of very real conversion, for he had come to see his sin in the light of God, and had learned the majesty of the suffering Christ, Who, though now despised and rejected of men, would yet come ■ His own glory and in that of the Father.

And Christ met this prayer with the kindly and gracious answer, "To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." On that cross as on a throne, we see Him dispensing judgment. As sublimely calm He opens the kingdom of heaven to this penitent, we see the glory of the higher crown casting its aureole around the crown of thorns.

And how tenderly He meets the wants of the sufferer! The man was perhaps looking forward to days of protracted agony. But Jesus tells him of release that very day. Not in the dim future—but ere that sun had set would ■ be with his Lord in Paradise!

And can we not imagine how precious that voice of faith must have been to the Lord? If "for the joy that was set before Him He endured the cross and despised the shame"—must not the confidence of this dying malefactor, who, in spite of the shame which others were heaping on Him, cried, "Lord, remember me!" have been a forecast of that coming glory when He shall receive the praises of the multitude which no man can number? Thus seeing of the travail of His soul He must have felt, even on the cross, some foretaste of His eternal satisfaction.

We do not even enter on the discussion of what is meant by Paradise. ■ was enough for the dying thief to know that he was to be with Christ. The conditions of the future life are necessarily involved for us now in great mystery. But Christ removes all terror from His own children with one word of promise, "Where I am, there shall ye be also." This surely may suffice us, and help us to leave all other questions until "that day shall reveal them."

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST.

. J. MILDRE HENNING

By SARAH TYTLER, AUTHOR OF "CITIZENNE JACQUELINE," "LADY BELL," ETC

CHAPTER XIV—MISS COMPTON'S BAIL.

LADY Fermor was as good as her word. She brought Lord Fermor up to that point of recovery which made it permissible and not outrageous that a bail should take place in his house of Lambford, where he was dragging out his weary days.

The bail had come ■ be called Miss Compton's bail, without any objection on the part of Lady Fermor, although she suggested an improvement.

"It may also bear the name of my worthy young neighbour, Sir William Thwaite," said the old lady demurely. "It ■ his first bail ■ Eastham, as ■ my grand-daughter's first bail at Lambford. Let ■ be Miss Compton and Sir William Thwaite's bail, if you please. Anknard to couple the two names together, do you think? Oh! I don't mind it," declared Lady Fermor, with such an unblushing amount of candour, that it sounded as if there were something under it, something to excuse the indiscretion.

But the persons appealed ■ judged that the union of names was premature, ■ say the least. Even supposing Miss Compton and Sir William had got so far as a betrothal, England was not Germany, where betrothals were announced like marriages, and betrothed pairs appeared in public together the same as husband and wife. As for Lady Fermor, she did not care what the hypocrites and fools called the bail if they came to it, and it served her purpose.

Mrs Mildmay and his wife lent Lambford their countenance for the event. He was simply and strictly polite as usual. She looked frightened to speak or move lest she should compromise herself, while she stuck to her husband like his shadow, as if she might require his protection at any moment.

"Does the good woman think I shall take a bite of her?" protested Lady Fermor in one of her slight asides. But both Mrs Mildmay and Lady Fermor knew it was not being bitten but being socially contaminated that the lady dreaded. It was a little compensation to her, for being dragged down to face this horrible ordeal, to be able to take stock, covertly, of the possessions among which she was to reign as the future Lady Fermor. Mrs. Mildmay did not count Iris one of these possessions, and would almost as soon have proposed to be on confidential terms with the wicked old grandmother as with the innocent young grand-daughter. In fact Mrs. Mildmay, though she was not worse than other colourless, cowardly, self-engrossed women, had very little doubt that Miss Compton's innocence was nothing better than a callow stage of wickedness, and felt disposed to regard ■ as more insidious, if less repulsive, than the advanced stages.

Iris was glad to turn from the chill of Mrs. Mildmay's unthawed reserve, and her constant withdrawal to her husband's side, to the friendly presence of Lucy Acton, who had been allowed to spend a few days at Lambford to support Iris on the great occasion of her ball. It was something like a preparation for home gaiety to have Lucy on one of her rare visits, and to grow enthusiastic in her company over the dresses, the decorations, the dancing, the supper. Iris would have taken delight in them all had she not been behind the scenes, whereas Lucy happened to be a matter of fact girl, who took things as she found them, and did not seek to look below the surface. She was a good daughter, and an assiduous helper of her father and mother, both with the parish and the younger children. She was a faithful friend to Iris, and paid back with easy fondness the girl's fervent affection. But Lucy Acton was not gifted either with much sensitiveness of feeling or discrimination of character. She was inferior to Iris both in heart and mind. Her personal appearance was of less consequence, but in this case the body reflected the spirit. Lucy Acton was a well-grown, rather comely, but perfectly commonplace looking young gentlewoman, the colour of whose hair and eyes, and the shape of whose nose and mouth, though quite well defined, her acquaintances were constantly in danger of forgetting. A crown on her head and a sceptre in her hand would not have made her look otherwise than a contented every-day individual. But Lucy was worth a great deal to Iris, and the solitary girl warmed into something of the pride and pleasure which the ball at home called for. The two girls were excitedly comparing notes on all the important items that belong to such an entertainment—surreptitiously inspecting the ball room and supper room—dwelling in delighted half-mystification on what was to be the distinguishing characteristic of the evening—fluttering from Iris's room to Lucy's to gaze upon this dress or that, and compare these flowers and those, and study the programme till they had by heart.

"It must be nice for you to have a ball at Lambford, dear," said Lucy in all sincerity. "You are the young lady of the house, and therefore the queen of the ball. It is for you to confer honour and bestow pleasure, though you may kindly share your good things. Won't you like it very much? I am so glad Lady Fernor thought of it at last."

"Yes, it is kind of grandmamma," said Iris, hesitating a little, with a momentary cloud coming over her small face. "Of course I like to have a ball of my own, and to invite my friends. They are not very many now—that is one drawback," she remarked quickly. "Other girls are happy in loads of home relations and family friends. Where there is an affair of this kind, the house itself is overflowing with kindred near and remote. But grandpapa and grandmamma are old, and have outlived whole generations, and that makes a difference," she broke off with a sigh.

She had conjured up a vision such as she had read of, rather than seen, of a girl with loving sisters and brothers, with a mother of whom she was proud, who held her child dear, and a father whom she could trust implicitly, who guarded her as the apple of his eye—a family who were among the salt of the earth, whose friendship was coveted and prized by like-minded people, arriving in troops to take part in their festival.

"But in that case you would not be the one queen, with an undisputed, undivided sovereignty. I know there are girls who hate the idea of rivals, even in their own family, and are ready to be thankful that they have no sisters to come in and claim any portion of the attention that falls to their share. But there is no use in speaking of them, for I know you are not a bit like them. As for myself, I must say I should not care to be without King Lud, and Susan, and George, and the rest—not to say without the poor dear father and mother, to be handed back to a former generation. I have not more than one grandmother living, the kindest granny in the world, at Birkett, you know, Iris," said the literal Lucy. "But it's the will of Providence, and we must all submit to the will of Providence," she quoted glibly from her stereotyped speeches by cottage mock beds and in the Sunday-school. "We ought to make the best of things, and to feel contented and cheerful, as I know you do, Iris. Only I don't know why you let your deprivations—we all have our deprivations—it would not be good for us if we had not—crop up on the afternoon of your ball. You are not badly off for a birthday treat this year, and I do hope that Mr. and Mrs. Mildmay behave well to you."

Iris winced a little at this suggestion, even from Lucy Acton. Neither of the girls knew a great deal of the old, miserable embroilments of the family, but they were acquainted with the general outline—that Tom Mildmay was the son of Lord Fernor's younger brother, who had, further, married a sister of the first Lady Fernor. It was understood that there had been an entire breach between the two branches of the family for many years, and that though young Mildmay submitted to a patched-up reconciliation for his own interest, he looked with hostile eyes, under his cold courtesy, on Lady Fermor and all her belongings. Mrs. Fermor, though she was his cousin once removed, was also Lady Fermor's grand daughter and heiress. In the last light she was likely to contest with Mr. Mildmay such money as the old Lord could "will away," either with or from the entailed estate. When it is further taken into consideration that John Mildmay was a married man and the father of a family, that he had only the modest income of a moderately successful barrister, tacked on to Lord Fermor's allowance to his heir at law, wherewith to maintain his household, it may be argued that he would have been more than human if he had been able to entertain a strong regard for Mrs. Fermor. It was the credit of both that, in their formal intercourse, he could preserve towards her a species of neutrality.

"My dear Lucy, there is not a fault to be found with the Mildmays' behaviour, unless, indeed, they behave too well," replied Mrs. Fermor hastily. "They are never off their good behaviour, as people sometimes say of children, with rather a stand off result, to be sure."

"Then you ought to be satisfied," Lucy hastened to say, with a tone of sensible, affectionate reproach. "You should not spoil your grand birthday ball with crying for the moon, and raving up bugbears of trials and troubles."

"I don't mean to spoil anything," insisted Mrs. Fermor, still a little ruefully. "But it is not my birthday ball, that is another contradiction, my birthday was on the 29th of June, as you remembered, when you sent me that pretty, kind card. I spent all alone without even you to speak to, grandpapa was lying at his worst, grandmamma would not come down, and she did not care for me to go up and help her to nurse him. But I did try to submit and make the best of things. It was a lovely day and I had a new book which I cared for, and took with me into the woods. Fancy how delightful they were while they were still fresh and full of flowers, and all the birds were singing! Mrs. Pole had baked a cake or my express benefit, and Susan and Georgie an oven to inquire for grandpapa, in time or afternoon tea, and helped me to eat it. Then we heard poor grandpapa was better and had enjoyed some hours of refreshing sleep. I am not sure whether a ball like his which we are going to have, would have made me so very much happier on my real birthday than I was, after all."

"That is going to the opposite extreme!

and talking nonsense still," said Lucy briskly. "I won't have you grow unsocial, but it is more likely you will have your little head turned with the compliments and flattery and all that sort of thing which you will be receiving presently. It is rather a pity that it is later in the season than the 29th of June, for then it was moderately cool, while the 30th of July is really too hot for anything save a garden party. I wonder Lady Fermor did not change the ball into a garden party, Mrs. Fermor."

"She was set on the ball and had made her arrangements, besides, I fancy garden parties were not so common when she was young. However, we are to have something of the kind too, and you will be there, Lucy. Mind you must not cheat us of our due, and escape to a mothers' meeting, or a cottage reading at the other end of the parish. The Mildmays have half-consented to stay and go, and Lady Thwaite is to preside, though it was grandmamma's idea, and I believe it was her influence which brought it about."

"I am not going to make any difficulty, I am not often in such request," said Lucy merrily. "I enjoy a treat just as much as the school children do. But you have never told me where this one is to be."

"At Whitehill, at Sir William Thwaite's," said Mrs. Fermor composedly. "He is to have the second cutting of hay in the water meadows just beyond the park, to-morrow. We are all to go down after luncheon to look on at the hay making, and I suppose to help also if we have a weakness for playing at Daphnes and Chloes. Lady Thwaite is to give us tea in her old drawing-room. Poor soul! I dare say she will not like it, though she can laugh and carry off her troubles as well as most people. The Rector thinks she has behaved beautifully to Sir William, though, as you say, we all have our deprivations. Oh, Lucy," went on Mrs. Fermor in the rambling manner of a person who is saying everything that is crowding into her head—without stopping to classify the materials. "I should not be surprised if the Hollises were there. Grandmamma will take care that they have an invitation. I think the hay making will help us to subside gracefully into our usual soberness. I have only been at two or three balls before, and I confess I felt headachy and dawdling and do nothing, for days after the ball."

Lucy had heard the name of the host, and of his local habitation, with a modified "oh!" She was too busy a girl to be quite familiar with all the last resident gossip which served to confirm idle guesses and audacious prognostications. But she knew enough, to have put ■ to any other girl as intimate with her ■ Iris Compton, whether she were going to marry Sir William Thwaite. But somehow Lucy could not ask such a question of Iris Compton. Girls, especially fairly educated, well bred girls, may be very good friends, without exchanging love confidences. In this case there was none to exchange. Iris had none, and if she had, the greater depth and delicacy of her nature would have made her shy of confiding it, till the very last moment, to her dearest friend.

It seemed only the other day that Iris and Lucy Acton had speculated, with the rest of their world, on the anomaly of a clownish squire at Whitehills, and asked each other if he would be fit ■ enter a drawing room, and how they should shake hands with him when he might swing their arms like a pendulum or crush their rings into their fingers. What should they find ■ say to him, especially if they wished ■ propitiate him—supposing Lucy sought a subscription for her pet cottage hospital or any one of her missions, and Iris was solicitous to abet her?

When brought to the test the difficulty had not proved as insurmountable to a girl with an exceptionally tender heart and single mind. But Lucy had only an inkling of this, while it struck her that Sir William's name was constantly coming up in the conversation.

On Iris's tablets, which were not left clean ivory, it was recorded that she was to have Mr. Hollis for her first partner, while Mr. Mildmay was to dance with Mrs. Hollis. This was a piece of county etiquette. Iris again, as a piece of family etiquette, was to waltz the first waltz with Tom Mildmay.

"And I hope you will give the third dance to King Lud," suggested Lucy, using her brother Ludovic's family nickname.

"No, nothing quite so good," answered Iris. "I am to have Sir William for my third partner."

"But can ■ dance? are you sure?" urged Lucy, in alarm for the consequences. "Will he not trample on your toes till they are like jelly, or tear your skirt to tatters?"

"Oh! no," answered Iris, laughing fearlessly. "At least grandmamma vouches for him, and scouts at any doubt. ■ is only a quadrille, so that I cannot come to great grief. But I don't think he would attempt what he knew nothing about. He has sense and observation. You must remember I have seen a good deal of him since grandmamma has received him into high favour. ■ have not seen her make so much of anybody for a long time, she keeps him mostly to herself, but occasionally I have ■ talk to him, or play to him, or take a turn with him on the terrace. ■ is not nearly so awkward and uncomfortable as we feared. I believe he is rather a nice fellow. Plain? Oh! without any pretence, homely, and not particularly bright, though it is hard to judge of a man brought up quite differently from ourselves. He never drinks anything save water, because he promised ■ a friend that he would not touch strong drink. Then you know Jenny Roger, the little table-maid out of your class, whom I like so much? She tells me that she has a brother a groom up at Whitehills, since the rain and heat he has been attacked with rheumatic fever, and Dr. Snell ■ attending him at the Whitehills offices. Sir William goes to see Bill Rogers every day, and lifts him in his arms, as if he were the servant and Bill the master. He offered to read to him to ease the pain and help to pass the time, just as he has read the newspapers to grandmamma during ■ fit of her gout. The book was to be what the lad liked, but he had no choice, so that Sir William took over 'Tom Brown's School-days,' which I had told him to get, when we happened one day to speak of boys' sports. I am so proud of having mentioned it, because he said it was first rate. I declare," said Iris impulsively, with her sweet smile, "I am falling quite in love with poor Sir William, though he is a rough diamond. His eyes are like a woman's, or like a dumb animal's when it is trying to make itself understood."

It was a frank announcement, which had not sound promising, and Lucy did not mistake it for ■ moment.

Lady Fermor had ordered a dress for her grand daughter from a court dressmaker, and the old lady turned out certain jewels from her jewel case for Iris to wear. Had ■ girl known their history, the thought of it would have burnt into her pure, just soul as if the jewels were red hot and scorching her tender flesh, but Iris did not know, and her ignorance was more than bliss, it was unalloyed righteousness.

Lady Fermor had spared nothing for the occasion. She had even condescended to consult Lady Thwaite on what novel luxury, elegance, or eccentricity would bestow clat on the ball. Formerly Lady Fermor's attempts in this direction had tended to aristocratic, but rather notorious orgies. She now sought to establish a different character for Iris's ball. She was asking the suffrages of the neighbours, and she made a concession to their prejudices to the extent of letting it be known that Miss Compton's ball was to be a ball pure and simple. There was to be no cosy room, with green tables, to attract stragglers from the chalked floors. For once play was abjured at Lambford.

Lady Thwaite had suggested a foreign fashion of dancing the cotillon. It certainly called for expensive accessories, but it might be new in Eastham, though it had been ridden to death half a dozen seasons ago in London, and had fallen back in a great measure on its native ground of French and Austrian ball-rooms. But Lady Thwaite could think of nothing better as a surprise to tickle and charm the natives, and Lady Fermor adopted the device.

Iris and Lucy met to put the finishing touches to each other's toilets. Iris's costume was made up of white silk, tulle, and lilies, with long grassy leaves. It might have been looked down upon as insipid, tame, and old-fashioned by the man-milliner Worth and his prostrate American and English worshippers, but she had never worn anything so befitting her youth and beauty. As she looked at herself in the long mirror, her face beamed with girlish gladness at her own fair image. It beamed still more brightly, though bashfully, when Lucy cried out in honest exultation, "Iris, dear, you look—I won't say how you look," for she knew Iris, however pleased by her friendly admiration, would still feel affronted if she were told to her face that she was beautiful. "Your dress is charming. Madame deserves her reputation and her prices," with a little sigh, for poor Lucy—one of the many children of a much hampered clergyman—had to be satisfied with an old pink silk of her mother's, which had seen much service but was still supposed to pass muster when covered with fresh tartsan.

"I am so happy you like everything about me," said Iris, with her soft blushes, "but if love were not blind, you would see that all is needed where there is a face like a Queen Anne's rumpence, and a big bump to be concealed by real thatch," and she stirred with her forefinger the silken tangle above the disproportioned forehead.

The next moment Iris forgot herself in inventing improvements on Lucy's dress. She would gladly have given her friend a new gown for the occasion, while Lucy and her mother would not have been too proud to accept the gift. But Iris, though a prospective heiress, had little more pocket money at her disposal than Lucy possessed. Neither was Iris in liberty to transfer for a night one of the diamonds glittering in her throat and waist, and on the band passed through her hair. It was only her love, taste, and skill, and a few perishing flowers, which Iris could lavish on her friend. But Iris looped up here, and gathered together there, and festooned with ferns and Geant de bataille roses, till Lucy protested with gratification she would not have known her gown, and that Iris had far too clever fingers for anybody save a dressmaker.

"There is not much of you, but we have made the most of it," said Lady Fermor, when Iris went to show herself. The mistress of Lambford spoke from the superabundance of her purple velvet and ermine, which only royalty, condemned to wear robes of state, or eighty years of age, with an icy finger on its veins, could have borne on a July night after the Goodwood races had sounded the retreat to the rear guard of fashion from suffocating London rooms. "See that you do the best for yourself, child," said the ancient oracle, "and make your hay when the sun shines. Don't be such a fool as to think you are everybody's bargain, and lose the only chance that may fall to your lot."

Iris was accustomed to her grandmother's speeches. She had got into the habit of not stopping to analyze them when they held anything enigmatical. Where was the good of pulling words to pieces in order to find beneath them gall and wormwood, ashes, golden powder from the great image of Mammon, stamped small and strewn on the water which men and women were to drink for their daily refreshment?

The little used ball room at Lambford was one of the finest, least-spoilt rooms in the house. Iris's taste and dexterous fingers had been there too in the decorations. She had laughed to herself as she indulged in her little spurt at the æsthetic mania, with which she was so familiar from her studies of Punch and the other illustrated papers. She had introduced the great tawny discs of sun-flowers and shields of peacocks' feathers among the drapery of ivy, Virginian creeper, and clematis. "Even Punch, and Toby, and 'the Colonel,' of whom one has read, would own the effect was good if they were here to-night."

CHAPTER XV.—IRIS WITH THE BALL AT HER FOOT

THE guests, though there was a shade of shyness and stiffness about them at first, be-

Handing to the 17 Swan,

cause they were conscious of replacing a different company, did not disgrace the scene. True, Mrs. Midmay was more colourless than ever in her pale grey satin. She would have liked, if she had dared, to have her gown black, and to wear no ornaments but her pearls, which might have stood for congealed tears of reluctance and consternation. She drew Mr. Midmay aside into the conservatory, and begged him to tell her which were the least objectionable people present. She got into a scare, and pointed out the Hollis's party as certainly disreputable.

"My dear Amelia," replied the harassed gentleman, "it is quite right that you should be particular about the company you keep, no husband worthy of the name could blame his wife for being careful on such an important point. But for heaven's sake don't go into a panic and do yourself and me irreparable injury. Remember this is to be our future home and these are to be our neighbours. There is nothing wrong with anybody here to night, unless it be that stout, bottle nosed man in the corner, whom there is not the slightest occasion for you to notice. Lady Fermor knows better than to have us down ■ countenance her old associates," and the small, pompous man, who was to be the future Lord Fermor, spread out his chest and brushed up his flaxen hair, which was in a higher top than usual, and drew his fingers through the "Piccadilly weepers" of his long moustache and beard. "Besides, the old woman is not such a fool as to compromise that girl and the lout on whom she is to be bestowed. I wish they would take themselves farther off than Whitehall, certainly, but the rank-and-file 'baronet' may be more easily dealt with than a finer gentleman. Now, just to show you how much you may be mistaken, and how near you may go to impairing our future comfort here, the very people you have angled out as objectionable are the most unexceptionable in the whole room, so far as birth, fortune, and unrepachable antecedents go."

"You don't say so, Thomas!"

"Tart, I assure you. Indeed, the family is so unrepachable that the present people must needs trade on their immunity from scandal, and begin ■ play pranks. Hollis is of a very old Eastham family, who have left their estates unencumbered—not the usual practice with the gentry here—neither will he impair them. He is an excellent man and admirable magistrate, though not so much master in his own house as he is on the bench. Mrs. Hollis had a large fortune and is equally well descended—she is nearly related to the Marquis of Eastham's family—all of which is perhaps at the bottom of the mischief. I mean these people can do anything they like, and they, especially the young people among them, have chosen lately to revive many of the tricks and tomfooleries of a former generation. I cannot help thinking it is a pity, but there is no serious harm in it, and it must be overlooked in their case. You can see for yourself what thorough aristocrats these two pretty girls are, though they have early shown them selves fond of making people stare."

Tom Midmay's definition of the Hollises was not a bad one. Either they and their actions were a angular relic of the rudely healthy thoughtlessness, half-haughty boydenishness, and half-refined, half-barbarous horse play of their predecessors, or else the existence of these qualities was one sign amongst others that, in the moral as in the physical revolutions of the world, we are constantly edging back ■ a good deal that we were fain to hope we had outlived. Thus the puritanism of the Commonwealth was replaced by the licence of Charles II.'s reign, and the virtues of good King George III.'s court were replaced by the vices of the Regency. At such eras old quirks and cranks and odd traditional practices come to the front again. Such were the unbridled giddy love of fun—not ending with boyhood or girlhood, and the feather-headed unscrupulous devotion to frolic for which nobody was responsible, that had distinguished the Marquis of Eastham's race when its members were contemporaries of the wits and bullies of the earlier Georgian chronicles. The same characteristics had reappeared strongly marked in the family lately. It was a remarkable testimony to the influence of blood and to the truism that there is nothing new under the sun, so that biography must repeat itself, ■ discover how decided the attributes were in a branch from the main line, consisting mostly of women, like the Hollises. For the sons were rarely at home, and Mr. Hollis, representing generally the sole male element in the family, had no quicksilver blood in his veins.

Mrs. Hollis had laughed and grown fat like Lady Thwaite. She was in a measure hors de combat where active sport was concerned. But she would not stand in the way of nonsense—which she enjoyed with the zest of the youngest engaged in it—or hinder her girls in their maddest escapades.

■ was difficult to believe what these two stately-looking nymphs, certainly with roguery peeping out, now and again, from beneath the stateliness, had dared to do and to leave undone. All Eastham would have been up in arms against the culprits, if they had not been the Hollises, who might do anything.

Maudie and Nanny Hollis had dressed themselves like farmer's daughters, and driven a market cart through Cavesham, stopping at every door when required, measuring out and selling peas and early potatoes, blackberries and cherries, much as Sarah Jennings, the future Duchess of Marlborough, dispensed oranges, for a wager, in the streets of London.

The Misses Hollis were never out of their mall phaeton, during the summer, when they had a brother at home. They coaxed him to let one of the girls blow the horn, and the troop had been known to draw up, and invite each marvelling stray pedestrian they met to avail himself of their cattle and trap.

Sometimes zeal for the improvement of the human kind was engrafted on the family foible. The young ladies would arm themselves with a formidable array of brushes, brooms, and pails, and force an entrance into a cottage closed for the day. Dainty hands would splash and sweep and scouse with such good will, that the cottagers, returning from toil some field-work, craving sluttish rest, would stand transfixed before a dwelling reeking and running down with cleanliness, and half dried whitewash. Every chair and table had been ousted to undergo soaping and scrubbing; every cherished old secret hole, full of rubbish, stood gaping in emptiness, in the garish light of day. It never appeared to occur to the imperious, gleeful philanthropists what their feelings might have been if Thornbrake, with all their pet retreats, had been so assaulted, taken by storm, and well-nigh washed and swept off the face of the earth.

At another time ■ would be the children the girls would rout out of their hiding places and hunt into the Hollises' school, which was under no officious, troublesome Board. There the young idea was taught to shoot in a wholly fitful and grotesque manner. According to the amateur schoolmistresses' moods they would set their small scholars such astounding lessons as no youthful brain could compass, which drove the juvenile fry and their parents to the verge of despair. Or Nanny Hollis would undertake to enact the entire drama of "Punch and Judy" for the benefit ■ the assembly.

Withal, the Hollises were kind-hearted in their heedlessness. Whole and half sovereigns, which to be sure they never missed, were continually finding a way into Lucy Acton's ■ her father's purse, so as to save, in the people's day of distress, what wounds had been dealt to the pride which still survived in the stolid day-labourers, and doleful, unskilled mechanics of Eastham.

Nanny and Maudie Hollis were the most simply dressed girls in the room, but for the gleam of some of their mother's jewels, to which Lady Fermor's ill-gotten gems had been nothing. The sisters sat demurely by Mrs. Hollis's aide, and it was only those that knew the madcaps best, who entertained an unerring apprehension that the long, sleepy-looking eyes—the true Eastham eyes, under the well-pencilled brows, were glancing out from beneath their lids in search of prey.

Lady Thwaite's weeds had passed gracefully into black satin and bugles, and a Queen Mary cap. She had fulfilled what had been expected of her. She had brought with her a train of young nephews, and nieces, and cousins, to whom any ball was welcome. She was sincere in seeking that neither Miss Compton's ball, nor the great coup which Lady Thwaite had herself inaugurated, should prove a fiasco, only if either did she was not called upon to cry over it. She was easy in her mind with respect to "hedging," so far as any woman could perform that prudent, winny measure, where the ball and any results that might follow the ball were in question.

The officers from Birkett had appeared to a man, and Lady Thwaite was taking some of those she knew into her confidence about her special part of the programme. When the best that could be brought forward was said of Sir William, ■ was not the man who could be chosen with any prospect of a successful issue—nay, with anything save trembling apprehension—to figure as a Master of the Ceremonies in a jeu de société. There he stood, half-bidden among a knot of men at one of the doors, so that though many an eye was turned upon him, and many a whisper breathed his name, he did not suffer from an overwhelming consciousness of observation. He could pass muster, tugging at his gloves, in his well-fitting dress coat, with the camellia, which Lady Fermor had herself picked for him, stuck in his button hole.

Iris had danced with Mr. Hollis and received the kindest encouragement from the white-bearded, indulgent, too-indulgent master of Thornbrake, whom his wife and daughters set at nought, coaxed and laughed at as "poor old dad," and "Peter" whereas he was not a descendant of the old Hollises for nothing, and his Christian name in reality was "Adrian."

Iris had waltzed her punctious waltz with her cousin till, before the three rounds were ended, she felt alarmingly infected by his solemnity. She was glad to exchange her partner for Sir William, who went through the quadrille to the admiration of the sceptical and the credit of his dancing-master, though not without some loss of equanimity.

"Poor man," Iris secretly compassionated him, "how pale he has grown! surely the game is not worth the candle." At the same time she darted a triumphant challenge of the eyes to Lucy. "Shall I introduce them?" Iris pondered. "Of course the Rector has called, and Sir William knows some of the family, but I think this is the first time he has happened to meet Lucy, and she has been sitting for the last dance. He would not be a bad partner if he would appear to forget what he is doing, and not leave his partner to find all the small talk. He looks as well as any man present. I am not sure that he does not look better. His figure is not at all bad, if it were not so bolt upright, then he has got quite beautiful eyes, and I like his chestnut hair. If Lucy were very captivating she might pave the way for a handsome subscription to her Cottage Hospital. He could afford it, for grandmamma is always saying what a fine estate Whitehills is."

Iris's good intentions were nipped in the bud by Lady Thwaite's claiming Sir William and carrying him off in mystified reluctance. He was presented to Maudie Hollis. This movement was the consequence of a short conversation which had passed between the two ladies.

"Where is Orson, Lady Thwaite?" inquired the younger. "You don't tell me that he is dancing with Iris Compton? What next? He will be found able to read and write, and then he will be like everybody else, he will not be worth his salt."

"My dear child!" exclaimed Lady Thwaite. She was a little nettled, for Sir William, though she could laugh at him when it suited her, was her late husband's heir and her protégé. Like many women, when she was piqued, she became specially affectionate with a sort of bitter-sweet affectionateness. Besides, she had known the Hollis girls all their lives, and felt free to take them to task. "I should not wonder, Maudie, though he were better read for a man than you are for a woman. Every class can command wonderful advantages now. Sir William had a fair elementary education, and he is a reading man."

"He may easily be better read than we are," said Maudie Hollis unblushingly, "if he has gone beyond a few novels, which make me yawn all the time I am reading them, though it was rather good fun amugging them into the house, under papa's nose, in the guise of histories and sermons. But Sir William Lumpkin is disappointing" went on Maudie with a pout. "What is the use of the fine story of the man's having been a private soldier, if he is to be just like every other partner we meet? But I mean to give him another chance. Won't you introduce him, Lady Thwaite?"

"Certainly."

Lady Thwaite brought him over, and, to her gratification, Sir William went through the introduction with a coolness which would have been marvellous, had it not admitted of an explanation. The well-filled room contained only one woman for Sir William Thwaite, and that woman was Iris Compton. To dance with her was rapture and torment, in which former scenes came flashing back to taunt, cow, andicken him. To every other woman there he was profoundly indifferent, and indifference in certain instances lends ease, freedom, even a species of distinction to the manner. But Sir William did not immediately avail himself of the privilege of asking Maudie Hollis to dance. He stood looking, a little as if he wondered what he had been brought there to do, till she suggested that she was dying to waltz to the particular air which the orchestra was playing.

"Then hadn't we better try it?" he said, and whirled her round carefully and correctly.

"Orson's a humbug," she whispered to her sister, when the couple stood still to rest, and Nanny Hollis with her partner stopped beside them. "There is not a rose to be got out of him. I think the Field-Marshal should make an investigation what the men who take the Queen's shilling are drilled in—the goose step or waltzing. He had been a Scotchman, and we had: up in a reel I could have understood it, I believe Scotch children are born dancing reels, and only need the sound of the bagpipes to make them skip and whoop like red Indians. But a waltz! Yet, I assure you, there is nothing at all odd in his waltzing. Why, I thought we should be the spectacle of the room, and I might be reduced to spraining my ankle or fainting to put an end to it, and he only touches me as if I were glass, and lets me go when he has the opportunity. I wonder what Mrs Compton sees in him? But you can try him, if you like. I dare say Captain Ryder will not object to change partners, and Orson may think ■ is the rule in our set. Then Peter will be pleased to see us both dance with Sir William, though the worthy soul has no notion of match making."

"Of course not," answered Nanny. "Peter only thinks we are good, polite children, to dance with everybody who asks us, and not to affront a stuck recruiting sergeant."

In the meantime Iris had been allowed to follow her inclination and waltz with her fast friend, Ludovic Acton, as they had waltzed together hundreds of times before, since the juvenile days when they disputed hotly about their steps, and she asserted that he trod on her toes, while he retorted that she had nearly pulled his arms off.

Lieutenant Ludovic had developed into a big and incomprehensible fellow, comely, like his sister Lucy, but with more individuality in the comeliness, which defied and conquered a mass of material, for ■ was big, with sandy hair and moustache, and an inclination to chubbiness in his cheeks. At home he was the gentlest and most unoffensive of male beings, the most dutiful and affectionate of sons and brothers, whose principal weakness displayed itself in a passion for musical instruments of a languishing and die-away description. He never came home from foreign service without bringing back a new flute or mandolin. It would have been his joy to have played accompaniments to his mother's and sisters' performances on the old piano all day long. It was his sorrow that with all the will in the world to oblige the family's darling, they had so little time to avail themselves of his powers.

But no sooner had Ludovic rejoined his ship than the most extraordinary reports reached the Rectory and his neighbours regarding him. The mild strutting fellow was ■ but blown up by his forwardness in torpedo practice. He had leapt overboard in the happy hunting ground of sharks, and risked his valuable life twice over to save a wretched Malay woman. He had volunteered to take the command of a boat on an exploring expedition among the ice near one of the poles. And when the crew landed on a frost-bound coast, and on false information took a journey over the snow, which was likely to be their last, he left the exhausted, despairing men huddled together in their hut, and made an awful journey back alone. He crossed the wild white waste, with no companion save an Esquimaux dog, and no sound to break the stillness of death but the roar of a bear, the bay of a wolf, or the scream of a bald-headed eagle.

These performances were certainly removed by an unmeasurable distance from any experience which his home and native place had of King Lud, and ■ was so hurt and indignant if anybody ventured to approach the subject, that his familiars were driven to the verge of doubting whether he could really be the hero of the exploits which were put in his name. Had they not rather been performed by some gallant young man who was unaccountably defrauded of his due, while Ludovic Acton, as his manner seemed to imply, had, by an absurd mistake, been falsely accredited with the glory? In spite of the bewilderment which attended on the young man's honours, King Lud was justly the pride of his father's and mother's hearts and the idol of his sisters. Iris Compton, too, was proud and fond of him. She had only escaped a deeper feeling because of the familiarity which paralyses the imagination, and because one of the finest fellows in the world did not happen to entertain any deeper feeling for her.

All the difference which the advance from boy and girlhood to young man and womanhood had made in the relations between Ludovic Acton and Mrs Compton was that, after frequent separations and renewals of intercourse, the couple were able, as a tribute to social forms, to address each other in public as Mr. Acton and Miss Compton, instead of King Lud and Iris.

Therefore Sir William, with his unmasked face, need not have looked every time he passed the pair as if he would enjoy swearing "like a trooper," according to Maudie Holles's graphic description. Even if he had heard their conversation, so primitive a fellow might have felt elated rather than depressed by it.

"Don't you think Sir William Thwaite waltzes very nicely?" said Iris, looking with approving eyes on the waltzer. "Oh! I hope Lucy sees him."

Ludovic had been interrupted in an enthusiastic account ■ was giving of a rather. He did not dream of resenting his partner's lapse of interest in his conversation, but ■ looked at her a little curiously in his quiet way. "A lady is the best judge of a fellow's waltzing," ■ said cautiously, pulling his fawn-coloured moustache, "but if you ask me

—I should not have presumed to offer any criticism, mind, if you had not put it to me—I should say the gentleman is just a trifle laboured in his performance, and occupied with it. No doubt art will soon become second nature."

"Now, Mr. Acton, that is very ill-natured of you, particularly as we are speaking of dancing, not of singing, or playing on the banjo," said Iris saucily, "and I do not know what you mean by professing not to presume to give me an opinion, till it is solicited."

"Don't you?" responded King Lud, dubiously, "but may I inquire what Lucy has to do with it?"

"Yes, Lucy was so conceited as to imagine Sir William could not dance at all—Sir William who is waltzing like—like Lord Palmerston when grandmamma saw him at Almack's."

"Sir William waltzes more like his dancing master, whoever he may have been. The man is as solemn and earnest over his task as if he were earning his bread by it."

"I don't believe he ever had a dancing master," said Iris in her ignorance, with a gay laugh. "I think he waltzes by nature—so well that you are tempted to be jealous of him, just as he is a gentleman by nature, to a greater extent than many people suppose."

It was just after this dance that Iris had her eyes opened and the ball utterly spilt for her. The operation of having euphrasy squeezed on the eye-lids may be always beneficial, as truth if we can bear it is always the best. It by no means follows that the act itself is not often exquisitely painful, indeed the occasions when it is supremely pleasant are the exceptions. Iris's enlightenment had no apparent connection with an awkward and distressing episode of the ball which had happened a little beforehand. The girl was out of the room when the unlucky blunder occurred, and she only heard a mangled version of it some time afterwards. Nevertheless the accident was partly the cause of Iris's having her eyes opened—in this as in many instances she suffered for the sins of others.

Lord Fermor had not walked since his last attack of illness, but he liked to be wheeled from room to room, to look at the company he could no longer join, and mumble greetings to any friend he recognised. Lady Fermor had directed that he should be wheeled once round the ballroom. The progress, though it disconcerted some of the guests, was made with apparent satisfaction to the poor old man, who glanced about with his lack-lustre eyes, and smiled a meaningless smile, till he came close to Lady Fermor where she sat at the top of the room. She was preparing to accost him with one of her customary challenges, in the overpowering, hilarious tones which she always adopted towards him.

"How do you like it all, Fermor? The dances are a little slow, eh? The young folk have not the go they had when we were young."

At that moment he anticipated her, a light came into his faded eyes and a tinge of life blood into his clay-coloured cheeks. He succeeded in raising himself up, and stooped forward with an attempt at a low bow, at the same time fumbling to lay his yellow wax-like hand on his heart. He spoke in a quavering but perfectly audible voice, "Allow me to pay you my very best respects—my ardent homage. You must know it gives me the greatest pleasure in life to attend your assembly, Mrs. Bennet," he said, using a name which had not been mentioned in her hearing since she had dragged it through the mire.

Even she grew ghastly at the unfamiliar sound, and quailed for an instant, while everybody within hearing looked at each other in dismay, and poor Mrs. Mildmay was so appalled, that her husband had to hurry her away in search of instant restoratives, lest she should groan aloud or faint on the spot.

The next moment Lady Fermor had signed to the servant who was wheeling the chair to move on, had pulled herself together, looked round defiantly, and startled her next neighbour by asking her how she liked the new fashion of puffed sleeves, like pillows with strings tied round them.

But there was a disturbing impression produced at the worst time, for there was a man in the dancing, while the gentlemen who, Lady Thwaite, as mistress of the ceremony for Lady Fermor, had deputed to be adjudes a camp, were assuming their stewards' bow and ribands, and consulting together about the bringing on of the pièce de résistance.

Lady Thwaite wished to get rid of the sense of something wrong and to dissipate an uneasy qualm of conscience on her own account. Besides, she was a woman born to meddle, incapable of letting well alone, unless in her own private concerns, which she treated with the greatest respect and discretion. She caught Iris, as she was coming back into the ball room, withdrew her from her partner and took possession of her, to have a little confidential chat, in a cool corridor which was then deserted.

"What is it, Lady Thwaite?" inquired Iris without a shade of apprehension, unless for the small trouble indicated in her next words. "Oh! I hope nothing is going to put a stop ■ the cotillon. The bouquets and foolscaps have not gone amissing? Nobody is too bashful? Captain Hood has not begun to doubt his power to act as fugleman?"

"No, no, but I have hardly spoken to you to night, my dear Iris, not even to congratulate you, if I may venture—"

"On my ball?" Iris finished the sentence. "Well, I do think it ■ going off delightfully in spite of the heat, and that everybody is happy. I am beginning to be sorry it is half over, I did not enjoy my other balls nearly so much, though you were very kind," ended Iris with a little sigh of content.

"I am so glad you find this ball especially charming, I am not surprised. But you did not quite take me up. It was not on the ball I thought of wishing you joy—may I not do it on something else?" said Lady Thwaite carelessly.

"On what else should you wish me joy?" inquired Iris wonderingly. "I dare say it is very stupid of me, but I do not in the least know what you mean. I think I am stupid to night, for I have been two or three times puzzled by things people have said, or rather left half-said. Iudovic Acton, among the rest, professed not to presume to give his opinion on something we were talking about. I must have grown, unknown to myself, a grand, imposing person all at once."

"You are not stupid, and you have only grown grander by anticipation—you are merely modest, a rare quality, let me tell you, nowadays, and perhaps a little shy. But I must warn you, my love, shyness is not always wise where serious interests—the happiness of two people's lives—are at stake," she added with an air of maternal wisdom, and a tone of friendly caution. "Shyness may be misunderstood in certain cases and cause irreparable mischief."

"What can you mean, Lady Thwaite?" cried Iris, provoked into standing still, with her cheeks hot and scarlet, and a sparkle and ring of justifiable vexation in her eyes and voice. "You speak as if there were some body when there is nobody—nobody in the world. Not a soul has a right to say so, or to talk to me about it, though I hope I should have the sense and good feeling to let any friend talk to me for my good, if there were a shadow of reason for it. Mr. Acton, if you mean him," continued Iris incoherently, "though I cannot think why, unless because he is Lucy's brother, and we have always been intimate friends—they have all been kind to me since I was a baby ■ the Rectory—but we shall never be anything more than friends—we have never either of us had the most distant idea of— I should ■ so sorry, and I am afraid grandmamma would be very angry, if anything without the smallest foundation were said."

"Don't trouble yourself, there is no fear of it," said Lady Thwaite, with the faintest sarcasm in what continued the unruffled smiling serenity of her scrutiny, "what is the proper word for what old-fashioned people used to call 'close'?" Does your grandmother never say, as characters in novels were wont to do, 'My dear girl, you are very close'?"

Lady Thwaite could not in any sense be termed a bad woman. She was not cruel or treacherous or even tyrannical in her selfishness, and she had a genuine liking for Iris Compton, but she no more understood her than she could have understood the inhabitant of another world.

"I am almost a relation," went on Lady Thwaite, with her exasperatingly cheerful reproachfulness—"at least a most interested family connection."

Iris had been standing staring at the speaker, now she started with a gasp. "Lady Thwaite, you cannot mean Sir William, to whom grandmamma has been kind, and I have tried to be kind ■ him too, though of course I have nothing in my power. What do you take us for? He would never make such a dreadful mistake."

"Iris," said Lady Thwaite, thoroughly excited, "it is not other people who have been making mistakes, ■ is you who are—a perfect simpleton I had almost said, forgive me for such plain speaking, a greater child than I could have conceived possible. All the people here to night are talking of your marriage with Sir William Thwaite almost as an accomplished fact. What is more, Lady Fermor has arranged the match. She has spoken of it ■ me. Sir William himself is looking for the fulfilment of the expectations which have been held out to him. It is right that you should know the truth, if you have never suspected it before."

"And was I to have a voice in my own marriage? What ■ there about me, what have I done, that people should see fitness in such a marriage? Would grandmamma give more to one of the servants, to a rude, ignorant working man?"

Lady Thwaite was touched by the misery in the girl's face, and by the self-restraint which prevented her from expressing it, save by the unconscious tightening of every muscle—so that the eyebrows grew contracted and the little mouth drawn—and by the involuntary clenching of her hand on one of the white roses of the bouquet, till the flower was crushed, and the petals fell unheeded to the ground. But Lady Thwaite was also provoked and indignant. "My dear Iris, I am very sorry. I had dreamt that you would be so distressed, I should certainly not have spoken to-night and spoilt your pleasure, though it is high time somebody spoke to prevent a great escalade. But, pardon me, you are speaking very foolishly in what you imply of Sir William. He is not to be mentioned in the same breath with an ordinary working man. No doubt, his branch of the family had been permitted to sink into obscurity, so that he was brought up very plainly; but he was still a Thwaite of Whitehills. For my part I think he showed his origin by preferring the army to any small trade, and I believe he proved himself a brave soldier. You know we have all accepted him, and given him his place among us. Every year that passes will see him in greater harmony with his position. I am convinced he is a rough diamond, with many admirable qualities, as men go. He is young, fairly good-looking—I may say rather handsome than the reverse—manly, honest. You were as well acquainted with the world as I am, you would be aware that many, very many girls of your rank, whether they get their choice or not, have to go farther and fare worse, to put up with much heavier objections in their husbands than are involved in marrying poor Sir William."

To Lady Thwaite's surprise Iris gave a little nervous laugh as her only protest. Lady Thwaite fancied it was in scorn, and she was annoyed at this exhibition of pride in a girl whom Lady Thwaite had imagined only too good, gentle, and docile.

But the laugh was more hysterical than scornful, though Iris was too healthy in body and mind, with too much native dignity and self-respect in her simplicity, to be guilty of pronounced hysterics. Only Lady Thwaite's words had vividly recalled to her mind the half-forgotten sentence which she herself had spoken of Sir William, when she had seen him first, that he seemed "a good sort of young man;" and Lady Fermor had protested impatiently such a report would have been very well if she had meant to hire him for a servant.

Yes, the recommendations which Lady Thwaite was citing were just the good character which one might get with a servant. The question was, whether the attributes of a good servant were quite those which a girl would look for in a husband, though it was true she might not fare better as a wife for the lack of them.

Iris, in spite of the silence of her lips, had not been without her dream-husband, her ideal of true nobility, honour, grace, with every accomplishment for which she cared a straw. Compared to this ideal Sir William Thwaite was a clown, and something worse, if he had so grossly misinterpreted her, and presumed on her friendliness towards him.

Lady Thwaite went on in spite of the unpropitious laugh, "I think he was smitten with you at first sight. I am certain that he now worships the very ground you tread on. You could make almost anything of him. Would it not be worth your pains—a fit task for a girl so kind and unselfish as you are—to enable the poor Beast to break the spell of inadequate training and unfortunate associations, and see him rise the perfect prince of the fairy tale? I remember, Iris, finding you, when you were a little girl, reading 'Beauty and the Beast,' and crying your eyes out for the poor, self-denying, forsaken Beast."

"That was long ago," said Iris, shaking her head. "I know now that Beauty had her rights, no less than the Beast—in fact, that there are no such Beauties and Beasts."

"Who would have expected cynicism from you? Was there not some old queen and saint who asserted her queenliness and saintship by christianising and civilising a barbarian of a husband, to whom my Sir William is a Paladin?"

"I am neither a queen nor a saint," answered Iris briefly; but she recollected instantly the whole story of St. Margaret, which Lady Thwaite had never read, and that Margaret's royalty and saintliness did not save her from dying of the stab of exquisite anguish, dealt by the bitter tidings that her old rustic poor Malcolm, and their first-born son, had fallen together in the Northumbrian siege.

"I have only one word more to say," said Lady Thwaite, beginning to waver at the seal of her own pleading, when she was carried away by the spirit of the moment.

"Lady Fermor is a very old woman, it is simply natural and right that she should be concerned for your future. I don't wish to sadden you, love, but you will be a very lonely girl when she dies, and it is possible that she and Lord Fermor have not been able to make such an ample provision for you, as the world supposes. There may be other reasons, which you are too young, and do not know enough of the world, to comprehend, why it would be specially desirable for you to marry early and well, as society judges marriages. Is it at all surprising that your grandmother should wish to seize the opportunity of seeing you established at Whitehills? Though it is not above eight months since I lost poor Sir John, I think you must have forgotten what Whitehills is like," remonstrated Lady Thwaite between warmth and plaintiveness. "It is as well, perhaps, that you are to see it again to-morrow. I am not ashamed to confess that I was a proud woman when I came there first as its mistress. Whitehills, with a man who adores you—not at all a bad fellow, not vicious, or even superannuated, quite capable of becoming a respectable and respected county gentleman! Iris, think twice what you are about."

"Thinking a hundred times would not make any difference, retorted Iris, stung into passion, and proceeding, in her pain, to deal certain home thrusts—of which she would have been incapable at a calmer moment—of whose point, in truth, she had little idea. "I may be left a poor solitary girl—far poorer and more solitary than girls who have been brought up to earn their bread. I may have to bear reproach, I have not been so happy as to fail entirely in the knowledge of evil, which will cling to me. And Whitehills may be a very grand place, with its mistress a most enviable woman. I dare say Sir William will not beat her, or prevent her from being a fine lady, though he is not a gentleman, and her friends will not forsake her. But for all that, I see no cause why I or any other should sell herself. That would be the worst poverty, the most utter desolation of all, because it would be degradation and a lie."

"Then I imagine you must be suffered to go your own way," said Lady Thwaite a little loftily and angrily, "since your notions are so impracticable. I hope you will never regret your resolution. You will allow me to say so," she continued, recovering her temper. For it occurred to her again with greater force—why should she so press Sir William's suit? It would be sadder for her if he were longer in marrying—nay, if he never married at all—though what, in that case, would become of dear old Whitehills? To think that she should go a begging! But now she would have the clearest conscience with regard to having done her best, in seconding Sir William in the wish of his heart, though it went a little against her convenience rather than her interest.

Even Bill Rogers might have owned that the dowager had done something to earn her pension. Under the renewed sense of what was best for herself—doubtless for her "cousin" and Iris also—and under the full sunshine of an approving conscience, good-natured Lady Thwaite's touch of indignation at Iris's very tall notions and absurd unconventionality vanished speedily. "Iris"—Lady Thwaite addressed her companion soothingly—"don't mind it too much, I cannot be helped. It is vexing, but most girls have troubles of the kind to encounter, sooner or later, and though they are trying they can be got over. Indeed, I am not sure whether any girl would like to be entirely without them—we are such contradictory mortals, we women especially. This is a free country, though there may be some difficulty with your grandmother, who cannot be expected to see with your eyes, and generally objects to being thwarted. However, I make no question that Sir William will take his own way like a man. But if I were you, my dear, I should put him out of pain as quickly and humanely as possible. I am afraid I have deceived myself, and been deceived, without any fault of yours, while he may not stand being undeceived quite calmly just at first. Only don't frighten yourself. I dare say he will not go straightway to destruction, or even forget himself so far as to swear at you."

Lady Thwaite was laughing now, but though Iris felt hurt by this rapid transition to a light mood, as by everything else in the discussion, her wounded pride did not prevent her from more nearly breaking down than she had yet done. She could have implored Lady Thwaite to stay the denouement, to save everybody from an explanation which could only be painful. If Lady Thwaite were right, which Iris to this moment doubted, with the doggedness of affront and mortification, and the utmost recoil from the next stage of the farce—surely it was a farce—not a tragedy—would not Lady Thwaite tell Sir William it could not be? She, Iris, was very sorry; but the suggestion was monstrous. Well, if that ould be too strong an epithet, the thing was not ■ be thought of for a moment. Sir William would take Lady Thwaite's word for his dismissal, and there would be an end of it. Lady Fermor could not say anything if he withdrew of his own accord.

Iris was saved from an entreaty which must have been refused, by the arrival of a servant, with an urgent request that Lady Thwaite and Miss Compton would return to the ball-room immediately. The second part of the programme, the cotillon, which was to give speciality ■ the ball, was about to begin, but ■ could not be started in the absence of the two ladies.

CHAPTER XVI—THE COTILLON.

LADY THWAITE was more sorry than ever for having interfered at so inopportune a time, though she had the consolation, which was great to a woman of her character, of knowing now exactly how matters stood.

"Are you quite able for it, Iris?" she inquired kindly. "Would you like to wait here a little longer, or to go to your own room for a few minutes? Shall I send to say the cotillon must be put off for another half-hour? It will not matter much, though the supper hour is coming on."

But whatever kind of home Lambford had proved to Iris, it had not been a nursery of self-indulgence. The place had not been without its bracing elements. She pulled herself together, slight young girl that she was, as a strong man might have done, and after putting her hand to her head for a moment, she answered, "No, thank you, where would be the good? I must not keep everybody waiting and disappoint people," and then she held up her drooping head and walked like a young queen back ■ the ball-room.

Lady Thwaite had never admired her so much. "She is too good for him and such a fate," she said ■ herself, for her abiding conviction was that the marriage was merely a thing of time. Lady Fermor would prevail eventually, for when had she not prevailed? Otherwise what would become of Iris, poor girl, in spite of her beauty and spirit, and what fortune she might inherit? It was a pity that she could not yield without a struggle. Sir William was a bit of a Turk, although all Lady Thwaite had said of him was true. It was to be hoped that he would not develop into a Bluebeard. If Iris could have seen it to be her wisest course, it might have saved useless contention and suffering, but Lady Thwaite had done her best, her ladyship wound up with a shrug ■ her shoulders.

So courageously did Iris carry herself to hide her wound and hinder herself from becoming a drag on the satisfaction of her neighbours, that only one person remarked the girl who had left the bill room the happest creature there, and who returned ■ it dizzy from a blow, with her maidenly pride up in arms and humiliated, and her heart fluttering with nameless shame, pain, and terror ■ was not her old friend, Lucy, who saw the change. It was the awkwardly stiff young man, clumsily encumbered with his lessons in polite accomplishments, wretchedly self-conscious, out of his element, and so racked with anxiety and shaken with alternate ague fits of heat and cold, hope and fear, that he could not offer the slightest response ■ the many overtures—some of them not ungenerous or self-seeking—made to him as he hung about the doors and corners of the room. The consequence was that he was pronounced the merest stick, the most unsocial fellow in the world. It was he who was quick to observe the subtle alteration in Iris's Compton's look, though her gait was as elastic, and the rosy flush on her delicately rounded cheek a more perfect carmine than ever.

"They have allowed her to do herself up," he complained to himself angrily. "She is as sick as I am of all this falling rigmarole."

There was a little agreeable murmur rather than hubb of expectation. Ladies sat and fanned themselves and complained of the July heat, but could not make up their minds ■ out on the terrace—not just at this moment. They hoped there would be no thunder storm before to-morrow, both for Sir William's hay and their presence ■ the haymaking. It was so seldom that there was any summer gaiety in Eastham, except tennis parties, of which everybody was sick, or harvest festivals and thanksgiving services, which might be pretty and improving but were not very entertaining. Gentlemen formed a succession of little circles, copying the circle of officers who wore the badge of the stewards of the concluding ceremonies.

A flutter among those who were not acquainted with the cotillon heralded the entrance of servants with a great basket full of bouquets composed of distinctive individual flowers—of white staphanotis, roses of every hue, striped carnations, purple petunias, blue or scarlet salvias, yellow and brown calceolarias, each tied with its appropriate white, red, or blue riband. These bouquets were handed to all the young people, ladies and gentlemen.

alike. Then the masters of the ceremonies announced to the novices, who were fingering the flowers and gazing doubtfully at the ribands—not knowing what to make of the posies and their streamers, since the most of the recipients were already provided with bouquets—that these cotillon bouquets matched each other two and two, and were to serve as indexes in the choice of partners, besides being worn without fail by their owners in the waltz which was to follow.

Then commenced a grand hunt for corresponding nosegays with plenty of jesting and laughter. Short-lighted men peered about for special roses with their special ribands. Colour and form-blind men obstinately persisted that oleander blossom was the flower of a balsam, or that the large clustered head of the plumbago, with its grey blue, was one and the same with the little sky-blue tufts of lobelia.

Nanny Hollis tied her nosegay of marigolds under one ear in a trice. She was a tall girl, but she stood up in order that yellow and brown might the more easily detect her. Maudie swung her Tom Thumb geraniums from her girdle like a châtelaine, and advised her partner to tie his flowers at his knee as a new Order of the Garter.

But Iris Compton kept her stephanotis and its bridal white riband hidden out of sight, while she glanced round in fright. Some witch at Sir William Thwaite's elbow—it might have been Lady Thwaite in spite of everything—had guided his selection, for he was dangling a handful of stephanotis and looking about with eager trepidation.

Iris leant back and stooped down to one of Lady Thwaite's young cousins. She was a little girl of fifteen, full of the enthusiastic admiration which some girls lavish on other girls older than themselves. Iris Compton was at present the object of Janie Fuller's devotion.

"Do you like the scent of stephanotis, Janie?" inquired Iris faintly; "I don't; it makes me sick." And she had grown as pale as a lily within the last few minutes.

"Oh, then don't keep it near you, dear Miss Compton," pleaded Janie, intent on serving the heroine she was worshipping. "Give it to me, I am very fond of the scent, and though I were not, it would not matter. Change with me; my flower is only heather, with a tartan riband; that won't hurt you. But will it spoil the dance if we change the flowers? Will auntie or Lady Fernor be displeased? Oh, please tell me, Miss Compton," besought Janie in an agony of divided feelings. There was her delight in doing something for her goddess. There was her dread of not behaving properly and so annoying her aunt, who had procured for her, Janie, one of the greatest treats of her young life. Above all there was the terror of drawing down upon herself the wrath of that awful old Lady Fernor.

"No, no, there will still be partners for everybody, and I will take the responsibility. You know my ball, Janie," said Iris, hurriedly asserting her privilege with a poor attempt at a smile. At the same time she was ostentatiously shaking out her borrowed heather and tartan. They were successful in bringing to her side a stripling brother of Janie's, who would certainly have been a fitter partner for his sister than for the young mistress and beauty of the ball.

As for this very young gentleman who led Iris forth to the waltz, he was at the mal à-murari stage of his existence. He would not have given a cricket match for the balls in the world. He had already enraged Janie by declaring that he could not see what she made such a row about in Miss Compton, a maypole of a girl with a little round turnip of a head, pink painted cheeks, and the recollection of carrots in her hair. He would have preferred pulling about and teasing his sister, by a long chalk, to being compelled to stick that beastly rubbish of heather in the pocket of his jacket, and "to tread a measure," like any other theatrical ape, with the young lady of the house. The gentleman was not even propitiated by the circumstance that Iris, in her excitement and in the reaction produced by her small achievement, chatted to him as if she had been a very chatterbox.

Sir William fell to the share of the quaking Janie. He was hugely disappointed, and showed it transparently; but he had escaped seeing the manœuvre which gave him his partner, and fancied it was only a stroke of his bad luck, though he was considered, by the assembly generally, the luckiest fellow going.

If any other person received a surprise, at the result of the pairing of flowers and couples, in one case, he or she was fain to conclude that a servant had blundered or had been unable to carry out private instructions.

The cotillon lottery had been quite fair, several people remarked with approbation, when they saw Miss Compton dancing with a school-boy, and Sir William Thwaite, in his absence of mind, lifting Janie clean off her feet.

When the waltz was over there was another distribution of fingers and adornments. At the first glimpse, the young people were inclined to cry that the substitutes for the flowers were too childish and absurd. Then the company found that to every paper helmet or am's head which was extracted from one of the crackers—that are generally reserved for the amusement of very juvenile parties on Christmas-eve and Twelfth Night—Lady Fermor had been so liberal as to add, by way of bribe, a pretty, more or less valuable trinket or fantastic charm, which could be worn either as a lady's or a gentleman's watch chain.

A hum of gratification on the discovery testified that a large proportion of the bigger boys and girls there, were willing to make fools of themselves for a small reward.

If her fate and her human foes were alike minded to betray Iris on this occasion, she must submit so far to destiny. She must dance her round with Sir William, as the old desperate villain danced his round beneath the gallows tree, though every eye in the room should be upon her and her partner, and every soul present mistake the couple's relations and injure and insult Iris by the mistake. Iris could not affect to be overcome by a paper crown, mitre, apron or tippet; and she could not openly insult Sir William in her grandmother's house, by a marked rejection of his claim, and breach of the laws of the dance. She was too gentle, too courteous, her good breeding went too far beyond skin depth, to permit her thus to release herself, at the expense of Sir William and the company. The favour or treachery, call it which you will, appeared again in the distribution of the crackers, else Sir William was indeed the luckiest of men in externals and empty conquests. Fortune, half unbandaged, had awarded him a green paper sash with an emerald buckle to fasten it, and a fac-simile of the same sash and buckle lay in Iris's lap. His keen eyes detected the coincidence immediately. He came up and looked at her appealingly, with the blue eyes which she had said melted like a woman's sometimes.

"I suppose we must seem as great babies as the others," she said, with a rush of colour to the cheeks which had been pale just before. She spoke in a formal, constrained way—the first time she had shown such a manner to him. He started, and looked at her with a more desperate appeal than ever.

"'Green is sorrow unseen,' I should warn you," she said, lingering, as if she hoped to find him superstitious, and to play on his superstition.

"I don't mind," he answered in a voice half-choked with the tumult of his feelings. "I don't mind anything."

She rose and stopped him from saying more. She ought to have fastened his scarf on his shoulder, but she left that duty to a servant while she clasped her paper rag beneath one arm.

The scene had changed to a harlequinade, in which Iris's one ray of comfort was that the two must pass comparatively unnoticed among much more ridiculous figures causing merriment; verging on boisterousness. For had not tall Nanny Hollis fluttering wings pinned to her shoulders, and was she not dancing with the smallest mite of a man in the room, having companion wings tacked to his little shoulders, which, as they waved in time to the music, gave him the air of making a perpetual vain effort to fly up to a level with his partner? Was not Ludovic Acton waltzing and pointing the beak of a vulture over the shoulder of a "vulture maiden" from no greater distance than Knotley?

No wonder Mrs. Mildmay took to reproaching her husband as if this were more than she had bargained for, more than any exemplary matron could come through and live or else be for ever compromised.

"Is it a masquerade ball, Tom? Oh, I thought masquerade balls were confined to the opera houses and only attended by actors and actresses."

"My dear Amelia, you ought to go more into society, indeed you ought," protested the aggrieved husband. "This is only one of the figures of the cotillon. You will take fright at calico balls next: you will say calico balls are only got up for music-halls and casinos."

Iris would have hoped that she and her partner passed unobserved among the greater notabilities, if Sir William had not waltzed a little wildly, as if he had lost his head, so that he did not stop with the others, or hear her telling him she would not have another turn. And when he paused at last, it was before Lady Fermor who—Herculean old woman as she had shown herself—was just withdrawing to rest for half an hour before supper.

Iris tried to meet her grandmother's gaze without betraying consciousness or tremor, but the girl's modest hazel eyes fell abashed before the bold, half-taunting challenge which met hers. "What characters are you two young people representing?" cried the old lady in great good-humour. "A pair of Tyrolean beggars on the tramp with an organ-grinder? A couple of Foresters from the worshipful company that hold their annual festival at the Crystal Palace, only the wives and sweet-hearts do not go in character? They are supposed to be too retiring for fancy dresses. Well, I am pleased to see that you are enjoying yourselves, and I'm ready to say "God bless you, my children," whenever you like."

Iris drew her arm from Sir William's, and moved hastily away. He might take the words as a matter of course. He might not understand them in their stagey slang. This was a forlorn hope. But he was sharper, what a cruelly mortifying ordeal for her to be thus thrown at any man's head! At the head of this man, who could hardly be expected to see that she had no share in the unwomanly transaction! He was not to be thought that he would disclaim it for her, or even feel for her in this humiliating position. She had never refused to admit that there were nature's noblemen, but these she understood to be martyrs, heroes, geniuses at the very least, not mere stiff, shy, young squires and baronets. She had been surprised to find that Sir William could conduct himself passably; but he had been led into an intolerable blunder, which a better-bred man might have avoided. He had been betrayed by the coarseness of perception and vain credulity, which had made him become an easy prey to her grandmother's scheme. At this very moment Sir William might be exulting in what his lands and title could do. He might be making up his mind to get rid of all the matters on which the couple differed—of what would appear to him her squeamishness and fads, from the time that he consented to take a willing bride.

Iris was mistress of the situation in the two concluding acts of the cotillon. These were the prettiest, most dramatic, and most foreign of the whole.

A chair was placed in the middle of the room, and Iris was the first called to fill it. A hand-mirror was given to her, a march was played by the band, all the young men in the room passed in single file at the back of her chair, each pausing an instant that his image might be reflected in the glass she held. She accepted the first man for her partner, she must let his image remain, till he, recognising the sign, came round to the front of the chair, from which she had risen, led her out of the circle, when she was to wait a single round of the waltz. Then another girl seated herself in the chair, and the same performance was repeated. If Cassiopea rejected the first man, she passed her handkerchief across the mirror, as if she were brushing away the offending image; and she might go on effacing quenched partners, one after another, till the last man, and, blotting him out also, decline to dance at all.

It was a tableau rather than a dance, a capital tableau for a born actress or a finished coquette, who could improve upon the original idea by fine touches of coyness, disdain, hesitation, surrender, the delight of the audience.

Iris was no coquette, and she had only one thought in her mind, that of publicly refusing to have anything more to do with Sir William Thwaite, by theoretically wiping out his image. Her nimble mind had quickly laid hold of one important deduction. If she accepted the first, second, or third man for her partner—of course taking it for granted that none of the gentlemen was Sir William—her decision would be to a great extent without point. It might look the simple effect of girlish shyness and unwillingness to offend. It would be treating the unpalatable suitor thrust upon her, exactly as she treated a large proportion of the other young men. She must behave as if she were deliberately waiting till the partner of her choice presented himself; she must sit till the reflection of Sir William was in the mirror, and she had the chance of seeming to wipe it out. Oh, surely then he would take the hint! and it would dawn upon him, that she had never looked upon him in any other light than that of an acquaintance and neighbour, who might be the better for a kind word or look. He would comprehend that she had pitied, even liked him, but never cared for him as her grandmother had arranged that they should care for each other.

Iris sat the picture of youthful loveliness, with an erect, undaunted carriage which she had shown before on special occasions, but only then. The company, thinking of her youth, and having some idea of her relations with her grandmother, marvelled that she acted her part so well. "She will make a dignified mistress of Whitehills. What a boon to that cub Sir William! The man may creep altogether into his shell, and remain there for the rest of his days, with so efficient a partner. She will not let herself be put upon. She will know what to do for both—a child like that! How cool and composed. She is no school-girl blushing and giggling, and looking fatuously round for guidance and support. She might have been a trained actress, or the heiress to a great estate. It is wonderful!"

† The gallants of Eastham behaved with the gentlemanlike gaucherie, the paralysis of intelligence, and morbid manvair honte, which is apt ■ attack the young gentlemen of England when they are unexpectedly called upon for an exhibition of histrionic talent. They tumbled and stumbled, silled and boggled past Iris, who sat so still and so steadily, with her heart throbbing as if ■ would burst her bosom, or make its beating heard above the rhythm of the march, as with a movement that grew measured and mechanical, she passed her handkerchief lightly across the glass, and hid the reflection of one smiling, reddening face after another.

Still he did not come. What if in his laggardness, or in his conceit and vulgar desire to flaunt his triumph, he stayed to the last? Then Iris's fastidiousness and determination, in place of giving a conspicuous denial to his claims, would lend a glaring confirmation to the report and ■ his hopes; because, as the daughter of the house and leader of this figure of the cotillon, she could not well avail herself of the welcome privilege of not dancing at all. She began to get dizzy with apprehension, to be conscious of a panic laying hold of her. She would wait no longer. She would leave this next reflection unbroken in the mirror. But happily agitation did not dim her eyes, for what she saw was the representation of the upright figure and soldierly step-tramping past—contrasting not unfavourably with the irregular, shuffling paces that had gone before—the head slightly bent, the flushed face glooming with a very passion of suspense. It was the image she had been looking for and dreading ■ see.

Iris's arm was not unnerved by the apparition. With a rapid gesture she swept her handkerchief, as if in the impatience of high disdain, right across the glass.

Iris was conscious of a little stir of surprise in those around, and then she felt she could go no farther with the play. Instead of looking at Sir William's successor in the nearly completed file of rejected candidates, she shut her eyes for a second and let her arm drop, so that her handkerchief fell to the ground. The next moment she beheld Major Pollock leering and sneering and bowing before her. She had done well; she had given point to her suggestion with a vengeance. She had as much as said that a broken-down reprobate, the person she detested most among her acquaintances, was preferable in her eyes ■ the squire of Whitehills.

The consideration was a small consolation to Iris, when she was whirled away by the à-début man about town, with his step made up, like everything else about him—to suit his gout in this instance—his hateful, out-of-date swaggering cocksoombery. "Pon my word, I don't know what to say, Miss Compton, for this mark of your favour, I'm a modest man, so that I'm at a loss ■ know what I've done to deserve it, unless you and I are going to ■ better friends in future. You may depend upon ■ I'm eternally obliged to you."

Swearing friendship with Major Pollock—was that what Iris had come to? ■ was a greater consolation that she was soon done with him. So much time was spent in each girl's making her choice of a partner, that the chosen man had to ■ content with the honour of his election, and eachew the profit of more than one round of the room.

Iris did not venture to seek out Sir William with her eyes, and learn, by the evidence of her senses, whether he was rampaging in a rude fury, or merely moderately morose. She was fain to trust that he had got enough of the cotillon, and would keep himself out of the last figure, which was only another version of what had gone before. The reversal of that rule of society by which a gentleman is supposed either to select or to be given to his partner, in all the various forms in which people dispose of themselves or disport themselves in the upper circles, must have fascinated the imagination of that master of the ceremonies—or more probably that queen of fashion—to whom the cotillon is due. The last figure was a repetition, with a slight variation, of the magnanimous permission for a fanciful girl rather than strong-minded woman to select her champion, while it also betokened that the invention of the author was beginning to fail.

All the girls in the ball-room ~~stood~~ moved together in the centre of the room, making a stationary blooming ring, with their faces turned to an outer ring of young men that moved round the inner ring. As inclination prompted her, a girl bowed and made a step forward to a privileged man of her acquaintance, who took her hand and led her to his side. If Iris had been stern in stamping out a false impression—a base insinuation—that she had stooped and sold herself to the master of Whitehills, Sir William Thwaite proved stubborn in insisting on a public demonstration which should ■ the dream of his life, and scatter his hopes ■ the winds. He was in the revolving ring of ■, but Iris did not wait for him to approach her. She eagerly nodded and advanced to Ludovic Acton, when he drew near, and went aside with him. She did not want ■ hurt Sir William more than she could help. She was utterly incapable of wanton cruelty. The blow she had dealt had rebounded on her own head, the sword thrust was quivering ■ her own heart. She was very glad when Lucy Acton graced Sir William with her hand before the whole of the young people were whirling round in a final waltz.

Supper followed immediately afterwards. Iris might have saved herself from a last spasm of fright, for Lady Fermor, who had returned to the ball-room, took Sir William's arm as the crowning mark of what she had intended ■ have been the significant distinction conferred on him throughout the evening, and Iris fell thankfully to her last partner. But King Lud did not monopolise the attention of his companion. She could not keep ■ from straying to Lady Fermor and Sir William; she could not shake off the suspicion that they were speaking of her, plotting against her, if it ought to be called a plot, when he might merely be complaining of her avoidance of him, and Lady Fermor smoothing him down and reassuring him. His face—primitively transparent in spite of its fair share of sense and intelligence—certainly looked so black that she feared other people must remark it, while Lady Fermor had her rallying, snap-your-fingers, authoritative expression in full force.

Iris's guess was not wide of the mark. Sir William had said, in his gruff, burly undertones, "I tell you it is of ■ earthly use. I had better let it alone before worse comes of it. I have your good-will, I know, but that ain't everything."

"Now, Thwaite, what in creation are you down in the mouth about? You were all right when I left the room. Do you expect a girl like her to jump down your throat? Did you ever hear of such a quality as coyness? Are you not aware ■ is the most favourable, flattering symptom women betray at an early stage of a certain malady? Were you never told that when a woman is willing, a man can but look like a fool? Do you want to look like a fool? Would you deprive us of our single, short season of power? Don't we pay dearly for it to the best of you men in the long run? See what your fürsich to-morrow will do. Take my word for it that it will turn the scales, if there is any turning needed. She is just the style of girl, ■ be apt to be idiotic about green fields, ■ rubbish of weeds, beetles, and snails, and all the rest of it. You can show her your house, too; and though it ■ not like Lambford, to be plain with you—you observe I don't batter you up—it ■ a fine place of its kind. You have my consent to press your suit. I will see that you are not worsted in the end, but you cannot expect that you are to walk over the field and conquer, without a siege or a battle, or the shabbiest skirmish. The prize would not ■ worth the winning if you got ■ at so easy a rate."

Lucy followed Iris to her room that night. "Oh dear, it has been such a charming ball—everybody says so," exclaimed Lucy, in a glow. "I never enjoyed anything half so much in my life. I feel perfectly demoralised; and, do you know, that dear fellow, Sir William, has promised such a handsome subscription for the harvest feast! He hardly waited for me to speak of it. Of course I should not have thought of asking him to put down his name the first time I had spoken to him. But when he saw I was pleased with his volunteering a subscription, in the handsomest, most modest manner, I assure you, darling, he wished to double it. I had actually to forbid it. There is a man with his heart in the right place. That is of twice as much consequence as his having stamped and dug his fists into his eyes, after the fashion of Gerald and Charlie over their Latin Grammar, or pulled an oar or ridden a hurdle race ■ Oxford or Cambridge. I was quite struck with his appearance to-night. He is a fine, soldierly-looking man when one comes to study him closely. I don't in the least wonder that you, who value all that is honest and kind, like him so much, though you tease him a little."

It became clear enough ■ Iris, in her heart-sickness, that Lucy's ears had been open, and had picked up a good deal more than Sir William's subscription.

"I am glad you have been happy, Lucy," she said, wearily.

"Oh, happy! I am only afraid it is wrong to be so happy in a scene of mere worldly gaiety—though the Church does not condemn innocent gaiety, does it, dear? Then there is to-morrow to look forward to. I shall so enjoy seeing Whitehills again in a new light. But I shall leave you now, Iris, for you do look tired, and no wonder; but you must be at your brightest to-morrow."

Iris was at last at liberty to pace up and down her room, toas on her sleepless pillow, and cry, "Oh! I am glad it was not my real birthday," with the restless, tumultuous, half-fanciful trouble of youth.

BETWEEN THE HEATHER AND THE NORTHERN SEA.

CHAPTER XXVII.—"I WOULD I HAD SOME FLOWER O' THE SPRING!"

"The stars of midnight shall be dear
To her—and she shall lean her head
In many a sweet place
Where revellers dance their wayward round,
And hearty horns of merriment sound Shall pass into her hair."

WORDSWORTH

TO have lived but for one spring in the very heart of spring ■ have had a joy that might be desired by the angels

No poem, no picture could give for an instant the sense of universal benediction that comes down with the full sudden bursting of springtide over the land. There ■ always a suddenness, always one morning when the tidings are flashed in glad thrilling notes from bough ■ bough, when the sunshine ■ sweeter and milder—the air fuller of quiet promise of blessing. There is always one day when the valleys laugh and sing more gloriously, and when the hills are more joyful together before the Lord

To every "flower o' the spring" there is a season, from the first snowdrop that peeps from under the dry, dead leaves ■ the bottom of the wood, to the last hawthorn bud that bursts on the top of the late white hedge row

And yet there is always as it were a meeting of seasons—a time when the flowers come up that they may be together for a while, that together they may try in their beautiful way ■ make more glad the heart of man—more glad and more good

"One moment now my glee is so
That fifty years of reason
Our minds shall drink its every gone
The spirit of the season"

"Some silent lives our hearts may make,
Which they shall long obey
We for the year to come may take
Our temper from to-day"

Ah! for many years, if that "inward eye which ■ the bliss of solitude" be but keen enough of vision

Yet better even than the after-vision of poets and seers ■ one free, fresh hour when your footstep falls upon the daisies, having nowhere else to fall for the crowding of them, when you feel upon your cheek and forehead the cool dainty airs that come up from the blue sea, and reach you through the boughs of tufted larches and tasselled willows, and when your ear listens entranced—always newly entranced—to the voice of the cuckoo that comes ■ you from the whinbraks on the hill.

XXV.—11

There were places in the neighbourhood ■
Muri-Marishes where Genevieve Bartholomew stood alone and stilled while hours passed by unnoted, dim hollows in the fir copses ankle-deep with wild hyacinth, woodland paths blue with forget-me-not, moist beck sides glossy with unfolding fronds of fern
The sloping sides of the Gill were overgrown with a rich luxuriance of large pale primroses, with fragile, trembling, pink-tipped anemones, and dark-scented violets were there, with timid white woodruff. The purple orchis stood up strong and firm in the green pasture-lands, the glowing yellow Mary buds filled the marshes, the daffodils

"That come before the swallow darts,
And take the winds of March with beauty."

these danced only in favoured spots; one spot most favoured being the orchard at the back of the cottage at Neithersbank.

Genevieve had hardly known what to make of the thick clusters of crisp green lanceolate leaves that had thrust themselves through the grave and the dead undergrowth in such fine profusion. Her father kept an amused and deliberate silence, even though he was called out from the studio daily to witness some amazing change, or growth, or new development. It was so with every leaf and bud that was responding ■ the spring sunshine in the little front garden. Everything gave a quite distinct delight, because it was so good as to come up there, and be watched by one who had never before watched a flower growing, and unfolding, and coming to its tints, its curves, and full perfections. The daffodils were somewhat slow of development, as became their stately ways, the slender green buds came very gradually ■ their fuller form and finer tint. Then all at once a dozen or so among them began to bow their heads—to be ready for the great crisis of their lives, the crisis proving to the world that their long promise had not been given out of a vain self-estimate. They stood there at last, the shell of silver-brown tissue thrown back, the great wide-open, amber-tinted cup quivering proudly on the strong stem, the paler petals standing round like rays round a pictured saint. Yes, they stood there, and they danced to the music of the Æolian harp that was in the apple-boughs, and the birds sang to the same, and altogether you knew that it was good to be at Muri-Marishes in the spring o' the year.

"I wonder if the delight of it could be of too rare a nature to one not used to it?" Noel Bartholomew said one day. He was sitting on the edge of the old draw well. Genevieve was feeding the pigeons that had come wheeling down at her call. ■ was just the kind of day on which to be idle—to feel that idleness meant growth and refreshing, and deliverance from spiritual stagnation. But Noel Bartholomew had enjoyed several such days now, and he was beginning to feel that they might have their dangers.

Genevieve, throwing down her last handful of corn, came and sat beside him, and heard all that he had to say of the soft dreamful mood that had come over him.

"I cannot will my will nor work my work," he said, "and yet I feel well and happy, or rather happier. ■ is strange, but I cannot help feeling that this calm is like the calm that comes before a storm."

"A hail storm, perhaps, hailing new ideas down upon you."

"No, I am not waiting for ideas. The 'A none' is all but done. Then I shall finish the 'Sir Galahad,' and after that I have it in my mind that I should like to paint a landscape—a great wide sweep of Langbarugh Moor, with a dark grey sky torn and flying before the wind."

"Good, my father! That must be done."

... But if I were a painter, now here is my subject coming towards me as shyly as you please. Three little maidens with three little smiles, bearing three little bunches of flowers of the field. And there! three little curseys dropped like one, ■ show how manners linger in likely places."

"Do you know that Keturah has decided that not another of your flower-maidens is to be admitted into the kitchen this year?" said Mr. Bartholomew when the children had turned ■ go, having offered their flowers and received the usual reward of thanks and smiles. "She declared to me this morning that there were seventeen of them between school hours and sunset last evening."

"Little dears!"

"I believe you love them?"

"That is precisely what Mrs. Caton said the other day, when I went in laden with the flowers that the children had brought to me as I passed through the village."

"What else did Mrs. Caton say?"

"She said many things. Would they interest you?"

"Some of them might. Mrs. Caton often says interesting things."

"So she does, especially when they are a little spiteful."

"That is spiteful of you, my dear."

"It is, and I recall it."

"What made you say it? ■ was not like you. Was your visit an unpleasant one?"

"It was not particularly pleasant. Why should Mrs. Caton have asked me about—about Mr. Kurkswald? She wanted to know if I could tell her why ■ had stayed three months at Usselby after writing to tell old Charlock that he was coming for three nights."

... How do people get to know of such things? And why should they care?"

"Was that the worst you had ■ endure?"

"There was more of the same kind. I was asked what Mr. Kurkswald was doing in London now," replied Genevieve, her colour deepening to a lovelier tint, even under her father's gaze. "Mrs. Caton had heard that he had gone up ■ buy furniture. I could only tell her that I did not know, and that Mr. Kurkswald had told you that he was going up on business. I had also ■ confess that I did not know when he was coming back, that I did not know how long he meant to stay at Usselby when he did come, and that I did not know whether he was ever going to live on the Continent again or not. And all the while I had the satisfaction of feeling that neither Mrs. Caton nor her friends quite believed in my ignorance."

"Well, that was rather trying for you. . . ."

It is, as you say, wonderful how people get to know of things in small towns, more wonderful still that they should take so inexplicable an interest in what does not concern them."

"Oh, it is not what they know that makes the strangeness of it, it is what they conjecture! If they would only cease from conjecture!"

They were hardly likely to cease with such attractive ground to go upon, the delicate nature of it, the uncertainty of its present passages, the important possibilities ■ held for the future—all these things, that should have inspired a kind silence, were as so many incantations to gossip, to flippant suggestion, to uncharitable conclusion.

And yet ■ is easily conceivable that there was not in that Thurkeld Abbas cotene a single individual who would have failed in one single particular to take the part of the Good Samaritan, had Genevieve Bartholomew been found wounded in any of the dark waysides of life, or in any way needing compassion of theirs. ■ is strange how a human being will stab another to the heart with an unkind word, who could never bear to see that other with an aching finger without trying to relieve the pain. Why should we blunder so? Why but because we have faithfully fallen into an ill groove, and made no effort to get out therefrom.

ORIGINAL ■ one of the sudden impulses by which his life was mainly ordered, Noel Bartholomew set out alone one morning for a day's sketching. He was not fond of going alone, but not knowing whither his mood and the aspect of the scenery might lead him, he declined the offer of his daughter's company.

"You will be glad of a day for letter-writing," he said. "Letters from London have been few and far between of late."

"People are sure to forget us if we forget them," said Genevieve, feeling some pang of conscience at the remembrance of a pile of letters docketed "unanswered" on her writing-table.

"Anyhow, they will forget us!" roared her father as he turned away.

He was not in a very equable frame of mind. Out of doors the spring sunshine intoxicated him, so to speak. He could say things, and think them, and dream them, that were quite impossible to him in the less stimulating atmosphere of his own studio or the cottage fireside. But there was always reaction, always after each hour of expansion, of spontaneity, of vivid, passionate insight, there came a dozen hours of doubt, of vague, nameless pain, of chill sitting by the ashes of the dead fire.

It was not new ■ him, this alternation, this change from swift flight over the sunlit regions of possible achievement to chams and darkness on the barren ground. It is new to no man over whose soul the thing called genius tyrannises. But Bartholomew was becoming aware of changes in the manner of the tyranny, aware, too, that his seasons of desolation were more prolonged, more frequent, worse than all, they were in a manner unaccountable.

That long dead time of gloom which had followed upon his bereavement had not been in itself a matter for wonder, for perplexity. It had been understood of all men, up to their measure, and most men had sympathized—that up ■ their measure also.

It was different now. There had been no new bereavement, no new shock, and the paralysis of his creative powers was in itself of a different nature. It was creeping upon him by slow and irregular degrees.

This was his own idea. He did not share it. No one divined it.

Genevieve only saw that since that autumn day when he had set his palette in the new studio at Netherbank, ■ had worked more or less steadily, and with more or less of success. She had anticipated a period of comparative inactivity, she had almost hoped for it of late, that her father might have rest. A long, peaceful, unexcited rest that was not the rest of incapacity would give him back the power to place himself where he had stood when he was most conspicuous in the sight of men, or higher still, it might be. He had not touched the limit yet, of this she was certain.

So it was that this depression of mood did not move her to any new or lively fear. "Anyhow, they will forget us!" he said as he went out, and Genevieve smiled, watching him as he crossed the field where the young green barley was springing. "He will have a vision of another and more glorious Ænone before he reaches Burying Gill," the girl said to herself, knowing that the Ænone he had already created was approaching a finer perfection than anything he had given to the world yet.

Her prophecy was fulfilled, not only in the spirit, but also to the letter. As Noel Bartholomew went on through the low lying pasture lands that were all golden with the great marsh-marigolds, dappled with daisies, musical with the songs ■ the thrush and the lark, he thought no more of the neglect of men, and the sense of the lifelong underappreciation that he could not but ■ aware of ceased to be a pain to him. It would be with him as it had been with Millet—he would sleep, sleep soundly, and men would awake ■ the knowledge of him and his work when he knew it not. But Genevieve would know, she would come and whisper ■ him where he lay, and ■ would entreat of her before that time came to take care that he should be where king cups and daisies would grow. ■ was very possible on such a morning to feel as Keats had felt, that the daisies were growing over him already, and there was no shadow of grief in the feeling, rather was there a new longing for this perfectness of rest, of which the daisies were whispering, in the lonely marsh lands.

Neither was this mood a permanent one. The next was fuller of hope for the life that now ■ The world had not seen his last and best work. A few weeks more and it should be seen. And then and there, thinking of his picture's reception, there sprang another vision picture ■ his brain—a fair young Nausicaa, surprised by the wandering Ulysses ■ she stood among the sedges by the side of the rippling river. He saw her standing as plainly as if she had stood there among the reeds of Murk-Marishes, so plainly that he could wonder ■ the roundness of her strong white arm, at the grace of her Greek dress, ■ the surprise that was on her parted lips, and in her lovely eyes—eyes blue as the forget me nots that were round him everywhere in Birkrigg Gull. His way was no more lonely, nor long. Before he awoke from his vision he was out on the hill top that was almost opposite to Yarrell Croft, and a picture, lovelier than the loveliest dream his brain had ever wrought, lay stretched out before him—a picture that would have tempted him ■ despair, if nature might so tempt a man.

It was a scene for Turner, and for none other since. The mystery of soft, sunny, pale gold vapour that was upon the distant dries, veiling everything, and with so transparent a veil that nothing was hid, was hardly a thing to be attempted without forethought. Noel Bartholomew sat a long time thinking before he began. When he did begin he worked with a will, and the result was not wholly distasteful ■ him. Yet he was not satisfied. No artist, no poet, no sculptor is acquainted with satisfaction.

He was standing back from his easel, wondering if he had made the cloud-shadow that was upon the trees that divided one dale from another dark enough. He was afraid of disturbing the sense of mystery that he had achieved. ■ was the one thing that he had desired ■ achieve.

Quite suddenly, as he stood there, he became aware of footsteps close to him. A figure was coming striding up the hill-side pathway that was all grown over with meeting briars and wild raspberry canes. "Oh, it is Mr Richmond!" he said, holding out his hand. "I did not know that you were ■ home, we had heard that you were in London."

"No such luck! My sister ■ there; she's been there this three weeks," said the young man with a touch of something that might be displeasure, or might be disconsolateness. "But don't let me interrupt you," he added courteously. "I saw you were here, I could see you from the billiard room window, and I thought I would just come over and watch you a bit, if you don't mind. . . . It's awfully slow being by one's self."

"That seems to be the general finding of poor humanity," replied the artist. "And so far from objecting to your coming, I am obliged by it. . . . What do you think of the sketch?"

"Ah, that's capital! Now I should call that first class, if it were a little bit clearer. Why, you've even got Craig's old house and the stunted oak by the mere. It's water colour, isn't it? What a splendid picture ■ would make in oil, wouldn't it?—especially if you could put a little more colour into it. You've got that distance ■ perfection. Still, I always like oil painting best. Shall you do that over again in oil?"

"Yes, probably."

"And I suppose you intend it for London, for some of the exhibitions?"

"That is not certain. . . . I very seldom send my works to the exhibitions."

"Don't you? Well, I thought I hadn't seen your things about much. They're awfully good."

"They please you?"

"Yes, they do, and, do you know, I've been thinking a good bit that I should like to have something of yours—something really first class, you know. I thought once I'd ask you to paint me. And then I thought I would wait a year or two before I was painted."

"You are quite right in waiting. Character can only come with years. Holbein used to say that fifty years was the right age for a woman to have her portrait painted."

"Fifty! Oh, come, he might as well have said a hundred at once. I shan't wait till I'm fifty. And I don't see why I need wait any longer to have some sort of a picture of yours, that is, if you will paint me one. I should like to have one specially done for myself."

Was the master of Yarrell Croft feeling for once that he actually was the master, now that its mistress was away? He was quite aware of a sudden desire to make an experiment as to the extent of his authority. There might be danger, but the danger was not without its attractions.

"I have no objection at all ■ paint a picture for you," said Bartholomew, saying it as much out of his natural good-will and tendency toward concession, as out of any other consideration. "But I should wish you to have a clear idea in your own mind as to the kind of picture you would like."

"Oh, I know quite well what I like, and an idea has just come into my head that I think would do capitally. Why shouldn't you turn a little just where you are now, and paint that hill side and Yarrell Croft into the picture you are doing? It would be all right, you know. If you come a bit further back you can see the house, and all that distance that you have painted at the same time."

"So I can," said Bartholomew, feeling that that square block of stone would destroy every particle of sentiment that the picture could ever have. Still, ■ was very natural that the youth should wish, beyond all other things, ■ have a picture of his own home, the house where he had been born, and where he had lived his untroubled life. Bartholomew made no objection, he would paint Yarrell Croft, since its owner wished to have it painted.

He sat a little longer, working at the distance. He would have to come again, and yet again, perhaps many times, if he did this thing that Cecil Richmond wished to have done. He felt instinctively that nothing in the way of generalisation would be appreciated. Every window and door, every tree and shrub, every gate and every hedge row would have to stand in its place. He seemed to see his sketchy, vaporous picture growing into a coloured photograph before his eyes.

Cecil Richmond had seated himself among the moss and the thick primrose leaves that covered the bank side, and he sat there with his head thrown back, his arms folded, a cigar between his lips—the very personification of youth satisfied with itself, with its antecedents, with its present prosperity, with its future prospects. Bartholomew could not help looking at him from time to time, wondering at him, not envying him.

Almost he liked him. If he were uncultivated he was ingenuous, or seemed so. If he were not without ostentation, neither was he without the small courtesies and deferences that ■ on the surface of social life, and are so pleasant and useful.

"You will come over and have some luncheon?" he said as Bartholomew began to pack up his brushes, and ■ may be that the artist would have been glad to accept the invitation had nothing prevented him. But he was prevented. The knowledge that he would not have gone to the house for luncheon had Diana Richmond been there, was sufficient to keep him from it when she was not there.

The invitation was pressed, and again declined, but Bartholomew went homeward by the same way that young Richmond went.

"If you are going back by the moor," said Cecil, "come through the gardens; it will save you half a mile at least. . . . Have you ever been over the place? ■ was a priory once, you know—Yarrell Priory. That old archway—you can see it from here—was an arched gateway in the walls of the priory gardens; so they say. That, and the bits of masonry about it, are all that is left of the old establishment. My great-grandfather built this house, and an old Puritan he must have been. He wouldn't have the name kept up, but must needs call the house after the field he had built it in. It was not built on the site of the old priory, that was too low, too far down in the wood. But that needn't have mattered. We could have kept the name."

"You might resume it, if you chose," suggested Bartholomew.

"So we might, I've said so to Di scores of times, but she's as stiff in her own way as a woman can be, and that's saying a lot. . . . But there, that's the archway, it's Gothic, you know. Shouldn't you say it was Gothic?"

"Yes, certainly I should," said Bartholomew, "and I should say it is eleventh-century work, if I may judge."

It was a great round-headed arch, with plain round mouldings of solid design. The piers and the capitals were completely covered with the strong green ivy that had flourished there for centuries. The walls on either hand had been covered with rule tracery work, and the clematis that crept in and out was just bursting into leaf. The young sprays were waving in the breeze. Through the archway you could see an old fountain among the greenery of the inner garden. A pair of tortoise-shell butterflies were quivering against the blue sky. The pale bright green of hollyhock-leaves brightened part of the ground-space, blues and purples were coming up nearer to the gate. The boughs of climbing rose-trees fluttered everywhere, making a frame to a scene that could not fail to be suggestive to the eye of an artist of any mould.

"Why shouldn't you have this painted instead of the house?" asked Bartholomew, with the sense of snatching at means of escape.

"You think this would make a good picture?"

"Certainly I do. When the summer and autumn flowers are out it must be almost perfect. And garden scenes are less common than they might be. To say the truth, I have often longed to paint one, and years ago I made some studies of flowers for the purpose, but I have never seen anything like this to inspire me."

"Oh, very well, then you shall paint both," said the young man, speaking rather as Disraeli's Young Duke might have spoken to Sir Carte Blanche. "How soon can you get them done?"

Bartholomew smiled. "It will take some time to paint two such pictures as you seem to desire," he said, "that is, unless I do them on a very small scale."

"Oh, but I don't want them on a small scale," said Cecil. "I like a picture that you can see across the room as you sit by the fireside."

"There I agree with you," said the punter.

A silence followed. Bartholomew was in a momentary perplexity. Should he ask this new and imperious patron of the fine arts to consider so unimportant a thing as paint, or should he not? It evidently was unimportant to him. It was a matter on which Noel Bartholomew had always been stupidly sensitive, and it was quite within the range of things that Cecil Richmond should take offence, and imagine that Bartholomew was sceptical as to his power to pay for the commissions he had given.

So it was that silence came about. The two men parted at the gate that opened into the field pathways above the house, and Bartholomew went on his way alone. "I can make it all right," he said to himself as he went on. "I need not ask the price I should get in the market."

CHAPTER XXIX — LETHE'S GLOOM, BUT NOT ITS QUIET

"Hut trust me gentlemen I'll prove more true
I than those that have more cunning to be strange."

SHAKESPEARE

WAS the wheels of life beginning to drag a little heavily in the thatched cottage in the barley-field as the spring days went on?

If it were so, it could only be a very little, there was so much to be done, so much to be cared for. New interests went on increasing as they always do when people are capable of being interested, and the old interests went on deepening and growing into the life of things to an extent that could only have been found if some stern fate had ordered that they should be suddenly torn up by the roots.

Sometimes, remembering that the house at Netherbank was, after all, only a temporary arrangement, Genevieve would feel as if her pulse stopped for the moment. Day by day the little spot of earth was growing dearer, day by day the fact was becoming more plainly written that for good or for ill her life was one with another life, and it seemed to the girl, in her intense love for the place, as if the affinity that existed between that other soul and her own could hardly be quite the same affinity if it had to exist apart from the moor and the sea, from the birds and the flowers, from the sun on the hills, and the breezes on the cliff top, from all that made glad some the days that came and went in the neighbourhood of Murk-Marshes.

They were glad some still for Genevieve, especially when she was out among the gladness, though no letter came, nor any tidings. It was very foolish, she knew, this half expectancy, this childish disappointment. How could he write with no pretext for writing? Still, vague wonders came and went and innocent recallings of the experience of her girlish friends. Sometimes darker visions came. What if Mr Kirkoswald had yielded to one of his old impulses, and had gone again to the Continent to remain for years? What if it were so? What then? Well, nothing even then but trust and faith, perfect faith in the friendship of George Kirkoswald.

It seemed to her that she had so much ground for her faith, though it was not a matter of proportion.

Going up to the Haggs one day, and entering by the backyard, she had overheard Dorothy Craven crooning a little song, an ancient love ditty, that ran thus —

Now rise up wighdye, man, for shame
Bicker bye in cowardice
For it is told in my father's hall
Yen dyne for love of me."

"I did not know that you could sing, Miss Craven," said Genevieve gaily, going round between the stacks to where Dorothy was spreading her laces and linens carefully on the hedge. Dorothy blushed like a school girl, but she smiled too. She was not annoyed, neither was she so sorrowful as she had been. It was easy to see that in some way or other life was going more easily for her.

It was not much that she had to tell, but she told it as if knowing that Genevieve might have more than one reason for being glad to hear it told.

"I can only guess who's behind it all," she said, "but let him be who he will, I hope he'll have his reward. I was about at it far end w' one thing an' another, an' Mr. Damer threatening to sell us up for t' rent if 'twasn't paid afore May-day. There's some influence somewhere, or he'd never ha' written the letter he has written to me, tellin' me 'at if a little more time 'ud be a convenience I can take it, without feelin' anyways anxious. Think o' that! an' as polite a letter as if it had been written to a duchess."

"Then you can see your way now?" Genevieve asked.

There was a little darkening of Dorothy's face, poor face, ■ had grown so used to darkening!

"It'll all depend upon the harvest," she said. "One good old fashioned harvest would set me on my feet again nicely. It all depends o' that."

Genevieve could not help wondering, as she went away again, what effect this little improvement in Miss Craven's prospects would have upon the hopes of Ishmael Crudas. Still it was not to be expected that Mr Kirkoswald—for his was the influence that had wrought upon Mr Damer—thus she knew, and Dorothy knew it too—it was not to be expected of him that he should refrain from helping Miss Craven to stand firm over a crisis, because there was a chance that if she should fail to stand she might be driven to a marriage to which she would not consent willingly. He might be sorry for Ishmael Crudas, but he was too chivalrous not to be more sorry still for a woman who was fighting the battle of life bravely, though the odds were so desperately against her. It was only a little thing that he had done, but Genevieve was glad that he had done it, glad and proud too, though she could take no credit to herself. George Kirkoswald had made a careless seeming promise to her, and he had kept it carefully, but he would have done the same had the promise been made to any human being that breathed.

And then in the fulness of her heart, and in the lightness of spirit that comes when your foot is on the turf, she spoke aloud.

"He could never, never fail from his word!" she said.

And though she spoke softly and sweetly, something caught up the sound and gave it back again, as if with a touch of mockery—

"He could never, never fail from his word!"

She remembered ■ afterwards, the repetition where no echo was, the curious touch of contradiction that seemed to be in the repeating voice, even though that voice was still her own.

She was going homewards now, down through the bramble brakes that were green with the young crisp leaves, through the lanes all golden and blue. At the stile by the barley-field she stopped a moment, listening as if suddenly compelled ■ listen, and again the spoken word came back to her from the upland, spoken as she had meant ■ this time, as she had intended it out of her full and fervent faith—

"He could never, never fail from his word!"

She was still standing there with her hand on the stile when she saw a small, darkly clad figure stirring inside the hedge. ■ was Davy Drewe, touching his yellow curls, and coming forward with a blush.

"Were you waiting for me, Davy?" she said, speaking in the half tender way that had attracted the little fellow so much. "Come with me into the house and have some tea."

"I mustn't, I mustn't stay no longer," the boy said. "I've stayed a long time, an' it's my last night at home. Mother said I might come an' say 'good bye' as I was goin' oot foreign."

"You are going on a foreign voyage? Poor child! and poor mother! Why, how long will it be before you are back again, Davy?"

The boy turned pale, very pale, and he lifted his eloquent blue eyes to Genevieve's face, but no words would come, or, at any rate, not the words ■ would have said.

He could only say that he did not know when he would be back again. The ship was going from port to port, and from land to land, the owners themselves hardly knowing whither Davy did not seem to care whither, so that he was out on the wild waters again.

"Are you so fond of the sea?" Genevieve asked wonderingly.

"No, miss, I'm no way fond on it," the child said, speaking as if perplexed by his own feeling. "But Ah don't never rest when Ah'm ashore."

"You do not? . . . Ah, that does seem strange! . . . But you will not forget me, Davy? And you shall have this," Genevieve said, drawing a tiny book from her pocket, a much worn copy of "The Imitation." "You shall have this to make you think of me, and to remind you of that day when you were so nearly drowned. I have my little 'Viking' to remind me of you. And I shall pray for you, and sometimes I shall sing a hymn that is a prayer for all that are in peril on the sea. But I will not keep you any longer now. Your mother will want to have you all ■ herself to-night. Good bye, Davy. You will come and see me when you come back again."

There was no answer, but the wistful blue eyes filled with sudden tears as the little lad turned away, and Genevieve, standing by the stile watching him, felt a fear or two steal down her own face for very sympathy. She felt certain that the child had left something unsaid that ■ had wanted to say. Poor little fellow! The memory of him would always ■ interwoven with the other memories of that fateful day in Soulgriff Light. It was his mother's distress for him that had drawn Genevieve thither, and if she had never gone down to the light how different life might have been, how colourless, how cold, how empty, how inconceivably unblest!

She still stood there, lost in a kind of reverie that often came over her now. The sun was turning the young leaves of a sycamore in the hedgerow to morsels of glowing transparent amber, a man was ploughing in a brown field beyond, the sea-gulls and crows were boldly following him. A plover was crying across the upland, some lambs were bleating ■ a meadow across the hutch. They were bleating rather piteously, Genevieve thought, but she did not understand the appeal. Presently she saw that one of the mother-ewes had got out through the hedge, and was running down the lane, crying as she went, then standing still, and looking back, crying again, and finally hurrying to the hollow in the hedge silently. Over and over the anxious mother repeated all this, and then Genevieve, going out from the barley-field, saw that a tiny white lamb had been caught among the dense, prickly undergrowth of the hedge. Again the mother stood bleating to it, then she ran on, looking back enticingly eagerly, crying plainly, "I ■ low me, try to follow me!"

What could he do ■ such a strat? Genevieve wondered, endeavouring in vain to extricate the small creature herself. She would ask her father to come—but no, here was help nearer. Some one was coming down from the moor, some one on horseback, and seeing a daintily-clad figure in the lane, he came more quickly.

"Oh, you have come back! you have come back again!" Genevieve exclaimed, hardly knowing the words she used, in her sudden surprise and gladness. There was a glad, living light in her eyes, a glow of glad colour on her face. She stood there, watching George Kulkoswald, who had dismounted, and was taking the lamb in his arms tenderly, carefully, lest he should tear the wool. Then he put it back into the field again with its mother, using such gentleness as strong men do use, having pity for all weak things.

"You were sure to come," said Genevieve, who was waiting for him in the lane, standing there tall, and straight, and happy, and beautiful—beautiful with a quite new beauty, or so George thought as he took her two hands in his silently. "You were sure to come," said the girl, "since I was needing help."

"Then you have never needed me till to-day?"

"I did not say that."

"No, you left me ■ infer it."

"I am not answerable for your inferences," she said, speaking the ungentle words quite gently. . . . "What else do you infer?"

"I infer that you have been very happy these five weeks."

"That is correct, I have been happy."

"During my absence?"

"During your absence."

They still stood there in the shadow of the crisp green hedgerow, through which the yellow sun was struggling. Genevieve had disengaged one hand, and was patting the red roan flank of Bevis. The first corn-crake of the year was uttering its rhythmic "crek crek" in the meadows beyond.

"Haven't you any more questions to ask?" said Genevieve, breaking the silence that George did not seem disposed to break. Was that the form his great gladness was taking? Hers was taking the form of an unusual query.

"I have many questions to ask," he said, "some of them important ones, but I shall not ask them now, since they need important answers, which I see I should not get in your present mood."

"I then ask unimportant ones."

Mr. Kulkoswald paused a moment.

"I cannot think of any unimportant thing that concerns you."

"That is flattery."

"Which you do not like, that I am aware of. I then let me see? What have you been doing while I have been away?"

"I have been doing many things. Amongst others I have practised the songs you asked me to practise."

"Thank you. I have brought you some more, which I will bring down to-morrow, if I may."

"We shall be glad to see you."

"As glad as you were to-day?" asked George, in a tone of tenderness and deeper meaning, then, seeing Genevieve's quick, hot blush, he hastened to add, "That is unfair. But you would not mind my seeing that you were pleased if you knew all that ■ is to me."

When he did begin he worked with a will."

Think for a moment, there is no other person in the world to be glad—I mean not very glad, as a sister might be. My comings and goings have been of no account to any one for so many years, I have had so little hope that any one would ever take count of them, that it is more to me than I can tell you to find that my coming is really a little pleasure to you."

"It was not a little pleasure, it was a great deal," said the girl, speaking out of her simplicity, out of her strong pity for his lonely life. "And after all, I was not so happy while you were away, not so very happy as you think."

"I then thank you, a thousand times thank you, for saying it! Every day has been as ten to me, and I travelled all night last night not to lose another day."

They stood a little longer in the fading sunlight, and a few more words were said, unconsidered as words may be when faith is strong and understanding perfect. The difficult word was "good-bye," but it was spoken at last, and George Kirkoswald went homeward over Langbarugh Moor. Genevieve sauntered slowly along the path through the field that was all one mat of green with the springing corn, she was saying to herself softly, yet tremulously —

"Fare you well I do, I'll be from you soon,
What I have spoken, but farewell complete!"

CHAPTER XXX — AT THE RECTORY.

"The high thirteenth-century tower, the house for earth and sky,
The place on which it left the ground to leave itself to the sky,
Are music sent up to God by the lover and the bard, Loudly that life heard it once, we shall hear it by and by."
— At the Rectory —

THE Rectory at Thirkeld Abbas was an old red brick house, standing in a high walled garden. Trees drooped over the wall. There were great dark doors at the bottom of the avenue. Inside the doors you came upon a square damp lawn, at the top of which the house stood, tall and narrow, and sombre-looking. The windows were narrow too, and the shabby dark red curtains gave no brightness to them. It was just the house where you would expect to find an austere and elderly housekeeper.

The austere housekeeper had in the beginning objected to the residence of Mr Severne at the Rectory, but Canon Gabriel had set her objections aside with as much firmness as quietness. The coming of the young curate had been the great event of his later life.

Almost at once the young man had stepped into the place of the dead son for whom the Canon had gone softly all the days of so many years. There was a spiritual likeness, none other, but it was strong enough to make the new affection as beautiful as it had been quick of growth.

There had been no upsetting of the old man's way of life. He sat alone during the morning in his own study as he had always done. Mr Severne's study was in a distant part of the house. In the afternoon, the two went out into the scattered parish, each going his own way. When the day's work was done, they sat together by the fire in the dining room, a low, dark, unbeautiful room, that had neither ornament nor picture. The walls were painted stone grey, the curtains were of the same shabby dark red as those in front of the house. There was no other colour that could be called by name.

They sat there as usual one evening—it was the evening of the day on which Mr Kirkoswald had returned. The curtains had been drawn, two dim candles lighted, a cheerful fire burned in the grate, for it was yet chilly in the evenings, and the Canon bore ill the cold of the northern shire, to which he had never become acclimatised. He had always been a frail man, always sensitive to every physical, mental, and spiritual influence with which he had come into contact.

They had been silent awhile, rather a long while for the curate, the Canon thought, with a touch of amusement. Mr Severne was not given to silences, rather did he prefer a gentle continuous stream of speech, breaking on this side into light hearted boyish pleasantries, on that side into grave, earnest, and instant recognition of the purer and holier and more spiritual side of things. He could pass from one to the other so that seeing the mere look on his face, and in his eyes, you lost all sense of incongruity.

The Canon broke in upon his present thought, whatever it was, with an unwelcome question —

"Have you read that article in the Quintessence Review, Severne? the one entitled, 'To Everything a Season'?"

"No," said Mr Severne, lifting his big blue-grey eyes deprecatingly, and blushing deeply, "No,—I—I haven't seen it."

"What have you seen lately in the way of literature?"

The blush deepened, the confusion mounted and mounted till it reached its height, then it toppled over into a laugh of the keenest amusement.

"I don't think I've seen anything for a long time," he said, "I—I know I'm too bad, but one has such a lot of things to do, and—and——"

"And as a matter of fact you don't care for reading?"

Another laugh, with less amusement in it, another blush with more of regret and self-reproach. The Canon had given gentle hints before, and the curate had made good resolutions, but, alas! the instinct, the craving was not there, and until reading became a matter of conscience, there would be no real change. Thus the Canon had perceived, without being able to understand it. He had been a devourer of books from boyhood himself, they had been as the very life to his intellectual life, and he valued them accordingly.

"I suppose it has always been so with you, Ernest?" he asked after a time, using, as he often did, the young man's Christian name.

'I'm afraid it has I used to get into trouble about it At home I get chaffed awfully My sister Violet tells everybody that I have never read but three books Parron on the Creed, The Life of St Francis de Sales, and The Housier Schoolmaster

This was told with such innocent gravity that it became the Canon's turn to laugh The old man had laughed more during the past few months than he had done from his Oxford days till now Presently he sent Mr Severne to his study for the last number of the Quixotic Review

"I shall begin a course of training Severne, he said, when the young man returned "You shall read to me the evening, and I will choose your books, taking care to choose such as must interest you, and then we will talk them over together The appetite will come so if you will only persevere Come, now, try I look a little less resigned

The article in the Quixotic that had attracted the Canon's attention had every appearance of having been written to crystalize its author's own opinions The matter of it was a plea that some thought might be given to the amusements of the people, more especially in remote districts, a subject on which Canon Gabriel had pondered long and often More than once he had talked it over with Mr Severne, mentioning, more especially, his desire to do something down in Soulgrist Bight But they had sadly concluded that it would be almost impossible to do anything there, since there was not even a barn that could be turned to use If only a room could be built, a good schoolroom that could be used for other purposes, then some thing might be possible His new paper in the Quixotic had given new impetus to the Canon's wish

"Listen to this, Severne, said the Canon, while the curate hastened to put the candles so that the old man could see better "It is a passage out of the middle of the paper, the beginning is simply a prose poem

The Canon began, reading in a pure cultivated tone that would have made almost any article seem of value —

"Here, for instance, is Gurth—I know him quite well, I live in the village below—Gurth, the born thrall, dumb, defaced, joyless, but pitably patient, even in these hard times, when neither the day's work nor the day's wage is always to be had His gait is heavy, but I fancy his heart is heavier still 'Merrie England!' I doubt whether he ever so much as heard the phrase Will his children hear it? How speaks Sir Henry Taylor?—

Oh! England, Merry England, ay! and ay! of yore!
When I thy mirth? thy proud laughter where?
The sweat of labour on thy brow of care
Makes a mote answer—driven from every door!"

"The people actually seem to have forgotten how to amuse themselves says a recent writer, and, with Gurth visibly before us, we acknowledge it sadly, but sadly still we acknowledge that Gurth's master has in no wise forgotten how to amuse himself What does he ever do, but amuse himself in the most expensive and ornamental manner possible? Is he not acquainted with the Turf and with Hurlingham? Has he not his opera box, his yacht, his grouse moor, with perhaps other amusements less defensible than these? At the present moment there are two newspapers of recent date lying before me, and from one I learn that the rental grouse shootings of Scotland, with the fishings, realize the enormous sum of £300,000 per annum My other newspaper says, 'It is a fact not underving of serious attention, that in the past year the deaths of seventy-seven persons in the Metropolitan district were either due to starvation and exposure or were at any rate accelerated by privation

"I leave these two extracts side by side for the consideration of all whom they may concern The social ill that weighs upon my mind at present, being not so much the inability of the working man to keep life in himself, as his inability to make the best of his life when he has it Is not that Scriptural truth for him also? 'To everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven A time to plant, a time to build A time to laugh, a time to dance' Will it always mean that the time to plant and to build is Gurth's and the time to laugh and to dance his masters? I would that his master would think of it

'There is a good deal of thinking to be done on this head,—hard, earnest, human thinking, and if any man can bring but the germ of an idea, let him bring it in God's name The problems connected with rational recreation for those who most need it are beneath no man's consideration Enough has been said in contemptuous description of the pleasures of certain classes 'Arry, as he displays himself on Bank holidays, presents a sufficiently striking theme for a telling newspaper or magazine article His yellow shot-sulster, his magenta neck tie, his shiny boots are points that can hardly escape the meanest observation We believe in his devotion to the big earthen bottle, we acquiesce in the opinion that denies him appreciation of any art, science, or literature whatever, but we are bound in the name of humanity ■ maintain that 'Arry is not the utterly hopeless being that some hold him ■ be

"Take what view we will of the classes typified by Gurth and 'Arry, we cannot deny that their mental, moral, and æsthetic condition ■ at least as much a consequence as a cause—a consequence of bad government, of ignorance in high places, of selfishness of thoughtlessness, of Cain-like mind among the followers of Christ. 'Am I my brother's keeper?' The question goes up daily and hourly. There are men and women whose whole life of ease and luxury, from the cradle to the grave, is one ceaseless preference of the querry. And all the while the brother's blood ■ crying from the ground in tones and voices that we only acknowledge as sounds that jar upon our succeeding great refinement"

Canon Gabriel stopped here and looked toward his listener, half-expecting to see a confused endeavour to recall a wandering eye, but instead, he saw a serious face fixed earnestly on his

"That does make one want to do some thing," said the young curate thoughtfully "But I wish the writer had told one more exactly what was to be done!"

"If you had read the article through, you would have found that the author does become more practical, much more I have heard it said that every social reformer should have one leading idea. This man's idea is music; consequently it agrees with mine I am certain we can do something—here at Thurkeld Abbas, if not down in the Bight There is Mrs. Canon, and the two Miss Dammers, and I think Genevieve—Miss Bartholomew—would conic and help us"

"I'm sure she would," said Mr. Severne, brightening instantly, and blushing more instantly still. "She would do anything to help anybody. Shall we go over to-morrow, and ask her?"

The Canon looked at him gravely, and rather sorrowfully. Should he utter any word of warning? Was it too soon? Was it too late? The old man had had hope in the beginning, but he had seen enough to turn his hope ■ fear—fear lest this son of his old age should be called upon to suffer more than ■ could well bear to see him suffering.

No word of warning was uttered, and next day being temptingly blue and beautiful, the Canon had no special objection ■ urge when

Mr. Severne repeated his proposal that they should go over to Netherbank.

■ was almost as much a pleasure to the Canon as it was to the younger man ■ drive through, between the primrose-banks, to the studio in the orchard, where the trels stood bossed all over with the small round crimson buds, to find when he got there a human being or two unaffectedly glad to see him, grateful to him for going, to know that he might talk, or be silent, or listen, or do aught he chose to do, and yet be sure of coming away refreshed and rested.

The tones of a piano, of Genevieve's voice, arrested them at the cottage door. Mr. Kirkoswald was there in the little room, he had brought down the songs he had promised to bring. Genevieve was trying them over

"I trust I come as opportunely for you as for myself," said Canon Gabriel, speaking with his beautiful old-fashioned courtesy of manner. Mr. Severne was blushing his greetings. He had been glad to come, and he could not indulge any doubts about the opportuneness of his coming. He would have been glad if Mr. Kirkoswald had not been there, simply because Miss Bartholomew might have gone on singing for him. She had often sung for him, song after song at his desire, moving him to a kind of intoxication by her singing, though it was not specially good singing, if you came ■ criticize it scientifically. Mr. Severne did not criticize it at all it seemed perfect to him in its sweet expressiveness.

The Canon had brought his Review with him. He was an old man, sometimes death came near to him, nearer than anybody knew; and if there was anything to be done, he was always eager that ■ should ■ done with as little delay as might be. He drew George Kirkoswald aside, and went right to the heart of the matter that was interesting him so much

"Meeting you here is better fortune than I had hoped for," Canon Gabriel said. "I wanted to see you, to try to enlist your sympathies. Knowing that you go down ■ Soulgnif Bight so often, knowing other things too, I was sure that you would help if you only saw the matter as I see it, as the writer of this article sees it. It will not be easy to find sympathy for anything that seems so indubitably philanthropic. People will give money for coats and blankets, as indeed it is right they should, but I doubt if they will look favourably upon a scheme that professes to provide amusement only—amusement for those who have no hereditary right to it."

"It will be a question of time," said Kirkoswald, "time and patient, persevering effort. The people who blame the labouring man for spending his money ■ the village alehouse, must certainly admit that at present it is too often the sole spot where he has any chance of forgetting his labour, his many cares. If people will only look they will see that his life is one long dull round of unrelieved drudgery, and I think they will hardly refuse to relieve it by ■ much as you will ask of them."

"You are hopeful?" the Canon said. "I am glad of that. You make me feel more hopeful than I was . . . I think you said that you had seen this paper in the Quarante Revenu?"

"Yes," said George Kirkoswald, "I have read it." He could not help glancing at Genevieve ■ he made the admission. She held the Review in her hand. From the moment that her eye had fallen upon the open page she had found that every turn of every phrase was for her an expected turn. She gave back a smile for his glance.

"I was wondering how you would answer," she said.

"You mean ■ betray me?"

"Assuredly I mean ■ betray you. Canon Gabriel, this article was written by Mr. Kirkoswald himself. His brain is full of schemes for demoralising the united parish of Thurkelld Abbas with Soulsgrif Bight."

The Canon was silent. Mr. Severne spoke quickly.

"Did you write this? Did you really? Oh I say! ■ is clever—it's awfully clever!" he went on, looking ■ Mr. Kirkoswald with more and more of astonishment in his round blue eyes. "Don't you think it's clever, Miss Bartholomew?"

George Kirkoswald glanced with a little inevitable amusement at Genevieve, but there was no amusement in the glance that met his. The girl was always loyal to her friends—most loyal when they most needed loyalty.

"There ■ little left ■ be said by me," began Canon Gabriel. "instead of having to plead with you for others, Mr. Kirkoswald, I must plead for myself, that you will give me encouragement in this matter and enlightenment. You can do so much, since you have the experience that Severne has not, and apparently the enterprise that I never had."

"Thank you ■ is easy ■ be enterprising on paper," replied Kirkoswald. "But I need hardly say that I am anxious ■ do what I can. We will at present leave the question of a suitable room at Soulsgrif. I know a person who has grateful associations with Soulsgrif Bight, and who as a mere expression of his gratitude will ■ to the room,—with your permission, of course. Our question is what to do with it when we have got it?"

"There could hardly be any limit to the uses of such a room," replied the Canon. "The main plea in this paper is for music, and I am quite in accord with what you say. One thing struck me much—you give it as a quotation—it is the assertion that 'not one person ■ each million of visitors to the Crystal Palace is charged with drunken and disorderly conduct.' Think of that, not one in a million! Until I read this article I did not dream of counting the Crystal Palace among the great influences that are working on national manners and character. Perhaps if one's eyes were opened, as they will one day be, one would have a reverence for this modern palace of glass and iron, well-nigh equal to the reverence one feels for the ancient stones of Westminster Abbey."

Mr. Bartholomew had come into the room during this speech, but so gently as not to draw attention from it. He was looking grey and absent and weary. He had been at work, and he had begged his daughter not to interrupt him if visitors came.

"I did not know you were holding a levée, my dear!" he said, turning to Genevieve with a smile in his eyes.

"It is a Chapter," said Mr. Severne. "We are arranging parish work."

"Yes". . . You were speaking of music. Are you musical, Sir Githad?"

"N—no, that is, I'm awfully fond of music, but I don't play—not much. I mean to buy a piano, though, and then I shall learn. I—I think one could soon learn, don't you, Miss Bartholomew?"

"You would sing nicely," said Genevieve. "In fact you sing nicely now. You will be an acquisition ■ our impresario."

"I meant to suggest that Mr. Severne should be conductor," said George Kirkoswald, "if he will be so kind. The probability is that he will be required ■ be several things."

"And your dream of giving concerts is actually threatening fulfilment?" said Mr. Bartholomew. "Well, success to it! But I confess myself unable to see in what exactly the success is to consist."

"Success for me," said Kirkoswald, "would consist in knowing that I had turned aside for one hour the current of thought that was driving to distraction one weary brain. The man might have to go back to his care, to his trouble, but he would not go back the same man. The break in his ideas would certainly have wrought change, if not strength, if not some help diviner still."

"For me," said Genevieve, "success would consist in feeling that by means of music I had spoken of things beyond the power of words to reach or touch, but not beyond the power of the most ignorant fool. ■ is in that that I think the distinction of music lies, as compared with the other arts. ■ passes beyond them, so to speak, into regions where they seldom attempt to follow, the regions of unexpressed and inexpressible emotion, of spiritual aspiration. And it ■ distinct, too, in that it acts so easily and readily upon the uneducated and untrained intellect. A man who cannot read, who cannot even see what your picture is intended to represent, can yet be moved, softened, stirred to a mood not his own by—

Miss A. B. at graduation on the 23rd of June
I have tried to put into words the feelings of the day

"And you, Sir Galahad?" asked Bartholomew.

"I? Oh, well, I think my idea of success would require some of Miss Bartholomew's music to express it."

"It is beyond the reach of words?"

"No, but the words are beyond my reach."

"Are you answered, Bartholomew?" asked Canon Gabriel.

"Not till you have spoken, Canon," was the reply.

"If I speak I must speak plainly," said the old man, a little change coming over his face as he began. "I must say that I believe that the chief success of the attempt must arise out of the opportunity afforded for the acquirement of personal influence over those whom you seek to help and benefit. Organization will be needed, but organization will not do everything. I am suspicious of all this modern mechanism. Men are putting their faith in machinery—some of the best of them are doing it quite unconsciously, but nevertheless they are doing it, and with equal unconsciousness they are ignoring the fact that not the most perfectly organized mechanism can fulfil all the duty of the individual man."

"Some years ago a book was published which attracted marked attention. It contained much that was startling, much that was stimulating, thus amongst the rest — 'Perhaps the truth is, that there has scarcely been a town in any Christian country since the time of Christ where a century has passed without exhibiting a character of such elevation that his mere presence has shamed the bad and made the good better, and has been felt at times like the presence of God Himself.'

"A century! Who among us is there so unfortunate in his experience as not to have stood in the presence of at least one such man, not to have yielded to the spell of his power, not to have felt our own life suddenly arrested?"

"It is to this personal elevation of character, this personal power of arresting and influencing, that we must look for the means of touching the hearts and winning the lives of the men who are supposed to be beyond the reach of any good influence whatever. We have tried other means, we shall go on trying, but at the last we shall come back to this, wondering how we could have missed our way. Do you think he has no eye to see, no ear to hear, that hard-handed daily labourer? Do you think your toil-worn artisan has so wrought the heart out of him that he is incapable of experiencing that overmastering attraction towards a good and great man, a human being, like himself at least in this, in being human? If you do not believe in his capability, then at least wait awhile before you undertake any prominent piece of social reform. Try reform not social, and find the outcome of that. It may surprise you at least as much as it will surprise any one else I can imagine an element of surprise in the experience of St. Paul, in that of Bernard of Clairvaux, of Whitefield, and John Wesley. Depend upon it that none of these men started from the notion that the world was to be reformed by means of any purely mechanical organization whatever. I fancy that any of these eminent Christians would have agreed on one point at least with the most eminently mischievous agnostic of modern times—John Stuart Mill. I am not sure how far my memory will enable me to quote, but some of you will doubtless remember the general conclusion to which he came in his 'Political Economy,' that the most promising and beneficial schemes for human improvement have usually failed, and are likely to fail again, from the failure of those who took part in them to attain the amount of personal virtue imperatively exacted by the very nature of the schemes. So far as these schemes have succeeded in a few solitary instances it has been among a limited number of persons, possessed of more than an ordinary share of the spirit of self-renunciation.

"The personal virtue! There, precisely, Mr Mill, you have named for us the great dynamic force that shall keep the wheels of social reform in most potent and perpetual motion. Provide that in sufficient quantity and of adequate quality and you shall do what you will with Gurth, or 'Arry, or any other hopeless individual whatever. Not only shall his time to plant and ■ build be devoted to the needs of you and yours, but his time to laugh and to dance—if any—shall be delivered over ■ the passionate ardour of your benevolence will whenever you shall choose to claim it.

There, you have my final word as to the nature of the success I would have you aim at, but not my final prayer for its achievement."

Canon Gabriel went away soon after this, and Sir Galahad with him. They talked all the way home of the music room that was going to be built, and of the things that might be done in it another winter.

"Have you any idea who it is that is going to build the room?" asked the curate.

"Yes," said Canon Gabriel, "I think I have an idea. I think I perceive why a thank offering ■ be put up in Soulsgrif Bight . . . Have you forgotten the day of the storm?"

CHAPTER XXXI—A LANDSLIP.

Antony
*"I'll keep his promises. If he have more He'll clear himself thy friend, he'll care for thee
 When thou art sick of thyself."*
Torquato Tasso, GONDIST.

THE April showers had delayed their coming till the beginning of May, then they had come rushing down upon the thirsty leaves and flowers in a sprightly, generous way that made you feel as you watched and listened as if it were your own thirst that was being allayed. You were glad because the hills and the dales were glad.

When the rain had gone there was such a freshness, such a crisp, mossy greenness, that you almost wondered that the world should have seemed such a beautiful world before. And the sunshine was brighter and clearer, ■ seemed to penetrate everywhere, George Kirkoswald thought, as he walked about his shabby rooms ■ Usselby Hall. He was glad that Genevieve was not there to see them in this fresh, lucent sunshine. ■ seemed to him that there was an absolute squalor about the place, inclining him toward a new sympathy with wretchedness and misery. "If I lived here long with things in this state I should deteriorate," ■ said to himself, as he stood watching the early morning sun ■ it crept across the walls and floor of his dingy library.

But he was not intending ■ live long with things in this state. Once let that word be spoken that ■ had to speak, once let that answer be given that he dared to hope would be given, and change should follow speedily.

He had not decided with much detail upon the kind of change, details should be left to another decision than his. He was aware that he would be on one side, the side of beauty for beauty's sake, regardless of higher or lower considerations, while Genevieve would be on the other side, the side of a wise renunciation. She would make concessions to him, as she had made concessions to her father, thus he knew, but there should be no pressure. In her father's case the pressure had come from her own perception of his inability to work, to think, to live his own life, in the midst of mean and unbeautiful surroundings. When Genevieve was quite a child he had declared that it was necessary to his sense of artistic consistency that his little daughter should be dressed in a manner suited to her own rare beauty, and her dress had always been a matter of more or less interest to him. When he had been commended for his painting of drapery he had frequently asserted that he owed such skill as he had to his daughter's ability to wear her garments gracefully. All this had been before he had suffered, and suffering had wrought changes, but Genevieve was aware that his surroundings were still a matter of importance to him. Therefore ■ was that she had felt herself justified in doing things that were as congenial to her nature as they were doubtful to her higher judgment.

All this George Kirkoswald knew, and understood and appreciated. He knew, too, that although there had been compromise, there had been no reconciliation, only a continuous dread of reconciliation to a lower ideal.

It amused him to think that there would be this matter of difference between them. It should never ■ other than an amusement. He would give up every wish he had rather than cause a sense of strain.

Of course he knew well enough that no serious strain would ever be put upon him. Genevieve was not likely to insist upon ugliness, or meanness, or unseemliness of any kind. The little warfare that was to be would be all delight, and a cause of opportunities to be anticipated with eagerness.

This was the mood he was in during those bright spring days that followed upon his return from London. He had come back impatient, thirsting for settled knowledge of the future, determined to put an end to the shadow of suspense that now and then dummed his present felicity. But, as we have seen, opportunity had not been favourable to him. The coming of Canon Gabriel and Sir Gala had to Netherbank that April afternoon had wrought a more dangerous delay than anybody who knew of ■ had conceived.

Trusting that fate had thwarted him sufficiently he started for Netherbank once more. It was the crispest and greenest of the days of early May. His own pine woods were blue with hyacinth, everybody's hedges were whitening with the bursting hawthorn buds, spring being at least a month in advance that year, and showering down promises everywhere for the more important autumn.

■ was yet early in the afternoon when he reached the thatched cottage, the very smoke from the chimney seeming as if it curled in some special way for him. Strong as he was, and self contained as he looked, his heart was beating, his eyes alight, his voice not steady when Keturah opened the door, and he dashed down his hope with a smile and a stare of stupid astonishment.

"They're out in no, they're out in. They've gone out," said the girl, having apparently a mischievous impulse to discover how far Mr Kirkoswald was fitted to bear the doom of Lantulus.

"Did Mr Bartholomew say where they were going?"

"No, he didn't say where they were going."

"And did Miss Bartholomew say nothing?"

"Miss Bartholomew! Yes! yes, she said something. She said maybe they were going up to the moor, an' maybe they were going down ■ the sea."

Kirkoswald reflected a moment. If they had gone upward he must have met them, or seen them in the distance. Then with an impatient good day to Keturah, who stood mischievously smiling, he dashed downward, hardly stopping even to indulge his own thought by the way until he stood by the side of Genevieve Bartholomew on the sands to the north of Soulagrif Bight.

"Why did you not leave me a message?" he asked with a little tender reproach as they walked up and down where the swallows were splashing faintly upon the onyx tinted beach. The sun was sparkling in the water pools, great dark shadows lay upon the wrack fringed boulders under the cliffs. Bartholomew was making a little sketch of ■ fishing boat that was standing out ■ sea, a perfect study of colour, with its russet and ochre sails and its rich brown hull. There were sparkling touches of white here and there, the blue jerseys of the fishermen made effective contrast. The sketch was only the work ■ a few minutes, but ■ was a gem of freshness and clear swift handling.

"And now I must make haste," the artist said, packing up his tools. "We were going round by the Ness, Genevieve and I," he added to Kirkoswald, "and up into Birknigg Gill. You will come with us?"

"That is kind of you," said Kirkoswald.

"Were you waiting for the invitation?"

"That is unkind, and a little hard ■ bear. I do assure you I keep a conscience, and it has pricked hard at times."

"May ■ never have less to reproach you with!" said Bartholomew heartily. More and more he was assured that his first impression of Kirkoswald had been a true one, that it had failed only on the side of inadequate appreciation. He could not but admire the strength that he had never had himself, the quick clear vitality that was the outcome of that strength, and seemed to make all life, the social life, the life of thought, the life of work, so easy, so painless, so natural. He was already beginning to feel that he might some day come to lean on this man as a father leans on the son who has gone beyond himself, and stands on a higher plane in men's estimate. The feeling had comfort in it when he thought of his future, more comfort still when he thought of the future of his daughter.

They went on, all three of them, over the enchanted sands, by the caves of the Nereids, all tinted with orange and brown, and crimson and green. The sea-weeds dropped from the roof, crystal streamlets dropped from the weeds. The sun came creeping round a little, slanting down the rugged cliffs. —

*It may be dreamed not what could be done
With a bit of rock and a ray of sun,
But, to know how fade the lights and shadows
Of how bare edges and crevices do part
How divided illy it looks and fades
And grows again on craggy steep!*

■ was Kirkoswald who was quoting. Genevieve was listening, she seemed a little silent, a little subdued, as she often was nowadays. But it was not a pale silence, her face had seldom the purely white tint, the perfect placidity of expression that ■ had been wont to have when life was less full of hope, less struck through and through with beauty. There was now an inner beauty that was daily adding a new radiance, a new grace to the outer loveliness that had always been hers. This was the work of love, though no word of love had been yet spoken. They talked of everything and anything else, they kept silence, then they talked again. They had left the sea shore now and were making their way up the noisy rippling beck to the upper part of the Gill. Mr. Bartholomew was going out on the other side to the place where he had sat on the day when Cecil Richmond had joined him. He had never liked to think of that day much. He was conscious of something that impressed him with an air as if of mystery, an undercurrent that he could neither define nor understand. He did not indulge the feeling, but it did not on that account fail to come back again and again. It had come back now, but he pressed onward to his work. He had given his word, and it would be easier to keep a thing to break it, considering circumstances all round.

Genevieve and Kirkoswald sat by him for a time, and they saw that he was working slowly, dubiously.

"Don't try any longer, father, since you are not in the mood," Genevieve begged tenderly.

"I must try, dear, since Nature's mood happens to be such a very glorious one."

"It is glorious!" said Kirkoswald, "and I was just thinking that I should like to show Miss Bartholomew something more of the gloriousness of Birking Gill, that is if we may leave you for a little while. There is a favourite spot of mine a little higher up the ravine, a spot where I used to come when I was a boy. I get the wild cherries. You are not too tired?" he asked of Genevieve as they turned to go.

■ was hardly possible ■ be tired on such a day, in such an hour. There are moments of life when people seem lifted above the possibility of physical pain, sometimes above mental pain too if it lie quite apart from the exaltation of the moment. For that time it is another existence that one lives. The gates of another world are set open, one enters in, and the doors are shut upon the old world, the world of doubt and care, of suffering and humiliation.

Genevieve and George Kirkoswald entered in by an arching avenue of misty trees, misty with buds and plumes, with tufts and tassels, with the green leaves of the young sycamore, and the golden brown of the bursting oak boughs. The true glory of the Gill just then was the white and the pink white blossoms of the wild fruit-trees for which the place was famed. The clusters of bloom were on the wild cherry; the great crab apple-trees threw long pink blossomed sprays up against the blue heavens, backward against the dark brown rock, forward over the flower-decked pathway. Giant primroses were nestling in corners among the deep undergrowth, fragile wood anemones were looking up with the touch of wistfulness that they always seem to have. A little reed sparrow was twittering and singing on a spray, there was a woodlark on the top of a hawthorn-tree, a thrush was singing his bridal song, far away, up among the hills, the cuckoo was calling, calling, never weary of calling to the spring. They walked on hand in hand, and silently, these two, on through the Eden of white wild flowers and blossoming trees.

Why should it not be silently? The question did not form itself in the brain of either, but it was there unformed, and vaguely influencing to silence. Everything moved to that, to utter stillness, utter rest, utter peace.

In moments of supremest emotion words are always inadequate, and being inadequate they jar and detract. The highest feeling demands that we leave it unexpressed.

It was enough for Genevieve that her hand was in George Kirkoswald's, that he held it there as one who had a right to hold it for ever. There was a strength, a completeness in his grasp that was ■ itself a sufficient promise.

Promise! She would have scorned herself had any thought within her demanded a spoken promise of him.

And as for George Kirkoswald, he too would have known self-scorn if, with that small hand lying confidently in his, he could have had a doubt, a dread, a feeling of uncertainty.

The rocks on either hand were higher and more rugged as they went on. The hanging greenery was hung about more luxuriantly, the undergrowth was deeper and more tangled. Yet still the primroses and the wood anemones clustered among the grass, still the cherry and the wild apple trees were there. Aloft, growing out of a great moss-grown boulder that was cleft almost in twain, was a silver birch swinging its fathery boughs in the air.

They stood awhile, wondering how the bare river rock could nourish so graceful and grateful a thing. There was a tiny streamlet trickling down by the side of it, making the ground moist enough for the water-buttercup to grow. ■ was a quite silent little stream. The only sound to be heard was the twittering of the reed sparrow; the cuckoo far away, calling, calling, never weary of calling to the spring.

Another sound broke upon the stillness presently ■ was George Kirkoswald's voice, a manly voice subdued with a woman's tenderness. "Do you know that I am all but twice your age, my child?" he asked, looking with serious look into the perfect face beside him. A pink flush answered him even as he spoke. Yet Genevieve made other answer.

"Yes, I know it," she said, lifting her dark beautiful eyes to his.

"How long have you known ■?"

"Always—always since I have known you."

"And it does not—it makes no difference to you?"

"Yes, it makes a difference," the girl said. She was answering quite quietly, with a certain strength that came of natural straightforwardness, of absence of coquetry, of rare simplicity of soul. "Yes it makes a difference. I am glad always that you are older."

"I tell me why, Genevieve?"

The girl looked up again with a quick, happy light in her eyes, and a deeper glow almost flashing into her face.

"I have wanted to hear you say that!" she said with childlike eagerness, childlike guilelessness.

"I have said it many times. It is so beautiful, so like music, I could not help saying it. . . I may always say it now?"

"Yes, you may say it always."

Was that some heavy footstep coming crashing down among the undergrowth on the rocks above? ■ seemed as if the very stones and the stems of the trees were cracking and rending asunder. George Kirkoswald started, looked upward just in time, just in time to save the life of Genevieve Bartholomew once again, perhaps, indeed, his own life also.

Genevieve had not understood—there had been no time to understand. She had only heard the riving, snapping, crunching sounds, she had only felt, as ■ were, the shiver of the earth, then, even while a strong arm was clasping her, almost flinging her outward from the path, there came the thunderous thud of fallen rock. Where she had stood with her hand in George Kirkoswald's one moment before, the nearer half of the cleft boulder was lying, with the silver birch, right across the path.

All manner of things had fallen, dragged downward with the rock and with the tree. A great briar had caught Genevieve's hat, swept it from her head. It was lying crushed under the mass of stone. All the shower of her yellow silken hair was about her as she lay unconsciously with her head on George Kirkoswald's shoulder, his arm supporting her, his first kiss upon her lips.

"Genevieve, Genevieve, my darling!" he said hoarsely, passionately. "My child, speak to me!" He was as pale as the girl herself. Could any piece of falling stone have touched her, that she should lie there so stressless, so lifeless, so pallid, so strange?

He stroked the long rippling silken hair, he put the small pale hand to his warm lips, he called again, and yet again, "Genevieve, Genevieve, my child, speak to me!"

There was no answer, no sound save the chirp of the little reed sparrow, twittering in the fallen birch.

George Kirkoswald went on uttering his distress, his anguish, in broken words, in passionate cries, it seemed impossible that she should be there with the spring sunshine turning her yellow hair to glittering gold, with birds chirping all about, with pink-white blossoms fluttering down over her dress, with the white wood-anemone and the blue speedwell at her feet—it seemed impossible in the midst of all this life that this most living of created beings should not have life enough left to hear life's most thrilling and precious words.

"Genevieve, Genevieve, my child, speak one word, if you love me speak one word!"

Only a few minutes had passed, a very few, yet it seemed as if an hour had gone by when the first pale pink tint was discernible on the white lip and cheek. Then the wondering eyes undlosed. Fuller consciousness brought the quick deep blush of maiden shame, for which there seemed to be a thousand reasons.

"Tell me first that you are not hurt in any way?" said Kirkoswald with concern.

"I am not hurt at all," Genevieve replied, "and it was cowardly to be so much startled."

She was trying, as she stood there, still blushing deeply, to gather up and coil the rich thick shower of gold that the breeze was beginning to stir, but it was not easy. George Kirkoswald saw that her hands were tremulous, that she had to make effort.

"Let me help you," he said, taking the heavy coil from her hands and twining it with gentle care. He was looking at it, wondering at its beauty, ■ was not looking down the path, he was not observing a tall, stately figure coming toward them in a sweeping dress of dark red silk.

Diana Richmond was observing him. She had plenty of time to do so as she came noiselessly over the soft turf.

■ was Genevieve Bartholomew who saw her first. Genevieve was turning to thank George for the small service he had done. She saw at once that the doing of it had been witnessed by Miss Richmond.

The girl turned pale, very pale, as if the thing had been a crime, and a change came over the face of George ■ he moved onward by her side. They must meet Miss Richmond, they must pass quite close.

She was looking at them steadily. There was no smile on her face, no change, there was nothing that could be read or comprehended, at any rate there was nothing that Genevieve could comprehend.

Miss Richmond came nearer, looking from under her half closed eyes as she usually did look. Her mouth was lightly compressed, as it always was. She looked very beautiful, very majestic. She passed with a stately bow.

There was nothing more than that—a stately bow of recognition.

A sense of wonder was mingled with the relief that George Kirkoswald and Genevieve felt as they went back down the Gull. They went as they had come, quite silently.

All the way back they kept silence, back through the Eden of white wild flowers and blossoming trees. There was a slight ascent just before they came to the gate that led out to the thymy bank where Noel Bartholomew sat sketching. The pathway was in the shade of some great trees whose trunks were covered with ancient ivy. ■ George Kirkoswald stopped and took Genevieve's hand in his arm. It was trembling still, and his own was less steady than usual.

"You will say one word ■ me, my child?" he asked in a low, pleading tone. "Just one word—say that you are mine!"

Genevieve lifted her face to his, frankly, readily, yet with a beautiful solemnness dawning there. "I am yours always," she said, "I am yours till I die."

And still the reed sparrow went on twittering in the bough, still the cuckoo went on calling in the distance, calling, calling, never weary of calling to the spring.

WORDSWORTH AND 'NATURAL RELIGION.'

By PRINCIPAL SHARP, F.R.D.

A BOOK was writ of late called 'Natural Religion'. It ■ one more of those attempts, so frequent of late, to find a common ground, on which the religious man and the scientific man may meet, and put an end ■ their long controversy. Whether this attempt is more successful than former ones, I do not undertake to say. One thing is clear, that, before there can be any friendly meeting on the ground here proposed, the religious man will have to drop much which Christianity, and indeed most other religions, hold to be essential, and the scientific man will have ■ open his eyes to views to which he has hitherto paid little heed.

This strange book, which is beautifully written, and full of beautiful and suggestive thoughts, is full too of paradoxes and self-contradictions, so much so that it is scarcely possible to make any assertion regarding it, which might not ■ contradicted by some of the many side-glances and casual admissions which are scattered throughout it. But it is of the main drift of it alone that I shall treat. And that drift seems to be an elaborate attempt to find in the natural and the known, without any reference to the unknown which lies beyond it, an object of worship, a religion which shall suffice for human life. It should perhaps be added, that it seems more in the interest of others than of himself, that the author undertakes this task, for he takes no pains to conceal that the religion which he offers to others does not satisfy himself. The common ground between the men of faith and the men of positive science he finds in nature, or that whole sum of things which science observes and investigates.

He points out that nature is an object recognised in common by the religious man and the man of science. The former believes that a Being, above and independent of nature, made and sustains the whole visible universe, that nature is one revelation of that Being, and that the study of it is one branch of theology, or the study of God. And the latter finds in nature a complete theology and a peculiar Deity of his own. For, in the author's words, 'that man believes in God, who feels himself in the presence of a power which is not himself, and is immediately above himself, a power ■ the contemplation of which he is absorbed, in the knowledge of which ■ finds safety and happiness, and such now is nature to the scientific man.' It matters not that in nature, as he studies it, he sees no personal mind and will, no designing wisdom, no benevolence, ■ finds in it an absorbing object of thought, admiration and delight, and this is enough ■ make it a God to him.

One object nature yields to science, namely, a set of ascertained laws, or a theology, and this one theology, according as it is apprehended by one or another side of human mind, awakens three different kinds of religion.

1. The first kind is that evoked by the purely intellectual contemplation of the spectacle of the universe, or nature, exclusive of man. Its immensity, its uniformity, its variety, strike him who contemplates them with awe, wonder, admiration, and these are the religion of the man of science. The order, the unity seen in and through all things is answered by admiration and delight, which are in their nature religious, and form, our author holds, an adequate religion for him who intelligently feels them. Nature 'exclusive of the whole domain of human feeling, will, and morality, may be a God to the purely scientific man.'

2. But there is another meaning of the word nature, which instead of excluding, includes man, and all that is highest in him, his morality, and whatever that implies. Those who fix their eye chiefly on this moral side of nature, that is on man, find herein an object of admiration and worship in the moral affections and their workings, apart altogether from the supernatural source from which they have been supposed to come. They find the religion of humanity, which is simply all the moral element in Christianity, the Christian virtues without any supernatural adjuncts, supernatural hopes and sanctions. Eliminate these from Christianity, and the residuum is the religion of humanity.

3. The third form of religion is the religion of beauty. This has the same object as the scientific religion, namely physical nature, but it regards the object in another way, through another medium. While science regards phenomena through the pure intellect, and looks, through and beyond them, to find the laws which govern them, the unity which pervades them all, the poet and the artist fix their eyes on the visible face of things, dote on their appearances, are absorbed 'with the splendour in the grass, the glory in the flower,' for their own sakes, without troubling themselves about the laws that engender these. They look at the same objects as the man of science does, but through the imagination and the emotions, not through the scientific analyzing intellect. And the poet and the artist find in this beauty which overpreads the world, a religion which absorbs and satisfies them. ■ has much in common with early Greek Paganism, which worshipped the tree and the fountain, but with this difference. The Greek was arrested by these objects, but he passed on from them to some semi human being, who dwelt in them, the naid of the spring, the oread of the mountain. But for the modern worshipper of nature, science has expelled these visionary beings, and he concentrates his gaze all the more intensely on the objects themselves, because he is undisturbed by the thought of any being behind them.

The whole aim of the author, as has been truly said, is to find in the scientific dogmas, the æsthetic aspirations, and the love of culture, which characterize the unbelief of the present day, a natural religion which shall satisfy man. His one great bugbear, the one element he strives to get rid of, is supernaturalism. And by this he means not merely belief in miracles, but belief in a ruling mind transcending physical nature and independent of it. In all his three forms of religion his one endeavour is to shut out not only providence, but a personal being revealing himself in and through phenomena, and to present us with forms of Theism having for their object a mindless universe. Not that he is a materialist, far from it. The objects he places before us are intellectual objects, the omnipresent unity of nature and its laws, beauty pervading all things, morality as it exists in man. Only these must exist and be self-sufficient in themselves, and must in no way be allowed to be channels through which a higher mind speaks to ours. Through page after page of ingenious argument and beautiful illustration, he strives to show that these capita mortua divorced from a personal Maker are sufficient to support and nourish the soul of man. As one follows him through his long reasonings, the one pervading feeling is, what ashes are you offering us for bread?

If anything is clear, from the experience of all ages, it is this, that the soul of man which has once caught sight of an object higher than itself, cannot return ■ worship one which is lower. And a universe, however vast, however awful, and various, and wonderful it may be, which does not manifest a mind and personality in it, and above it, is lower in the scale of being than man. The personal cannot permanently worship the impersonal. An iron order of things may excite fear and awe, but cannot elicit the higher and finer affections—humility, love, adoration, willing self-surrender; above all cannot engender the child-like spirit. When the author says that when we behold the starry heavens, we enter into a sort of communion with them, the contemplation is a beatific vision, he borrows from the old personal religion language which is wholly inapplicable to his own dumb impersonalities.

'Thus saith the high and lofty one that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones.'

Can any one who has once received this wonderful conception of God into his heart, a conception which combines the immensity of time and space so wonderfully with the tenderest, lowliest moral feeling, can he ever turn back to such lifeless idols as this book offers us? But the truth is, the author is not himself content with this poor spiritual pabulum which he manufactures for others. He undertakes the manufacture, I will believe, with kindly intention—from 'an intense desire to gain over the humanists,' and the men of science—a longing 'hope to win back the religious to religion'—by making spiritual paths smooth for mundane feet. But the religious pabulum which he offers to others, and is almost angry if they refuse, does not satisfy himself. At the outset, he admits that he can 'conceive no religion as satisfactory, which falls short of Christianity.' And after contending throughout his book that Supernaturalism is not only unnecessary, but an encumbrance to religion, he at the close admits that Supernaturalism in some sort, the belief in a world beyond our present knowledge, is natural to man, and that this belief may and does influence us in thought, feeling, and action. Though we have not science of it, yet it may reach us through presentiments, probabilities, and other indications, and powerfully affect us. And if, he adds, the news thus brought to us is good news, who will not say that a supernatural religion, thus supplementing a natural one, may be precious, nay, perhaps indispensable. Does not this look like a practical abandonment of his whole argument?

But I have lingered too long over the main drift of the book. The point which it concerns me to note is the interpretation the author gives of Wordsworth's attitude towards religion. What Goethe was abroad, that Wordsworth, he says, was at home, the High priest of Nature, the Worshipper of Natural Beauty. 'Keenly alive to beauty, and deeply reverencing' it, he certainly was, but as Dean Church has well said, 'he puts purity and the severity of truth above beauty.' On this subject I am well aware mankind are deeply divided. There are those who know and love Wordsworth's poetry, and there are those who not only do not know it but do not care to know it, are not only indifferent to it but genuinely dislike it—and these are not stupid persons either.

To the former class I almost feel that an apology is due for what I have to say here, so very a truism to them will seem the assertion that Wordsworth's was an eminently religious and devout mind, in the ordinary sense of these words, and not merely in Professor Seeley's sense.

It is for those who do not know Wordsworth, and who may be misled by Professor Seeley's interpretation of him, that I now write. No doubt, he says many true and fine things of Wordsworth's character and his poetry, but there is nothing in either which makes for the main argument of the book—nothing to show that Wordsworth was satisfied with beauty for its own sake, that he prized it otherwise than as one expression of the Infinite mind revealing itself through beauty. A mindless universe so far from satisfying him—the very idea of it he abhorred.

The author refers to Wordsworth's own words, in which he says that his soul was wedded to the goodly universe in love and holy passion, and tries to show that he found in it 'all the satisfaction, the lasting inward peace, the occasional rapture,' which the best religion can give. But then it was not a dead universe that gave him this, not merely the vastness, the power, and the unity of the forces of nature—it was the universe as the organ through which a mind divine, yet akin to his own mind, spoke to him.

The 'Prelude' is the poem in which Wordsworth speaks most fully—many think most extravagantly—of the all-sufficiency of nature to him. It gives utterance to his experiences in the first flush of early manhood. Yet even in the 'Prelude,' this is the way he regards the visible world. He says that in those early days, his mind looked—

*"Upon the speaking, fact of earth and heaven
As her prime teacher, untroubled with man
I established by the sovereign intellect
Who through the bodily image hath diffused,
As might appear to the eye of feeling time,
A deathless spirit."*

The 'Prelude' and many of Wordsworth's poems of his first epoch, which closed about 1805, contain much about nature, which to most men sounds like rhapsody. Few men—few poets even, can later into this language—it seems to them so greatly exaggerated they could almost fancy it insincere. But on Wordsworth's lips it was not exaggerated, but the simple truth of his experience at the time he wrote it. He was born to do a peculiar work—a work much needed at that time. The intellectual life of England, though beginning ■ awake, was still sadly hampered and confined by a mechanical sense-philosophy, which had dominated the world since the time of Locke. Natural Theology was cast wholly in the mould which Paley had framed for it. The watch and the watch-maker—this was the view men then took of the relation of the universe to the maker of it—a hard, mechanical, depressing view, which, though it might suit the purpose of the logician, was wholly repugnant to the spiritual imagination—to the man of deeper insight. Wordsworth did not deny the argument from design, but it was not ■ a piece of mechanism that he could think of nature, nor of its Upholder as a mechanist. He seems to have been born into the world to chan■ and transfigure the old Paleyan theology. His broad, sensitive, receptive spirit was fitted, as few spirits ever have been, to take into himself all the influences that streamed in upon him from what he calls 'the overflowing soul of nature.' But amid all his lonely raptures in his highest ecstasies, he never lost himself, never dreamed that nature was self-subsistent. When he was most highly rapt in the contemplation of nature, he then felt most intensely that it was so cleaving, because it brought him into contact with a higher spirit than his own.

One might quote many passages of the 'Prelude' in proof of this. One must suffice. For instance, he says that in the lonely places which ■ haunted, he

'Felt
In numberless mere awful & strange
Of the upholder of the true in all
That tolerates the indignity of time,
And from the centre of us is in All finite motion & existence, & in a
In glory marvellous

■ has become a commonplace with many ■ call Wordsworth in those early days, the days of his most fervid inspiration, a Pantheist. In support of this they quote the well known lines from his poem on Tintern Abbey, written as early as the year 1798

And I have felt
A Presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts; a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the deep blue even and the morning air,
And the blue sky and in the mind of man,
A motion and a spirit, that is all
And all that is, and all that can be,
And rolls through all things

■ this passage stood alone in Wordsworth's works, there might be some excuse for misunderstanding it. But taken with all his other poems of the same or of later date, it is seen to express very powerfully quite another thought, the sense he had that the Omnipresent Presence which was in his own being and upheld it, was present not less in all the forms of nature, and spoke through them to his spirit, a silent but sympathetic language.

What then has been called Wordsworth's Pantheism is his protest against a lifeless mechanical way of regarding the outward world, his strong assertion that there ■ more in nature than mere common sense, or the dominant philosophies discover. This might be easily shown from his works at large. But there is one passage in the 'Prelude,' so apposite here, combining in one mental sweep what has been called his pantheistic feeling with the highest rapture of devout Theism, that I cannot pass it by. He says that even in boyhood and youth—

'From nature and her overflowing soul,
I had received so much that all my thoughts
Were stamped in feeling. I was ■ then Convinced when with boys met
I felt the sentiment of B. in yew-wood O'er all that moves and all that is, a something still,
O'er all that, lost beyond the reach of thought
And human knowledge, to the human eye
Invisible, yet living to the heart
O'er all that leaps and runs and shouts and sings,
O'er all the gladness air, o'er all that glides
In smooth the wave yet in the wave itself,
And mighty depths of waters'

These lines attribute to all nature such a life, such an all-pervading spirit, that they might, equally with those from 'Tintern Abbey,' be mistaken for Pantheism. But listen to the conclusion of the passage —

Wonder not
If high the transport greet the joy I tell, (remembering in this sort of rapture earth and heaven
With every form of creature) ■ it looks
As only the Uncreated with a consciousness
Of adoration with an eye of love

The Pantheism which can pass upward in such a strain as that is no Pantheism at all, but a quick and vivid sense of the life of things, which would that it were vouchsafed in larger measure to our torpid spirits!

In the 'Prelude' and others of the earlier poems Wordsworth makes much of the all-sufficiency of nature, its adequacy to suggest and sustain faith in all the highest moral truths. He even in some passages goes so far as to say that ■ learnt directly from nature all that revelation teaches. So that the author of 'Natural Religion' could cite passages from that poem which seem to justify him in asserting that to Wordsworth revealed religion does not supply a defect ■ natural religion, but only tells over again, and to Wordsworth's mind tells less impressively, what has been already told by nature.

But if we look at Wordsworth's works as a whole, we shall see that it does not express his permanent conviction ■ is but a one-sided utterance. On this language two remarks may be made

1 Though Wordsworth's religious faith was not consciously derived from direct Church teaching, was in some sort outside of ecclesiastical tradition, yet he had been reared in a Christian atmosphere, and had drunk in many of its truths, and much of its sentiment, ungraciously. It was with a mind filled with these that he went forth to look on nature

How different a book would nature have presented had he been 'a Pagan tickled in a creed outworn,' and read that book with eyes unillumined by Christianity!

2 From the first, his liveliness to nature's influences was combined with earnest and deep, if not very pliant or expansive, moral sympathies. The natural and the moral in him acted and reacted on each other. In 'Tintern Abbey,' he says that he found—

'In nature and the language of the sense
I felt that I was part of that which never Ceases, and that I myself, though I am
Of this mortal frame, am part of that which Is immortal.'

In his transports amid the mountains he had never for a moment, as Goethe and many artistic persons had done, turned his back on human sufferings and the moral side of things. For a person, no doubt, interest in man was in the background, nature was paramount with him. But as time went on, this order reversed itself, man, his sufferings, his hopes, and destiny, became more to him than nature was. This change first comes on about the time when the 'Prelude' was completed, in the year 1805. In that year he met with his first great sorrow, in the loss by shipwreck of his favourite brother, a gentle and meditative spirit like himself. The depth of this sorrow has left its impression on the elegiac Stanzas suggested by a picture of Pelee Castle. There he says that,

'A power is gone which nothing can restore
A deep distress is in human soul my soul'

And in a letter written about the same time to Sir George Beaumont this striking reflection occurs

'Why have we a choice and a will and a notion of justice and injustice crushing us to be moral agents? Why have we sympathies that make the best of us so afraid of inflicting pain and sorrow, which yet we see dealt about us so lavishly by the supreme governor? Why should our notions of right towards each other and to the sentient beings (within our influence) differ so widely from what appears to be his notion and rule if everything were to end here? Would it not be blasphemy to say that (upon the supposition of the thinking principle being destroyed by death) however inferior we may be to the great cause and ruler of things, we have more of love in our nature than He has? The thought is monstrous, yet how to get rid of it except upon the supposition of another and better world, I do not see.'

Other troubles soon followed, the loss of his two young children, who rest in Grasmere churchyard, with a beautiful epitaph by the father over one of them. How far these outward events caused the change I cannot say. Anyhow, they are coincident with a gradual but perceptible change of sentiment, in which nature fell into the background, and man became the more prominent object of his regard. Henceforth nature became secondary, 'important to him chiefly as the stage of man's action, and as allied to his ideas, his passions and affections.'

People talk of Wordsworth as a mere dreamer in a Northern Arcadia, and Mr Ruskin, who knows better, countenances this, when he speaks of him, as 'fond of primroses, kind to the parish children, and reverent of Wilkinson's spade.' When they so speak they forget altogether the large part of his poetry which deals directly with man—they forget, for instance, the 'Sonnets to Liberty,' some seventy in number, which breathe a deeper sympathy with the great men who were struggling and dying for European freedom, than any poetry of the time breathed. How could it be, that he whose heart had been so stirred by the events of the French Revolution, and the great ideas and problems then awakened, should relapse into entire forgetfulness of them? As Dean Church says, 'He had changed his views of many things, his application of principles, his judgments of men, parties, and institutions which embodied these principles, but his fundamental principles were unchanged.'

The 'Excursion,' which was published in 1814, when Wordsworth was forty-four, contains his mature thoughts about man's nature and destiny. The teaching is full of Theism, but a wider, more expansive, more spiritual Theism than was common in that day, or perhaps than is possible to ordinary minds in any day.

In fact it may be said emphatically of the 'Excursion,' what is true more or less of all Wordsworth's poetry, that ■ is

Haunted for ever by the Eternal Mind

Yet it must be allowed that the 'Excursion' is Theistic, rather than specially Christian. Christianity is everywhere recognised, in passing as it were, but the teaching, devout though it is, is not distinctively Christian teaching. Most religious persons in reading through the poem, even cursorily, must have felt a want—a disappointment, while those who have read it carefully, felt something like a book when they came to the crowning passage, the cope-stone of the book. It is where the Solitary, after much discussion, asks unflinchingly what can he do ■ get rid of his misery?

'Shall the groaning spirit cast its load
At the Redeemer's feet?' ■

From this crucial, this point-blank question, Wordsworth goes off ■ a tangent.

'Manifest and various are the ways
Of restoration.' ■

■ tells the Solitary, all leading ■

'Peace in ourselves and union with our God' or him (the Solitary) access to truth, a return to faith is preserved, if he will open ear and soul to the finer intimations of nature, and unlock his heart in friendly intercourse with his fellow men. ■ is here that the grand passage about the Child and the Shell occurs: this crucial passage, even if there were none other, certainly gives ground for the charge which Mr. Ruskin prefers against Wordsworth, that he is 'incurious to see in the Hands the mint of the nails.'

That Wordsworth himself felt either that there was this defect in his teaching, or that it had been misunderstood, is clear from the iteration he subsequently made in another passage of the 'Excursion.' It occurs in the pathetic story of Margaret, in the First book. After hearing it, Wordsworth is silent with sorrow, till the Wanderer thus addresses him:

'Thou friend! enough in sorrow thou hast seen,
The purposes of wisdom ask no more
To cheer or cheerless and a longer rest
The forms of things with an unworthy eye.'

In a later edition he altered the passage and added several lines, thus:

The purposes of wisdom ask no more
Nor more would thou have craved as due to one Who in her words dreams had oftentimes felt
The unbounded might of prayer, and learned with soul Famed on the Cross that consolation brings
From sources deeper far than deepest pain
To the meek sufferer. Why then should we seek
The forms of things with an unworthy eye?

Changes such as these in a passage here identified, cannot alter the main drift of the 'Excursion,' which while recognising Christian revelation by the way, throws the chief stress on that religion which is gathered by the heart from brooding over the solemn facts of human life. But they do tend to show that as the pressure of life grew heavier, and as days were closing in, the need of definite Christian truths came more home to him.

But the fullest expression he has given to his Christian faith, is in the concluding stanza of 'The Primrose of the Rock.' One of his latest poems, written in 1831, the style of the verse, so solemn and laboured, is very different from that of his earlier lyrics, but it is not the less significant for that.

My heart far
Thou tremblings that reprove
Our venial tendencies to hope,
Is God's redeeming love
Thou love which changed—for woe's disease,
For sorrow that has been
Of hopeless dust for wretched age
Their moral element
And turned the thralldom of a curse
To types beneficent
If I should think though we are we to
The suffering sons of men
From one oblivious winter called Shall rise and breathe again,
And in eternal summer love
Our three score years and ten
To humbleness of heart demands
This presence from on high,
The faith that elevates the just,
Before and when they die,
And in this soul a separate heaven
A quest for Duty?

Now let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter. It is thus. Wordsworth of a nature meditative and devout, not by reasoning, but by intuition, was from the first far beyond most men conscious of the presence of the Eternal Mind. In his earlier days it came to him mainly through the forms of nature, which he felt to be filled and upheld by the same mind which filled and upheld his own. Afterwards it spoke to him more through man, his moral life, his struggles and even his defects, later on still, the Christian truths, he had long silently recognised, came more consciously home to him. In the sight of all that he and others had to bear, bereavement, decay, and death, he felt the need of a more definite and sure support, and he found that support in the consciously-held faith of the Christian Redemption.

But it is not by the number or the equality of the definite truths which he has inculcated that Wordsworth has made the world his debtor. Not for these do we most reverence him, but for that freshness of eye which enabled him for himself in youth to rediscover the beauty of the outward world, and to awaken the perception of it in others, giving them new eyes to see it, new hearts to delight in it—for that freshness and depth of soul, which enabled him ever more keenly as he grew older, to see beneath the dust of commonplace, the worth and the capacity for good that lies hidden in the souls and affections of ordinary men, and ■ esteem these with a reverence, which the steady sight of all their miseries and degradations could not dull—for the steadfastness with which, while bereavement and decay pressed closer, he still maintained his serene faith and inward peace unclouded, and looking with eye fixed on the life beyond, was able to speak reassuring words, such as we listen for in vain in the poetry of to-day.

'Still glides the stream, and shall not cease to glide;
The form remains, the function never dies.
While we, the brave, the mighty, and the wise,
We men, who in our morn of youth defied
The elements, must vanish,—be it so!
Enough, if something from our hands have power
To live, and act, and serve the future hour;
And if, as tow'rd the silent tomb we go,
Through love, through hope, through faith's transcendent down,
We feel that we are greater than we know.'

This is the voice he spoke to our youth, and still speaks to our age. And as the days are visibly closing in, we feel more thankful to him who could speak such high words to hearten and cheer us. And for those who are still young, one could wish no better thing, than that while youth is still theirs, they might learn to know and love Wordsworth's poetry. For they may be well assured that, just in proportion as they can do so, they will grow in purity, in happiness, and in all goodness.

EGYPT AFTER THE WAR.

By LADY BRASSEY, AUTHOR OF "A VOYAGE IN THE 'SUXDEAM,'" ETC.

PART III.

SATURDAY, February 10th.—I have interviewed Mr. Cook's agent, and have arranged to start on Monday, and to go by train as far as Assiout, where we shall find a dahab that somebody has got and has left up there, that is at present engaged in towing corn barges. The agent promises that we shall go up to Luxor and back in ten days. I fear we shall not have time to get as far as the First Cataract; for, being a large party, we are uncertain when we can get comfortable berths on one of the homeward-bound steamers from Alexandria to Marseilles, which, just at this time of the year, are beginning to get crowded.

Nubar Pacha had been good enough to arrange with Brugsch Bey to show us the royal mummies and other interesting things that have been lately discovered, and are now in the Boulak Museum. We went there early this morning, with Lord Dornier and Captain Fitzroy, and heard an interesting lecture, delivered in the most pleasing manner, by a man who, from his knowledge and research, is thoroughly capable of discours-ing on the subject. Recent discoveries have thrown great light on Egyptian history, and will doubtless prove of the utmost value in future researches. The royal mummies were found by some peasants, almost accidentally, lying together in a common tomb, whither they had doubtless been removed for safety, hundreds, or perhaps thousands, of years ago, from the magnificent tombs of the kings, which had proved on exploration to be empty. The history of Egypt is truly wonderful, and the more one tries to understand it the more marvellous it seems. The special isolation of the country, while preventing the spread of ■ culture and learning to other nations, tended ■ preserve its monuments from too frequent spoliation; and, aided by the dryness of the climate, ■ keep them intact.

The custom of burying the dead secretly, and of building up the doors of the tombs, has saved the latter through long ages from desecration and injury. In many cases the inscriptions in the interior of these tombs, and the colour of the paintings, are now found to be as clear and as bright as they must have been originally. Some of the commoner objects that have been thus preserved strike one, I think, as even more interesting than those which are rarer and more precious, and of which more care is naturally now taken. To see, for instance, as we did to-day, a somewhat worn, straw-bottomed chair, and to be told that it was in use six thousand years ago, is startling and almost incredible: and yet its age is a well-authenticated fact. Enclosed in the same case with the chair are earthenware pots, containing corn, dates, and figs, mummified ducks, legs of mutton, and various other edibles, intended as offerings to the gods; together with network, string, and baskets, exactly resembling those in use at the present time, and so fresh-looking that, except by actually touching them, it is impossible to distinguish any difference between them and the modern articles of a similar kind placed by their side. Many treasures doubtless still lie hidden; by the discovery of which much light would be thrown on the history of the world, especially on the terrible gap that exists in ancient Egyptian history with regard to some of the most important dynasties. Mr. Stuart Poole, in his enthusiasm, says that "the cost of a pack of hounds for one year would discover all the lost cities of Egypt, and would fill up ■ the gaps in her history." Such a statement is perhaps slightly exaggerated; but no doubt a few thousands of pounds would go a long way towards attaining that result.

In the afternoon we went to see the Egyptian athletic sports, held at the Palace of Gear, where some of the native troops are quartered. On our arrival we found a large assemblage, including Sir Evelyn and Lady Wood and Colonel Duncan (who is to command the new Egyptian artillery), most of the Europeans in Cairo, and a good many of the principal natives. The Khedive would not come, notwithstanding Sir Evelyn Wood's efforts to persuade him ■ do so; his reason being that he was afraid his soldiers would not acquit themselves so well as the English soldiers did last Monday at Abbassir, and that people would laugh at them; which he would not like to see. As a sort of compromise ■ sent his two small sons, with a tutor; and there they sat, poor boys, on two gilt chairs, in the centre of the diplomatic circle, not speaking to any one, and looking very much bored. All the ladies of the harem, in their carriages, were present, and the Ministers had broken up their council, which generally lasts from two to six o'clock, on purpose to attend. I was quite as much interested ■ the people as in the sports, if not more so, though the latter were so well carried out that there was not the slightest ground for the Khedive's misgivings. The excitement about the "tog of war," in particular, was tremendous, the men cheering and throwing their feces into the air just like Englishmen. ■ was quite pleasing to see the usually melancholy-looking Egyptian soldiers so bright and animated.

I was sorry when the falling sun warned me that it was time to depart; but we could not stay later, as Sir Edward Malet had invited the children and me to dine with him and go afterwards to the opera. La Marseillaise was performed; and much the little ones enjoyed the entertainment. The Khedive has one large stage-box, and the Vice-reine another opposite; one side of the ground tier being entirely reserved for the ladies of the harem, and divided into boxes, closed in with figured wire-gauze, which looked like lace-work. The occupants could see all that was going on perfectly well, but were themselves invisible, with the exception of an occasional gleam of light from their jewels. The mise en scene was good, and everything would have been charming, but for the fact that between each act the audience indulged freely in smoking, which made the atmosphere thick and suffocating.

Sunday, February 11th.—In the afternoon we went with the Duke of Sutherland, Mr. Mackenzie Wallace, and several others, under the guidance of Rogers Bey, to see an old mosque, in which are now preserved all the oldest and most curious things that have been found in other mosques in different parts of the city, including wood carving, inlaid work, tiles, and many other curiosities of an interesting and unique character. Specially beautiful are the iridescent glass jars, used for the arceuths of lamps in the old mosques, of which there ■ really a splendid collection. There ■ also the trunk of an old tree, which, having originally grown near the tomb of some sheikh or holy man, is so completely studded with nails, on which hang bits of human hair, that it is impossible to see the tree itself. To stick a nail in and attach a piece of hair to it was supposed to be an infallible cure for headache and for many other ills to which flesh is heir. On our way back, passing through the most Moorish part of the Arab bazaar, we came across a Gothic arch, which originally formed part of a Christian church, and which had been brought from St. Jean d'Acres by one of the kings, and erected here in a place where it looks singularly inappropriate and out of its element.

Later in the day I went with Lady Dufferin to have tea with the Princess Mansour, sister of the Khedive. We were received at the inner door of the palace by seven or eight white female slaves, all richly dressed in rather dull brown striped silk dresses, with a good deal of white lace about them, and made in semi-European fashion. I don't think the costume suits them nearly as well as the more gorgeous Eastern garments they used to wear a few years ago. Slaves and French fashions do not harmonize at all. At the top of the stairs we were met by more slaves, and, a few rooms farther on, by the Princess's companion, who conducted us into the presence of the Princess herself. Our hostess's costume consisted of a black satin dress with a long train; and close by her was an enormous boarhound. Two full-sized greyhounds played about the room, and in their gambols with their huge companion threatened destruction to the ornaments and numerous small tables, of which there were many in the apartment. I was surprised to see dogs in such a place; but the Princess Mansour does not allow herself to be bound by the ordinary rules of a harem. The companion told us that the dogs caused great alarm to the Egyptian visitors, and were always kept out of the way when any were expected. After tea, at which all sorts of sweetmeats and cakes, and the thickest of buffalo cream, were produced, the Princess showed us over her house, which is not only richly, but tastefully and originally furnished, in a mixture of Egyptian and French styles, and is adorned with more nick-nack and little ornaments than I had ever before seen in an Oriental residence. Yesterday, when I went ■ Parvis's, the furniture-shop of Cairo, where is made the most beautiful modern furniture and woodwork, in old Cairene style, everything I saw that was prettiest and handsomest seemed to have been bought by the Princess Mansour. Many of the articles were made from her own designs.

Monday, February 12th.

—We started by the eight-o'clock tram for Assiout. It was, as it always appears to be here, a cloudless day, with a cool north wind. At the station, which seemed to be badly managed, and where there was a great deal of confusion, we found Mr. Cook's agent, waiting to see us off, together with a dragoman who was to take care of us, and a comfortable saloon carriage to travel in. The carriage, by the way, had a history; for Arabi slept in ■ with some of his friends the night before Tel-el-Kebir, and escaped in it to Cairo after the battle. I don't exactly know why ■ should be so, but for a defeated enemy to retreat by railway seems contrary to one's established ideas on the subject. Railways, no doubt, afford invaluable means of transport in warlike operations; but, somehow or other, the idea of a train and of a battle do not quite harmonize.

As the sun got higher in the heavens the heat increased, and the dust became so intolerable that we were obliged to close every window and ventilator, till we were nearly suffocated. Still, the dust found ■ way in, covered us from head to foot, filled our eyes and mouths, and made the carriage and everything in it of one uniform brown hue.

Fortunately, we stopped long enough at most of the stations to enable us to descend for a little fresh air, on which occasions Irak, the dragoman, and the attentive car boy, turned everything out, beat the cushions, and dusted the carriage generally, but it was all of no use, for long before we got to the next station we were in just the same state again. It was a miserable journey, and one I should endeavour to dissuade any one from undertaking, notwithstanding the time that we there by gained in making an expedition up the Nile. The railway runs through a strip of fertile country, generally almost alongside the river, and passes several important towns, including Benisouff and Minieh. At Bedreshayn, fifteen miles from Cairo, we had a fine view of the Pyramids of Sakkaiah. It is from there that the excursion to the Pyramids is generally made on donkeys. At Wasia there is a branch line to El Fayoom, that oasis in the desert, watered by a canal cut from the Nile, which is said to have been at one time not only the most fertile but the most populous district of Egypt. Although only twenty three miles in length, from north to south, and twenty eight in breadth, it is reputed to have contained 366 towns and villages. At the present time the population is about 150,000. The banks of the railway are the favourite road, and as they are composed of loose sand, the traffic increases the amount of dust, though, on the other hand, it makes the journey by train much more interesting and amusing. The traveller can get nothing to eat on the way, but we had brought a well filled basket with us, and breakfast and lunch served to pass away a portion of the time.

Soon after eight o'clock in the evening we reached Assiout, to our great relief, and were met by Tadros, the dragoman who is to take us up the Nile, carrying a lantern with six candles in it—a special mark of distinction, as I was afterwards informed—and by a perfect army of men bearing lanterns and leading donkeys. After the usual amount of shouting and squabbling without which it appears to be impossible to do anything in this country, and the administration of a few sound blows round by the dragoman, we started off—quite a long procession—across the line, close in front of the still puffing and steaming engine, which alarmed my donkey considerably. ■ was a deliciously warm night, but the comparatively cool air was refreshing after our hot, dusty journey. A short quarter-of-an-hour's ride brought us to the river's bank, where, with the aid of a plank, we stepped on board the dahabeeah Gaillie, which is to be our home for a week or two. The cabin smiled a bright welcome, with all the preparations for dinner, on a snowy cloth, decorated with flowers. The berths, though small, looked comfortable, the beds white and clean. The saloon, about half as big again as that of our little forty-ton yacht, the Norman, had three large windows on each side, and contained two sofas, two easy chairs, one round table, at which eight people might dine comfortably, a looking-glass, and some shelves. With a few rugs, framed photographs, and specialities of our own, I think we shall make it very cosy and homelike, if not quite so bright and pretty as the dearly-beloved Sunbeam.

Tuesday, February 13th.—About five o'clock I was awakened by the preparations for our departure, and shortly before six, just as the day was dawning, I looked out of my large window and saw the palm-groves that surround Assiout fading away in the distance, and found we were really under way and gliding along with an almost imperceptible motion. It was delightful to be still and watch the ever-changing panorama, as it swiftly unrolled itself. Sometimes the banks were low and sandy, and perfectly covered with innumerable wild-fowl, then perhaps muddy, with luxuriant crops of grain of all kinds growing down ■ the water's edge. I never saw vegetation of more vivid and exquisite green, varying from the truest emerald to every shade of that colour, and producing an effect most pleasant to the eye. We frequently passed Arab villages, some mere collections of mud-hovels, with a few palm-trees among them, others more worthy of the name of village or town, with domes and minarets, the castellated style of the houses making them from a distance look almost like fortresses. I could not understand this appearance at first; but the explanation is simple. It seems that the whole valley of the Nile abounds in the mud of which the porous earthenware jars, in use not only in Egypt but throughout the East, are made. Many of the boats we met were laden with them, and at almost every village there were thousands waiting to be shipped. Numbers, of course, get cracked or broken in transit, the fragments being built up in the walls of the houses, while the less injured jars are somewhat artistically arranged round the roofs, thus forming a sort of battlement. Special pains appear to ■ taken with the numerous square pigeon-towers that are to be seen in every village. They are often higher than the surrounding houses, and, with long poles built into and projecting at right-angles from the mud walls, they afford a resting-place for the thousands of pigeons that are to be seen flying along the banks and over the fields in flocks. Sometimes they make the river side quite blue when a cloud of them settle on the bank. They are kept for the sake of the manure they afford, though I should have thought the damage they must do to the crops would far exceed the value of their assistance in producing them.

The wind began to freshen about eight o'clock, making the river, which is tolerably broad, so rough that our flat-bottomed boat moved about a good deal, and caused us to feel ignominiously sea-sick! After breakfast, though the wind, which was from the north, and therefore fair, continued fresh and cold, the water was smooth, and we were able thoroughly to inspect our floating home, and to enjoy sitting on deck and watching the shifting scenery. Once or twice in the course of the day I thought we must have had an accident, for we rocked about occasionally, frequently oversailed the tug, and narrowly escaped collision with her. At last I persuaded the captain to take in the large sail (a curious operation, by-the-by, one of the crew having to swarm out to the extreme end of the long narrow yard) and to substitute a smaller one, which is generally used only for the return voyage, with stream, down the Nile. The doctor, who has had considerable experience in the management of sailing boats, told me that he had never before felt so glad to see a sail taken in.

Wednesday, February 14th.—We were off again at 6.30 a.m., and after passing Sohag, a large town, and Elkhameem, a still more important place, inhabited chiefly by Christians, and containing a Franciscan convent-school and two Coptic churches, we reached Girgeh—described, I believe with truth, as “the dirtiest town in Egypt,”—at half-past one.

Being towed up the river in a delightful mode of progression. The banks are almost everywhere low, and from the top of the deck house a large extent of country, sometimes beautiful, and always varying, is visible. As we got farther south the produce of the soil became more tropical in character, tobacco, sugar-cane, cotton, and indigo being largely cultivated, besides every variety of grain, and vast quantities of lentils—the small bean which forms the staple food of the Egyptian peasant.

We have been unpleasantly reminded by occasional shocks that the waters of the Nile, though swift, are not deep, and have spent several hours, both to day and yesterday, waiting for the little steamer that tows us to be hauled off sand-banks, on which she has got firmly stuck. Whenever this occurs there is always a good deal of noise, and a certain amount of praying—or cursing (I am not sure which)—in Arabic, but, beyond the delay, no harm is done. Sometimes the tow rope is loosed, and then we go drifting away down stream till we stick in the bank at the side, whereupon the steamer, having got free herself, has to come to our rescue.

Thursday, February 15th—We started at four o'clock this morning, in order to try and make up some of the time we have lost, and to reach Luxor to-morrow as agreed, but the pilot shortly afterwards announced that it was too dark to proceed, and we therefore anchored again till half past six. The banks were low and sandy, and not so highly cultivated as those we have hitherto passed, but I was surprised to see how imposing the mountains behind Denderah, and away in the distance towards Abydos, looked. I had not imagined there were such high mountains in the desert.

Soon after one o'clock we met the Mars, one of Cook's large excursion steamers, and stopped her in order to put some letters on board. We also passed another of Cook's steamers, full of soldiers—invalids who had been sent up the Nile for the benefit of their health. I believe the last trip was a great success in every respect, and that much good was derived from it.

In the course of the afternoon we had our first view of an Egyptian temple, that of Denderah, with which, as seen from a distance, I must confess that I was disappointed. Though I have been reading many books on Egypt and its antiquities lately, I had not fully realised how completely the ancient Egyptians were in the habit of protecting their buildings from the spoiler and robber by means of high stone walls, so that what is in many cases a most magnificent temple inside looks like a huge stone barn from without and from afar.

The air is simply perfect, bracing, and yet not cold, except in the early morning. It is a delightful experience altogether, and we all enjoy it thoroughly. I think I like the early mornings best for I generally wake about half-past four, and, just drawing back the curtains of my window, enjoy the gorgeous vision of an Eastern night, quite different from anything we ever see in our cold, northern clime. Great as is the contrast between an English and an Egyptian winter, in the heat of the sun, and the cloudlessness of the sky during the day, I think the nights are even more remarkable. The atmosphere is so clear that each star of any magnitude seems almost like a moon, and casts its independent track upon the water, while, as to the moon herself, how can one describe the beauty of that pale golden sphere, that hangs suspended like a huge globe from the deep azure vault of heaven, shedding so strong a light that it is easy to read by it! Towards six the stars begin to pale, and even the moon to lose some of her effulgence, before the bright light of the coming dawn, which, in its turn, has to give way to the rising sun, the earliest rays of which gild the mountain tops, and throw a roseate tint over the desert wastes of sand stretching into the far distance, and over the fields of dazzling green nearer at hand. Soon the whole landscape is flooded with life and light, and another bright, cloudless Egyptian day has begun. But if the sunrises are beautiful, what shall I say of the sunsets? About the one there is almost an air of chilliness—a hope and promise of what is to come, mingled with a feeling of responsibility and a sort of half dread of what the day may possibly bring forth. About the other there is a sense of fulfilment and repose, before night comes and throws her mantle over the world.

Friday, February 16th—We were all somewhat excited at the prospect of so soon seeing Luxor, Karnak, and Thebes, the aim and object of our voyage. About mid-day we got the first glimpses of some of the grand ruins in the distance, and stared and peered at them through our glasses. On reaching Luxor, at two o'clock, the first object that met our eyes was a long, low, white building, the Karnak Hotel, with a terrace overhanging the Nile. Then, just showing its front over the mud houses, appeared one of the famous obelisks of Luxor, passing which, some grand columns and gateways, half hidden by wretched little hovels built against them, or by still more hideous staring white-houses of greater pretensions, became visible. Some of the latter were the residences of the various European consuls, and from each of these, as the dahabeeah passed, a gun was fired by way of salute. Almost in the centre of the town, but happily with a sort of open square in front of it, facing the river, is the splendid porch of the great temple, then come more ugly white and dirty mud houses, and then an open space and a pretty garden, surrounded by a wall, with a gateway, over which is written in large letters, "Cook's Luxor Hotel." Passing a little creek full of boats, we were soon moored against the mud bank of the quiet little island above, close to a small farmyard in which were a pretty white camel and a good many animals of various kinds, including some apparently very fierce dogs.

Having arrived at Luxor, you may be sure it was not very long before we landed, for, although disappointed in our first view of the place, we were naturally anxious to see more of it. First we went to the hotel, which appears to be a comfortable building, with a civil and attentive manager. It is situated in the midst of a lovely garden, surrounded on all sides by water, and full of exquisite and fragrant flowers, of which I was only too glad to get a handful. We next called on the British Consul, Mustapha Agha, a fine old man, black as a coal, with a long grey beard. He resides, or at all events has his office, in the porch of the Great Temple of Luxor, where he entertained us with the eternal coffee, pipes, and sherbet, apologising at the same time for the absence of his son, Achmet Efendi, who is suffering terribly from ophthalmia, and on whom the doctor has kindly pronounced to try his skull.

comparative want of interest with which one sees, for the first time, its former companion, now standing in the Place de la Concorde, Paris. The latter looks so utterly out of harmony with all its surroundings, like Cleopatra's needle on the banks of the muddy Thames, half covered with blackened snow or dripping with ink-like rain, after having for centuries pointed its golden apex to the clear blue sunlit sky by day and the starry heavens by night. The existing obelisk at Luxor, still occupying its own appointed place near one entrance to the Great Temple, now more or less in ruins and covered with mud huts, is a very different thing, believe me, to any obelisk seen elsewhere, under other circumstances.

The principal hall of the Great Temple is large, and full of interesting hieroglyphics, some of them unlike those found in any other temple. Close to—in fact forming part of—Mustapha Agha's house, what was once Lady Duff Gordon's residence, from the balcony of which she used to gaze on those splendid Nile sunsets, so wonderfully described in her books.

In the evening an American lady very kindly invited us to go with her and her husband to the United States Consulate, where a grand fantasia had been organized for the benefit of the tourists.

A Nubian Boy

staying at the hotel. We accordingly mounted our donkeys, and a short ride through deep sand in the bright moonlight, piloted by the one-eyed very black American Consul's son, brought us to the house, where, as usual, we were hospitably received and entertained, coffee and pipes, cigarettes and sherbet, being provided for such as chose to indulge in them. The room was crowded, and the performers were celebrated dancing-girls from Kenah, richly dressed and covered with gold and jewel. Some of the dances were slow and monotonous, some energetic and lively, and some altogether extraordinary. One in particular, in which each of the girls carried a bottle full of water on her head, was most wonderful. The music was deafening, the smoke overpowering, and the atmosphere stifling. We were therefore glad to make our escape before the entertainment was over, much to the distress of our hospitable black host.

The ride home by moonlight and the row off to the dahabeeah were, to my mind, the most pleasant part of the evening, though I am afraid perhaps it sounds ungrateful to say so.

IN MEMORIAM.

MARCH 25TH, 1864

LO! in the flush of youth, when hope was high,
And her sweet light like sunshine touch'd the years,
Death comes, when not a cloud was in the sky,
And unites a royal household into tears

And all the people standing from afar
Can only watch, with pity breathing breath,
A queenly mother that has seen his star
Shoot down into the night of early death

O mateless one! In this dark hour of hope,
A nation sorrows for thy child and thee,
The widow of him who had for horoscope
Our second Albert—that was not to be

Prince of the people, yet one with all their aims,
Who saw the life around them with their eyes,
A royal lowly heart to all their claims,
And quick to catch the wisdom of the wise

Our hopes were high, the seeming gracious years
Bent towards him and flower'd upon his way—
One touch shook all their blossoms and, in tears,
His England mourns beside his grave this day

No more "the untravell'd traveller"—he stands
In that high realm where soul to soul outflow,
And shapes to perfect orb, with holier hands,
The uncompleted life he left below

Hereafter, there shall be on England's page
His picture for our children as they read,
A young Prince full of courtesy, and sage,
Loved by the people and a Prince indeed

And in their eyes, as in our own this day,
There shall be tears for her who, late a bride,
A wife and mother, now walks her widow'd way,
A nation's love and sorrow at her side.

ALFRED ANDERSON

THE EVOLUTION OF THE CORSET.

By E. M. BEAL.

THE fact that so many people are content with the order of things which civilization has decided for them before they were born, may account for their objection to accepting any decided change in matters which concern their own individuality.

"To do as others do"—others being equivalent ■ the majority of people—is instinctive with nearly all of us. Fashion and Mother Grundy have been left to decide our manners, our clothes, the size of our establishments, and the number of our servants. And, as a whole, there ■ not much to grumble at. Only now that dress reformers and some of the extreme sanitarians are telling us that women's dress ■ unhealthy, that there ■ no rhyme or reason why they should wear stays or skirts, and that both are injurious, we naturally begin to wonder why Mother Grundy ever allowed them to be treated as necessities, and why she is now so much opposed ■ their abolition. The truth is, Mother Grundy must go with the times; she is as much led as leading. Mother Grundy, when she lived in Athens, induced the Greek girls to emulate the Venus of Milo because this was the fashionable figure, and now, through long centuries, she has prescribed an artificial type of figure. It is not our present object to say whether her teaching is good or bad, injurious or beneficial, we will only show how, through centuries past, her dictates have been observed, and how the corset of to-day has been evolved.

As long ago as the days of the Greeks and Romans, ■ slight, slender figure was admired, and stoutness looked upon ■ a deformity. Martial ridiculed fat women, and Ovid puts large waists in the first rank of his remedies against love. Several means were tried then ■ now, not only to restrain an expanding figure, but to enhance the beauties of a very slight one. But they were of a different kind from those with which we are familiar. Bandages were worn with the generic name of fasciæ mamillares. These consisted of the strophium, the cloth worn round the bosom, the tenuis, a simple band below; and the zona, or waist belt. When bandages failed, those who valued the beauty of their figures had recourse to a remedy prescribed by Serenus Sammonicus. They enveloped their busts with garlands of ivy, which were thrown on the fire as soon as withdrawn, and afterwards rubbed all the upper part of their figures either with goose fat mixed with warm milk, or with the egg of a partridge.

Men were as vain as the women, if we are to believe Aristophanes and other writers. The great comic dramatist mocked his contemporary Cinesias for wearing busks of linden-wood; and Capitolinus, in his biography of the Emperor Antony, mentions that he also had recourse ■ them to compress his swelling figure. Testimony is conflicting, however. Some contend that the ancients wore veritable corsets, arguing that when Homer, ■ describing Juno's toilette when she wishes to captivate Jupiter, speaks of the two girdles worn around her waist—the one bordered with gold fringe, the other borrowed from Venus—he was really describing a Greek corset; and that the egide or cuirass of Minerva which Virgil describes, is to be interpreted in the same manner. But this view is surely mistaken, for no monument of antiquity, no artistic work, no evidence gleaned from other sources, points to the use of stiff, unyielding, whale-boned corsets.

Bandages were worn under the empire, such as are shown in the Musée des Antiques, but when barbarism succeeded the luxurious habits of later Rome, even the bandages were discarded. The period of transition which then began with the abandoning of all bandages, ended some centuries later in the commencement of the real corset. At first it was a simple under-bodice, which fitted the body exactly without compressing it. Then, as Europe gradually emerged from barbarism, and the women became coquettish, tighter fitting bodices were worn, the waist was compressed, and the upper part of the figure, if we are to accept as correct the portraits of Charles VI.'s Queen, Isabeau de Bavière, very much decolletée. Priests and abbots thundered their threats against the practice, but in vain. The fashion spread rapidly, and at the time of the Renaissance, both sexes vied with one another in compressing their figures by the aid of a crude representative of the modern instrument, which was called the corsetus, cirsus, or corsettes. That which the men wore was a kind of close-fitting coat, while the women carried a very tight bodice of linen next the skin. Neither whalebone, wood, nor steel was, however, employed ■ that time.

With the advent of Catherine de Medici a new era dawned. She introduced the real whaleboned bodice with a strong busk in front, and her example was soon imitated by all Europe. Waist compression increased in spite of the protests of kings and emperors and the chief ministers and nobles of the land. This fashion ■ familiar to us in England through the portraits of "good Queen Bess." Never since armour had been invented had any stiffer framework for the human body been devised. The deep pointed bodice was as stiff and hard as combined wire, whale bone and steel could make it, and to add to the discomforts which fashion dictated, the neck was likewise supported by a ruff not only formed upon an elaborate background of metal and thick wires, but stiffened by the newly discovered "devil's liquor," starch. Men were as vain as women, both squeezed in their waists and both swelled their garments out below. Thus a machine which had begun innocently enough as a tight fitting linen bodice, was gradually developed by the addition of busks of wood, of ivory, and of whalebone, and of sheets and strips of steel, until a veritable armour like encasing resulted.

These stiff whaleboned corsets lasted throughout all changes of outward attire, they were prominent features of the Restoration fashions and of the Watteau period, but the Revolution at the end of the eighteenth century, which shook not only France but all Europe, had an equally subversive effect upon corsets. Primers, corsets, and, in fact, all additions to necessary clothing which were considered as the insignia of coquetry and riches, were banished. They disappeared completely, and the corsetus as Catherine de Medici introduced ■ has never re-appeared.

With the establishment of the Empire in France, a new fashion appeared which soon became popular all over Europe. This was the short bodice, arm-pit-waist fashion, which necessitated no more than supporting bandages similar to those of the old Romans. But it did not last long. Towards the end of the reign of the first Napoleon, several of the leaders of Parisian fashion tried ■ revive the Medici corsets, but they never succeeded in conquering the strong opposition of Madame de Longueville and the Empress, whose aversion to the change may probably be accounted for by the fact that she had a very short thick waist and prominent bust. Women, however, began to wear stiff bodices again, and just as the waist was gradually regaining its natural position, compression once more became the order of the day, and the corset with which we are now familiar was invented. Whalebone and steel were again used in its manufacture, and side lacings, elastic fastenings, strips and broad busks were called into requisition to restrain and remodel the figure.

From long usage we have ■ come ■ look upon the corset as a necessity for women, we have been reared amongst its wearers, and inured to its discomforts. But it is quite a question whether with all our boasted civilisation we have hit upon the right material and kind of machine for the object in view, and whether sanitarians anxious for the welfare of future generations advise wisely when they recommend all women to abjure stays. The bayadères of India, who possess the most perfect figures of any women on earth, have a much more healthful and charming device than any Europeans. Their corsets are formed out of the bark of a Madagascar tree, on a principle which permits them every freedom of movement in breathing and in any form of exercise. These are wonderful productions of ingenuity. The colour resembles the skin to a remarkable degree, and the material is so fine that the most delicate touch will hardly distinguish it from human flesh. Once made, these corsets are seldom removed, the bayadères even sleeping in them. They thus preserve astonishingly beautiful figures to an advanced age, without pain or discomfort to them. Alas, whilst we, who boast ourselves intellectual and civilised, torture without beautifying ourselves.

The pedigree of our corset, like many another modern absurdity which we are too familiar with to wonder at, stretches far back into antiquity, and may be briefly summarised. We recognise its fundamental features 1st, in the antique strophæ of the Greeks and Romans, and, we lose sight of bandages throughout a large portion of the Middle Ages, and then discover the existence of an embryonic corset, 3rd, the end of the Middle Ages and the commencement ■ the Renaissance are marked by the general adoption ■ tight fitting laced bodices, and 4th, from the middle of the sixteenth till the end of the eighteenth century the stiffest of whaleboned bodices were worn, disappearing under the Revolution, but only ■ be transformed later on into the modern corset.

CROWS AND SCARECROWS.

By JAMES PURVES

SECOND PAPER.

His scarecrow or crow-herd has hitherto escaped notice of our pastoral writers from Theocritus down to Mr Hay, in "Fas from the Madding Crowd."

introduces one in Joseph Poorgrass, a moral character, partly real, partly idyllic. Miss Carlyle, in a vivacious letter from a rectory, talks of being awakened at early morning by the "prodigious accompaniment of rooks cawing, ever and anon enlivened by the booming and squeaking of a child, which my remembrance of East Lothian instructed me was some vermin of a creature paid to keep the crows off the grain." "Vermin of a creature" is a strong figure of speech, but some allowance must be made for one's sleep being disturbed, and one's temper being ruffled, especially a woman's, in early morning. Yet than this "vermin of a creature" there is in rural England hardly a more familiar figure. He is a prominent as other "vermin of creatures" in our landscapes, such as the shepherd on the hills, the cowherd on the roadsides, or the goose-herd on the village commons. He is not to be despised because by his labouring voice he disturbs a delicate lady's sleep, and his figure, well worn and bent, at its lonely task by the hedgerows in spring, in the corn fields in summer, or beneath the shelter of the plantation strips in autumn, appeals to a deep chord of our feelings and touches our sympathy for those who labour on the fields.

He is generally a young lad with lusty eyes, or an old man with stiff dragging legs, and a rusty fowling piece or ancient rifle, which, when it does go off, threatens to do as much damage to him as to the crows he frightens. Each time he fires he shuts his eyes and draws his head aside as if afraid to look at the frightened crows. Or you will hear a clattering noise from a heavy wooden rattle, and then a voice booming and hulloing, which you and the crows understand is the call for them to move on, for they with protesting croaks take to their wings. To frighten crows from the grain is, no doubt, child's play or work for old dotted men; it is the beginning and ending of a farm labourer's life. A cynic may say that their old clothes—if the phrase may be used for such men's dress, as they seldom wear in week days anything else but old clothes—can be hung up in mid-field after their deaths and will frighten the crows by their "bogle" and quaint-like appanions, as well as they themselves, when wearing such clothes, have done in their lives. It is ample work one has to cry "shew hoo" and let the crows land on a neighbouring farmer's field, remembering the maxim so necessary in crow herding, "It is not lost what a friend gets."

You may have noticed that potato bogies or scarecrows which make the crows to swerve from the fields for fear, vary in size, design, and dress, in nearly every parish or every five miles. They certainly vary as much as the caps of the local old wives, and the dialect of the roadside old men one meets in any day's walk.

My crowherd, old Eben Amos, is a rustic with as much realism as picturesqueness in his dress, and more homely directness than prettiness in his speech. Realism in rustics is everything, and to prettily is to falsify them. It is the rustic realism of this "vermin of a creature" that charms me. He is truly a man of the fields, and his life and thoughts can be toned by the lives and the habits of the lands he scares. His voice croaks, and crows in one's ears in a dull monotone like the crow, and on walking his stiff legs are drawn behind him, and his body sways from side to side like the crow. He looks at one suspiciously with head aside, and answers questions after a cogitative pause and a croaking clearing of the throat, and with a snifter of the nostrils he emits a dry, respiratory sound like a young crow at its food. The villagers call him the crow man.

His talk is all about dismal subjects, about which he croaks rather than talks. His speech bulks largely of shipwrecks, accidents, death, and disease of man and beast, famines and epidemics. There's nothing trivial in his subjects, yet I find such lugubrious subjects very lively when he speaks. They bulk so largely in his thoughts that he continually repeats them. I think rustics find dismal subjects to have a soothing influence. Rustics every year repeat the stories of their lives, they return regularly with the seasons. The great thing to brag of is what one has seen and come through in his days, and not what one has read or heard. He says, "I can smoke my pipe, I can sing my song, I can tell my story, and I am quite contented. What more can a body want?" Has he enjoyed good health? He never had a stomach complaint but hunger when diet time came round, nothing ever put him past a meal, though he has had narrow escapes of being killed by falling off his stacks or high heaped cart loads of grain in the harvest field. And with a grim smile, he says, poor folk and bairns are neither easily killed nor poisoned. This hale old man, who has seen, as he phrases it, eighty six new years' days, and never got a penny from the parish, though his wages never were a pound a week, and he has been sorely "torn down" by numerous children and children's children, and who has, he says with proud exactness, wrought all his days on farms, which he styles his servitudes, in four counties and twelve parishes; and who possesses, as the neighbouring rustics phrase it—but whether in admiration or in fear I have never been able to find out—a terrible memory, this hale old crowherd, this "verman of a creature," moralises that "country life is best . . . ave. far best. You ha'e the caller air, the caller earth, an' they're aye healthy, an' then you need never be troubled wi' a sore throat, or a sore breast. A body never tires, never loses fancy o' the country; in summer or winter its aye bonnie, real bonnie. Gie me the country to live in, an' you may make kirk or mills o' the towns for a' I care. Every bairn s'ould ■■■ born an' brought up in the country."

His humour is quick, ■■■ is on the alert for a joke, and is not easily caught napping. He has the heart of a romancer, and throws wayward fancies and strange words into his speech. He keeps one in surprise, and is quick in getting out of a difficulty. I asked him, as loud as I could talk, "How many crows had he killed," but his deafness was of service, and he looked calmly at me as if I had made an ordinary remark about the weather, and he mumbled, as he bended slowly down, and adjusted himself on the chair, "A fellow's glad o' a rest after herding they auld vermin a' day long. Eh, but it's been a bonnie day!" Then I tried him in another tack, and made sure he would hear my next question, "Who scares the crows when you go away to your dinner?" The ancient looked up in a half-dazed state, then his blue eyes played with rustic merriment, and he emitted a creaking sound as if chuckling at his forthcoming remark, when he said, "Oh! of course the crows gaun home to their dinner too!" He chuckled at his humour, and spread his horny dust-stained hand in front of his face, and said apologetically, "A fellow mun whiles say something for nonsense. Man, twuling one's fingers a' day long soon gets teirible tiresome."

His dress sets at defiance the ideas of happy rural life, and he represents patient striving with hard conditions. His dress, from his boots ■■■ his hat, betokens daily contact with out-of-doors work. His hat, discoloured by the wind, and the sun, and the rain, is the colour of a blue-bottle fly, and his strong boots are exactly the colour of the soil, they are never blackened, and every Sunday night he greases and oils them for the following week. Over the left shoulder of his coat you observe a bit of leather coarsely sewed on to prevent the gun, which he usually carries across his left shoulder, muzzle foremost, from wearing away the cloth. The buttons have long since disappeared from his coat, and their place ■■■ taken by rude pieces of twine, a black and red checked cravat covers his neck, and below the lapel of his waistcoat peep a needle and thread, which he has never been without for forty years. Sometimes ■■■ odd moments at the fields he does all his tailoring. His shirt ■■■ made of the strong old-fashioned coarse linen called "straiken." His corduroy trousers, which, in their shortness and their home-made patches, bear signs of having been frequently washed and bleached, lead one's eyes to what appear rather like a pair of clogs than boots.

But let us follow him to his fireside. Hazlitt complained of Crabbe's poetry that he described the interior of a farm labourer's cottage like an officer sent to distrain for rent. That is the prose of rustic life to which no unprejudiced observer can shut his eyes. The cottager is a realist, and only possesses what is useful. As seen from the roadway his cottage is highly picturesque, with the thick ivy, red tiles peeping out below, the solitary window washed with pale-yellow ochre, a big round stone at the doorstep, which is never idle in summer, and the narrow strip of village green in front. A pot-flower stuck in the window completes, you think, the rustic picture. A young lady who dabbles in water-colours would stand still, clasp her hands, and round her lips with pretty words of admiration, but let us enter. We pass the worm-eaten door, walk along a narrow passage, and rub shoulders against a movable ladder leading to the "loft," and through the broken tiles we get glimpses of daylight. The loft was his children's nursery. Immediately below the loft is a dark pantry with green coloured panes of glass looking into the back-garden. The pantry and loft are crammed with logs of wood, old metal, and accumulation of rubbish which a man finds and carries home from the roads and fields during fifty years' work. At the end of the passage is the cottager's kitchen, bedroom, and sitting-room all in one, for himself, wife, and family. At the door stands a brown earthenware can with water from the draw-well, above it hangs a tin tankard on a nail. Two wooden beds, expressively known as "box-beds," form the only division ■■■ the cottage, remove them and there are four bare walls. The floor is of earth, and the only flagstone in the house is at the fireplace, where lies a wooden circular fender. A wooden plate-rack with blue plates and platters rests against the wall. What other nation displays its plates with the same pride and effect as we Scotch do? It is the same pride of descent, of being somebody, that makes housewives range their grandmothers' plates in the highest row, as things to be looked up to. Alongside stands a set of strong wooden drawers bearing signs of being often scoured with soap and sand. In the corner stands the cottager's cupboard, of triangular shape, with old-fashioned glass doors, old fashioned cups of the handleless kind, and saucers, old henlooms quaintly set on the top of each other. A collection of sixpenny photographs taken on glass hung near the fireplace, the dustiest spot in the cottage, and one group, consisting of a soldier, a sailor, and a policeman standing at "Attention" as stiff as poker, soon catch and rivet one's attention for their genuinely awkward postures. On the rafters overhead hang a row of dust-covered hats and a lantern for winter nights. Between the white washed rafters you observe the ivy shooting into the cottage, and the rafters and side walls are streaked with the damp. Once a year the old man has to cut the ivy from the inside to keep it from growing into his cottage, as the Earl will not allow it to be cut from the outside, for that would spoil the cottage's picturesque appearance. The earthen floor is worn into holes and hollows with the damp, and slips of wood are put under the table legs to keep them steady.

Probably it is the involuntary thought on entering a labourer's cottage to estimate the value of the furniture. It is almost irresistible, and you blush to find yourself making a mental inventory and valuation. A five-pound note would, you think, easily furnish the place, and you now understand where second-hand furniture goes to, and where old china is hoarded. The interior strongly appeals to one's artistic taste, its poverty is undisguised, there is no concealment, no pretence about it. It is what it is, a poor hind's cottage, with the earthen passage worn hollow with hobnailed boots, costing the landowner not a penny for repairs the last twenty years, a place the Earl would not allow his cob or a pointer to remain a night in, and yet bearing such homely marks of horny hands in its air of rude, though homely simplicity and comfort of its kind, like one of Josef Israels's interiors that lets one see how little of furniture man stands in need of. A hind like old Eben, who can read and write well, use the needle, and make down his own bed, which he does regularly, has reached an advanced stage of sturdy independence. A cynic compared the interior to a byre, but to my mind it is often in such poor places that the fresh flavour, the smack and taste in the mouth of sweet kind homeliness, is felt to be as nourishing as the breath of a cow. In such poor places we feel the warm touch of simple domesticity about a country fire-side and hearth, and plate racks and box beds, and corner cupboards and clothes chests, that stamps peasant's cottages all the world over as being the homes of broad-chested mothers with great wealth of faith and love in their hearts. And mothers they are, who having in their younger days wrought in the fields, give to their burns intuitively the measurable love for the fields and forests and corn growing earth which the mothers tasted themselves when their hearts were young. No other class on earth have such great affection for their native places as peasants. Very often they help themselves to potatoes and salt on the plateless system, a squeeze of the forefinger and thumb skins the plant of its thin coat, and a dip or two in pepper and salt on the table is the foundation of the dinner. A tablecloth is only used on great occasions, a carpet is unknown, the hardness and simplicity is completed with the want of any soft seat. This life may possibly be rude, but it is certainly not vulgar, nor mean, nor sour.

Nightfall to me anywhere is impressive, but nowhere so much as in a village. There the old wives in their caps and shawls, and the old men in their sleeved waistcoats, are chatting and smoking about the gable ends, or the back gardens, or at the pig-styes. Once a week old Eben was generally to be seen at his cottage door, with a jug of water at his feet and a bit of rag or two in his hand, cleaning out his musket with panting jerks. One night he said, "Come away in," and I followed him. He rested one leg on the table, and with his hand directed to the one half of the house embracing his wife and silly daughter, he broke the silence, the silence one felt to be of poverty and pride. "This is our squad, a sma' one fra what it was. Aye, a sma' pot serves for oor dinner noo. Aye, aye." The old woman, whom Eben humorously called "Old Thunder," with bare brown arms, dressed in a frock of liver coloured huss, and bent nearly double, and the silly, fresh-faced daughter attired in common print, sat on a chest in front of the nearest bed, a chest which the old man got made by a village carpenter years ago to contain his all on setting first out in the world from his father's fire-side. "I've passed my best, my best days are over. Man, I'm faeing fast, an' gaun quick doon the hill, still, I'm able to pap about an' do a hand's turn." I notice how hale his voice is, and how strong is his spirit.

The silly daughter sat measuring her apron and folding it over and over mechanically into squares, and turning up the whites of her eyes and working with her lips. It was a sad sight, and his eyes following my attention to her, he said, "We hae a disabled house. It's no the troubles o' one body that bothers me, she's a poor helpless creature. Man, does the trouble come from the head or the heart, think you?" The old man sat with his weary legs wide apart, and his small body bent low, blinking his blue eyes, and raising the skin of his forehead as he lifted his eyebrows. "Ah, but man, I'm gaun down the hill fast. Circum me! how the years roll on an' on! aye, aye, as regular as horse an' harrows. Eh! but nicht falls soon now! Money men when they reach my time o' life like to their beds, or they're kept by the parish, or walk wi' sticks in their hands. But in yet to the fore. It canna be lang noo till heae to pop away home for good."

Poverty is no doubt the teacher of labour the arts, the life-giver of the rustic and the prolonger of one's days in the land of the living. This old man has had small wages all his life, but his spirit is young, his excellent contentedness, his power of making the best of everything, and looking at the bright side of nature, makes him an authority in the village, and respected by his employer, the farmer whom he has served for thirty years, and the Earl.

The childlike talk, the simple, expressive words, the picturesque life, the rude simplicity and reality of the peasant's life give him, in my opinion, a Biblical air, a bigness of life that is an education in itself. It is the interior of a hewer of wood and a drawer of water, as the logs and draw-well show. And about the fireside in the winter evenings, the flickering light of the wood fire throwing deep shadows on the damp walls and into the deep box beds, and across the wooden stools, where neighbours' ruddy children sit and play and sleep, make their homely cottages full of the never ending mystery and romance which lingers at nightfall about our villages and villagers. I can hardly trust myself to say how much I admire and respect these sturdy independent toilers of the soil. They touch my feelings as few other things in the world can out of one's Bible and Shake speare. I believe more in their divinity, I confess, than I do in the divinity of kings. They tell us again and again, if we have the eyes to see and the ears to hear, of that contentment which is great gain, and that honest labour that gives peace of mind. They inspire one with a respect for patient labour, and yet labour as they may ■ their lives they can never possess a bit of land to call their own, far less the damp hovel of a cottage they live in.

It is as good as a holiday to have a chat with such old men. Their lives and thoughts are entirely new to us, and we travel with them in all their wandering, rambling, delightful talk. ■ ■ only country folk now that do talk, we dwellers in cities make gossip and scandal serve for all our conversation. But old Eben's reading is in keeping with his occupation, it is of the solemnities of life. He reckons the newspaper accounts of shipwrecks, accidents, and murders diverting reading, and he complains of his eye sight being "awful" abused thus while back in reading. For shipwrecks I think he has a fondness, because they remind him of his young days, about eighty years ago, when shipwrecks were greatly prized by rural housewives, who got plenty of doors for pantries and for closets, and by the binds, who got fine ropes for their carts, and at times two or three kegs of the "hard stuff," which were hurrowed in the sandhills until the wreck officials went out of sight. Like the crows, he has an affinity with the dullness of life and its realities, and he rejoices in accidents so long as the wind blows something his way. I fancied I heard the hoarse croaking of a crow when old Eben lifted up his eyes, his voice, and his hands simultaneously, and said, "Faith, I wonder how any mortal man can be bothered ay reading a' that yattering an' yammering clash o' words in Parliament! It beats a'! How they keep argue barying! Dang me if I can make cut what they mean to be at! Go! they're like the crows at nights, they fairly deceive a body!"

'TWINX MAY AND JUNE.

ILKRE let us rest and sing.

While the warm breezes blow
O'er smilt pastures gay with all the flowers of spring,
Where dappled herds all day a-grazing go,
Or lie in shadow where the oaks hang low.

The year is in its prime,

No chum is overblown
Ah, prithee stay thy sands, thy golden sands, old Time!
Pass on to other lands, till our young birds are flown,
Leave us and joy a little while alone!

Whit does thy haste avail,

When all for once goes well?
Old traitor, thou canst creep as slow as any snail
If a poor heart doth weep, or pining bell
Ring, for some vanished hope, the funeral knell.

Grant us a brief dilly,

Now, when our souls are far
With longing as we drink the summer hours away,
And, dreaming on the brink of heart-sweet pain,
Ponder the cuckoo's liquid low refrain.

It may not be, alas !
 Faster than blossoms fall,
 The honey-hiden hour will vanish, fade, and pass—
 Thy sweet ! come near ! The hottest pang of ill
 ■ spured in—when the perfect joy doth pal"

A NIGHT AMONG LONDON THIEVES.

By I I BRAMLEY

IF we put one leg of an imaginary pair of compasses on the south bank of the Thames, near the foot of London Bridge, and with the other leg form an arc southward with a radius of five hundred yards, we shall have made a semicircle on which can be crowded more history than any patch of equal area in the whole of the Metropolis—except the City proper. Indeed, Southwark was for centuries another London, and the only suburb of the City of great consequence. It was a home of the Romans, as the various resurrections of tessellated pavement show, it formed the strong bulwarks of the City, as its name implies—Southwark (South Works), and was the primary battle-ground when invading armies from the south marched through Kent to make war on the citizens across the Thames. There, in the very road which now stretches from London Bridge to the Elephant and Castle district, stood many renowned inns and taverns—the Tabard, where slept Chaucer and his band of pilgrims, before they wended their way to Canterbury, just five hundred years ago, the White Hart, the head quarters of Jack Cade and his rebel rout in 1450, the White Lion, which was once a huge pison and tavern at one and the same time, and many others. There, too, were palaces—one of Charles Brandon the Duke of Suffolk, one founded by Bishop Walter Giffard, about 1107, with court, offices, and water-stairs leading to the Thames, besides gardens, statues, fountains, and a spacious park, giving name to the present Park Street, also Rochester House, the residence of the Bishop of Rochester—Rochester Street took its name therefrom. Within this area, too, on the Bankside of the Thames, were two "Beare gardens, places wherein were kept beares, bulls, and other beasts, to be bayted; as also mastives, in several kennels (kennels), nourished to bayt them."—(Stow.) Here, also, were Shakespeare's theatres, besides licensed houses of infamous resort (termed "stew-houses"), from the twelfth to the sixteenth century, when they were suppressed by law, and at the sound of trumpets.

There were, also, two mints for coinage in this district, and even now there is a dirty, miserable, rabbit-warren sort of neighbourhood, just opposite St. George's Church, patronised as a dwelling place by tramps, beggars, and even worse characters, and known as "The Mint." Almost immediately facing "The Mint," and in rear of the church, already referred to, stands Kent Street, described by John Timbs as "a wretched and profligate part of St. George's parish." ■ was formerly the entrance avenue to London. "What long lines of conquest and devotion, of turmoil and rebellion, of victory, gorgeous pageantry, and grim death, have poured through this narrow inlet! The Roman invader came along the rich marshy ground now supporting Kent Street, thousands of pious and weary pilgrims have passed along this causeway to St. Thomas's of Canterbury, here the Black Prince rode with his royal captive from Poitiers, and the victor of Agincourt was carried in kingly state to his last earthly bourne. By this route Cade advanced with his twenty thousand insurgents from Blackheath to Southwark, and the ill-fated Wyatt marched to discomfiture and death." And Smollett, in his "Travels" (1766), says, "The avenue to London by the way of Kent Street is a most disgraceful entrance to such an opulent city. A foreigner, in passing through this beggarly and ruinous suburb, conceives such an idea of misery and meanness, as all the wealth and magnificence of London and Westminster are afterwards unable to destroy."

It was in this particular street that I sought the opportunity of ranging with professional thieves, joining in their amusements, "bursting all chains of habit, flinging habit's self aside." A friend promised to join me, and, as he expressively said, "stand by me through thick and thin." We proceeded on our mission, without even changing our apparel, or leaving watches, guards, or jewellery behind. It was a bold stroke, I have often thought since that it was even a mad venture. We chose the far end of the week (Saturday night) when money was supposed to be more plentiful, and indulgence more excessive. Among all the dens of wretchedness which I have visited in the modern Babel, none have impressed me more painfully than Kent Street, Borough. The trade earned on in the thoroughfare is of the kind common to that of Shoreditch and the New Cut. Poverty and vice, filth and drunkenness, foul stench and vermin have their home here. Along the street may be seen dismal alleys and slums, and mysterious dark avenues, admirably adapted for the commission of outrage and robbery, and all prudent pedestrians will prefer the middle of the street if compelled to pass along the thoroughfare at night.

We had scarcely perambulated fifty yards down the busy thoroughfare, when we were subjected to an experiment which exercised the manoeuvring talent of a youth, whose mission was that of playing upon the assumed inexperience of strange visitors. His modus operandi was that of stooping down immediately in front of us, picking up (or pretending to pick up) an article, and then inquiring in a seemingly innocent manner whether we had lost anything. When pressed to exhibit the treasure trove, he gave a mysterious glance as though bidding for a reward, and wished us to assume that he might have found something that had fallen from our persons. The prize turned out to be a small scarf pin, with a glass centre cut in angles to represent a diamond, which, doubtless, he carried with him as part of his stock in trade for the purpose of duping greenhorns. We did not aspire to own the "diamond," but recommended him to exercise his genius on less stubborn material. We passed through and along the colony of dirt, with its miserably-clad men and women, and youths—some feasting on a mess of peas pudding, picking it with their fingers from a piece of newspaper used as an improvised plate, some singing the praises of the wares they offered for sale, cuts-meat, tripe, fried fish, coster-goods, groundsel for singing birds, matches, and the thousand and one necessities of their life. Turning from these multifarious phases of outdoor life, we sought the principal "Free and I say," where students of the art of acquiring other people's possessions—without consent of the owner—seek revelry in the temple dedicated to Apollo and Bacchus jointly. The business of the week was over, the natives had thrown aside dull care, and were on pleasure bent. On the ground floor, we found ourselves in the dirty bar of a beer-shop, its walls being decorated with cases of stuffed "daws" and about forty cages of singing birds—which, we learned, were occasionally let on hire to men for the purpose of decoying field warblers into traps, the said captive warblers being exhibited for sale at the bird fair in Shoreditch, on Sunday mornings. We ascended a narrow, rickety staircase, to the door of the singing-room, and were admitted by a coarse framed sentinel, who first opened a small sliding trap in the centre panel of the door and satisfied his inquiring mind that all was "square." Here we had a precious glimpse of modern Paganism, and the rosy side of life, among people who, either by hereditary tendency or by choice, suffer the stings and arrows of outrageous fortune and put their wits against those of the stern myrmidons whom they slangily term "bobbies and beaks." Our entrance was the signal for no small amount of curiosity, the presence of two "swells" with milk hats was an unusual event, still the cautious habits in which these people were trained served them sufficiently to avoid manifesting their surprise openly. We took our seats on a long form, at the front of which was a narrow plank-like table or bench, with the same amount of song freed as if we occupied a stall in a theatre. We were convinced intuitively that even these practised readers of physiognomy were not a little puzzled as to the object of our visit, although their secretive natures prompted a seeming obliviousness of our presence. The ceiling of the room was wretchedly low, which assisted in raising the temperature of the atmosphere sufficiently high for the growth of tropical plants. The floor was carpeted with sawdust, not unmingled with walnut shells—which the habitués, who indulged in the luxury of walnuts, threw about as fancy suggested. There was a well worn and dilapidated billiard board in one corner. The benches and forms were ranged longitudinally, except at one end, where there was one placed crosswise. At the other end of the salon there was a low dis constructed of deal planks, this did duty for a platform, and on this low elevation stood a patriarchal looking instrument that might, fifty years ago, have earned the name of a piano. There was unobtrusive plainness everywhere, the only pictures that adorned the walls were finger daubs of dirt and patchy embellishments on a line with the heads of the company. About thirty men and half as many women displayed as much dirt and grease as could be conveniently ditched into as many dresses. The material of the apparel worn by most of the male portion was not visible through the grease, but it shone as though it had been polished with black lead. The suits were, doubtless, purchased second hand (unless obtained in a more skilful way) and worn till they fell off the carcasses of the last owners. We could not clearly discern whether the manly bosoms which throbbed under dirty billycock hats were graced with linen of any kind or quality or condition, the only visible ornament, serving the double purpose of shirt and collar, being an architectural bunch of worsted scarf carefully fixed up to about the size of a two pound loaf. There were two tradesmen settled in the room for the night, probably hawkers at other times, who found sufficient chance here, without spending their time in wandering from tavern to tavern. One of these men had a large basket, like a clothes basket, stocked with nuts and shrimps; he stood in the middle of the room, and, from the constant care with which he kept a weather eye on his stock-in-trade, he was a profound and earnest sceptic, a confirmed unbeliever in the traditional axiom about "honour among thieves." The other man of mercenary occupation plied a vigorous trade in 'taters and trotters.

While making a show of fair expenditure, we were careful not to swallow any of the potions for which we paid. There were plenty of men there who understood the geography of a quart pot, we furnished the material, by orders on the waiter, and invited those near (if not dear) to us to "fraternise"—we pretended to drink. There was no shyness on the part of our invited guests, they expressed their pleasure at having the privilege of drinking with "real gentlemen," and proved their genuineness on "the free and gushing river" principle. We were, however, at a loss to understand why one worthy should lustily call for "a pot of the best four-penny ale," as though there might be, in the one house, various qualities at the same price. However, that is a matter of detail to be classed with the "foreign Havanna cigars" at a penny each. The amusement consisted chiefly of singing and reciting. The songs were not by any means devoid of good sentiment, showing that there is "a great deal of human nature," even among the debased orders. Love songs, ditties about adventure, especially of the sea-faring type, patriotic snatches, extravagances about a steam leg, descriptions of the tricks of low life, old-fashioned songs such as "The old grey mare and I," and "When this old hat was new," were among the musical selections. But the dancing of a jig, a breakdown, a hornpipe, the performance of an accompaniment by snapping finger and thumb to imitate the bones in a nigger performance, and the making of a hollow flapping sound by tapping the knuckles of both fists on the chin and cheekbones fairly roused the uproarious enthusiasm of all present. And, greatest of all, was a burlesque by one fairly clever fellow, who stuck his thumbs in the armholes of his waistcoat, beating a rataplan with his fingers on his breast, and giving vent to hoarse bursts of indignation in imitation of some offended magistrate. One noticeable feature was that of each vocalist appearing single. Like honourable members of the House of Commons, they were not named, probably that was due to the presence of strangers about whose aim and object they were not certain. A child, about two years of age, was set on the dais to provoke by its antics a burst of laughter, as it attempted to strut across the platform; and it was gazed upon with no small degree of pride by its father, a man whose trousers appeared to be suspended by a piece of string in lieu of a pair of braces. The mother, a young woman about eighteen years of age, with hair parted on one side, and wearing neither bonnet nor jacket, sang "Good Old Jeff," which secured a generous and general assistance in the melodious chorus. And the funniest part of the proceedings was the event of her breaking down in the middle of one of her verses, when her memory was refreshed from a quart pot which one member of the company handed to her. Short clay pipes abounded, only the more opulent of the men present indulged in the aristocratic practice of smoking penny cigars. Tolerably good order reigned during a greater portion of the night the chief disturbance during the early hours consisted of squalling on the part of the child previously alluded to, which was quelled by the administration of a dose of amusee from a half-pint bottle, the fumes leaving no question as to the nature of the cordial.

At about half-past eleven, a turn of the tide was made. The entertainment, as well as the trade in trotters, raters, nuts and shrimps, was interrupted. An altercation arose between the jocosus Jans who guarded the door, and a visitor of the female sex—I beg her pardon, a lady visitor—who was refused admission, as soon as the door-keeper denied her through the aperture made by drawing away the aforesaid slide. On what plea the refusal was made, we did not discover, her language would have done credit to a champion prize fighter, and the gentle insinuations of the male disputant that she would be thrown neck and crop downstairs found an approving echo among several persons inside the room. But the applicant treated the company with an amount of disturbance that nullified all attempts at singing, and the door was at last unlocked suddenly, when her burly form rolled forward to the middle of the room. A riotous scrimmage ensued, the lungs of that Spartan lady belched forth hoarse epithets of abuse that I had never heard from the lowest specimens of the male sex, in less than two minutes the place was converted into a new Bedlam, and every man and woman was crowding round the new-comer. We divined that our evil star was in the ascendant, there was mischief brewing for us, we felt that the opportunity would be seized to make capital. ■ was but the work of a moment for us to dart out while the door was open, we were on ■ the rickety staircase in a few seconds, and felt a grand relief, as we sped through the bar-room below and emerged into the street with a rapidity akin to that of a professor of legerdemain, glad to escape the unfragrant air of that abominable den. There we were safe enough, for not thirty yards away we were joined by a trusted member of the police force, to whom we had confided our intentions, and who took care, as far as his duties permitted, ■ be within hailing distance. And it was well for us that we had thus cautiously provided, and that the services of our friend had not temporarily been required at any great distance from the house, for it was soon discovered that we were tracked by a couple of roughts who had left the room earlier in the evening, and who made use of oratory more forcible than refined as they saw us approach the police officer. We were dubbed as spies and christened with a few names not to be found in English dictionaries. Under the protection of this officer in uniform, we paraded various off-streets till the small hours of Sunday morning, and surveyed a number of dismal courts and alleys where (we were informed) desperate characters often found a hiding place after having captured some wayfarer and snatched his watch, gird, and cash. The method of stooping down in front of a pedestrian, as though in the act of tying a bootlace, and then butting him with the head into the arms of a confederate in the rear, then snatching the valuables belonging to the victim, and hiding away in a neighbouring court, ■ one of the forms of robbery which has been known here. One cannot help feeling that even the art of stealing has degenerated, and that, though vile in any form, it is shorn of that air of romance that characterized the old stand and deliver style of plunder. The crafty, cowardly, un-Hounslow Heath method of stealing, does not commend itself by comparison with the Dick Turpin form of daring and its frequent associations with Tyburn Tree, from which many a bold adventurer had to take a bird's-eye view. The old highwaymen did give an armed man a moderate chance, modern scamps seem ■ have added meanness to their other bad qualities.

There is a sneaking form of dishonesty practised by one class of thieves, which is occasionally accompanied with brutality. The houses occupied by some of these well-known trade conjurers were pointed out by our police guide. A light cart laden with humanity in the shape of a woman and three flashy-looking men and a dog rattled past us. These people, we were told, had doubtless been "out on business," not pocket-picking nor guard-snatching, nor even stealing in the ordinary sense, but in the more mystic process of "smashing." The class of operators represented by this quartette will select some distant district, say at the West-end, where their identity is not so easily recognised by the police ■ would be the case nearer home. The woman is usually sent out on the mission of passing counterfeit money by tendering it in shops, but ■ never allowed to possess more than one coin at a time. This is to meet the technical plea often put forth in police courts that the possession of a number of bad coins, implies connection with the moulder, whereas any honest person might accidentally have an odd piece of counterfeit money, should the woman be arrested on suspicion, she may be treated with the benefit of a doubt. One of the men waits at a place agreed upon, with a plentiful stock of spurious metal from which to supply the female whenever she has been successful. At a short distance the vehicle is ready to assist the escape of the fugitive, if necessary, and a bull-dog can be immediately let slip in the face of the pursuer.

But Kent Street, like most other condemned places in the great metropolis, ■ being rapidly improved by increased police vigilance, the labours of local missionaries and temperance advocates, and, let us hope, through advances in civilisation. Drunken brawls, pugilistic encounters, and the use of coarse and vile language, by male and female alike, were among the amusements of the earlier portion ■ the Sabbath, on the occasion of my visit, but these are minor matters among people whose profound and unwavering article of faith is—that the police are little better than nuisances to Society.

BERGEN

BERGEN is a busy and picturesque seaport on a beautiful bay on the west coast. The harbour, which is generally crowded with ships and steamers, has a striking appearance, from the rows of wharfs and warehouses projecting on it, with their ends towards the sea. The houses rise, tier upon tier, from the bay toward the surrounding mountains. The town has several wide squares, the streets are broad, and gay with well-furnished shops, and one cannot be long in the town without observing the curious and picturesque head-dresses of the country-women who come to market there.

The most common head-dress of the Norwegian women consists of a simple kerchief of cotton, sometimes of silk, embroidered at the corners. ■ ■ doubled, folded over the head, and tied under the chin. ■ sunny weather it is allowed to project over the forehead, so as to shield the face from the sun. The corner, which hangs down behind, shows the embroidered pattern, and protects the neck and the back of the head. In the neighbourhood of Bergen, however, more elaborate head dresses are seen. The patterns are various, but they are all more or less picturesque. In most cases they consist of a crown of white dymity held out by a light but stiff board. Both the kerchief and the red tapes by which it is tied hang down the back almost to the waist. In keeping with this is the blue bodice, worn over a white blouse, and held in its place by red and yellow shoulder-straps.

Still more characteristic and imposing are the bridal crowns worn in some parts of the country, particularly in the Bergen provinces and in the Fædermarken, where the primitive customs of the country are still preserved, though in other parts they are rapidly disappearing before the inevitable advance of civilisation. These crowns are very elaborate and, on the whole, uncomfortable looking erections. They are profusely decorated with inexpensive gems, but, tawdry as they often are, they are sacredly preserved as heir-looms, and are proudly shown by their possessors to their children and grand children as titles to honour, if not to nobility.

A wedding in Norway has the same effect as weddings elsewhere. It moves the whole country side. I overtook a wedding party in Valdres. The procession comprised carioles and carts of every sort and size. The bride, who wore a wreath of myrtle over her head-dress, led the way in what appeared a very rickety cariole. In front of her sat a little girl, probably the bride's-maid. On the spot behind sat the bridegroom, who drove. Then followed a motley assembly of men and women and children, some in carioles, some in stolk-jærreer (spring-carts), some in long, narrow farm carts, without either springs or seats. A wedding is considered grand in proportion to the number of vehicles that turn out in the procession, hence everything and anything on wheels is pressed into the service. Every one was in his or her best attire, and all were in exuberant spirits, spirits not the less lively, in as far as the young men were concerned, by calls at the beer-houses on the way to church. These visits the women regarded as matters of course. If the wedding had taken place in England or in Scotland it could hardly have been more hilariously celebrated.

Norwegian Folk dresses—Bergen

To return to Bergen one of the great sights of the town is the fish-market, which adjoins the harbour. The fish, however, are not laid out on stalls or tables, they are piled up in the bottoms of small boats moored in the quay. The sellers stand in the boats and the buyers on shore. There is much wrangling, the latter invariably try to beat down the prices of the former. In the harbour, beyond the line of small boats, are the larger fishing-smacks, also laden with fish. Very interesting is in a bright morning to see the fleet of fishing-boats hastening to the harbour with their precious freight. Another characteristic sight of the waters around Bergen is that of broad flat bottomed boats laden with dried fish, piled in huge stacks around the masts, and leaving scant room for the crew to move about. Sometimes the stacks of fish are covered with canvas, but more commonly they are simply bound with ropes. If the sea were not made unusually calm and secure by the natural breakwaters of islands, it would be impossible for ships so heavily laden above the water line to live on such a coast; but experience gives confidence to the Norse fishermen, and they move about as freely as if they were navigating an inland canal.

Bergen boasts many churches and a famous museum; and it owes its importance not only to its being a thriving seaport, but also to the fact that it is the most convenient starting point for visiting the Hardanger Fjord, the Sogne Fjord, and the whole of the finest scenery of the west coast of Norway.

THE HARDANGER FJORD.

The Hardanger Fjord is one of the most easily accessible, and therefore one of the most frequented, of all the fjords of Norway. It is also one of the most interesting, for it contains every variety of scenery, from the softest lowlands to the wildest and most rugged highlands, from fir-clad islands and grassy knolls to magnificent mountain peaks and upland valleys, that form the beds of vast glaciers.

The softer and more beautiful scenery is in the lower part of the fjord. One is again and again reminded of the Firth of Lorne and the Sound of Mull, and other seas on the west coast of Scotland. For there are bold features mingled with the milder beauty of the fertile shores. Near the mouth of the fjord we pass through a maze of lovely and well wooded islands. The banks are covered with farm houses and fishing cottages. There is abundant evidence of a large and active population. The villages in which the steamboat stops have a neat and thriving appearance. The wooden houses are brightly painted, every window has its inevitable white curtains and its row of flower pots and the gardens are trimly kept. One of the finest of these stations is Rosendal, which is pleasantly situated on a fertile plain lying at the foot of bold cliffs. Here and at several other stations, shipbuilding is carried on very actively, though on a very small scale.

Between Rosendal and Bakke a large island, Varalds Oe, reduces the fjord to two narrow straits. Above the island the fjord opens out into a wide sea, the Hra Fjord, surrounded by bold mountains, some of them speckled with patches of snow. In crossing this fjord we get our first view of the magnificent Folgefonden glacier, the closer acquaintance of which we shall make later in the day. We now look up to its western side. In the evening we shall view it on the east, for we must go fifty miles north east and then fifty miles south before the day's journey is over. The day, however, is one on which we may thoroughly enjoy Norwegian scenery. The sun is bright, the sea is tolerably calm, ruffled only slightly and occasionally by a pleasantly fresh breeze. The scenery is charming, and the small company of travellers is in good spirits and appreciative mood.

Partly by islands and partly by promontories locked together the Hardanger Fjord is divided into a number of sections, which have the appearance of inland lakes. The Outer Samlen is one of these. The Inner Samlen is another. Besides these main sections of the fjord there are smaller sounds running far inland in all directions. Cross your hands at the wrists with the fingers well outspread, and call every finger a sound or arm of the sea, and then you may have some faint idea of the appearance of one of the larger fjords of Norway seen from a bird's eye view.

As we advance through the Inner Samlen, we encounter higher mountains and wilder scenery. Facing us, there is a magnificent pile cleft by a deep cove in the heart of which is a bed of snow. The hills are prettily streaked with waterfalls. The glacier is seen to advantage from various points. The panorama of hills is complete. As the engine whistle sounds on approaching a station, its scream is echoed and re-echoed from cliff to cliff with weird effect. After leaving Utne we enter the Sor Fjord. Here the Hardanger is at its very finest. The passage becomes narrower, the hills higher, grander, and more abrupt. At Naas we see the glacier protruding through a gap right above the station. The thickness of the ice is upwards of one hundred feet, and the lower strata are a deeper blue than those above them, probably indicating greater age. Many crevasses are visible around the neck of the gap. In the neighbourhood we see many cottages far up the cliffs, in what appear to be precarious positions.

Still farther up as we near Odde, the fjord becomes very narrow. Steep mountains rise on both sides to the height of 2,000 feet. Transverse valleys bring into view splendid walls of rock, and give room for rushing torrents and waterfalls. Here are all the elements of grand scenery, wood, water, bare rock, precipices and towers, wooded bluffs and snow-clad peaks, under all, the tranquil sea, and here and there picturesque cottages and patches of scrubby vegetation. The line of mountainous cliffs is continued on both sides, inland, far beyond the head of the fjord, showing in the distance, on the right, a really fine waterfall, the Kellersfos. Between the cliffs the valley is filled up with a moraine, on which the village and church of Odde have found for themselves a pleasant resting-place in the wilderness.

THE BUARBRAE.

The Buarbrae is an outlet of the Folgefonden glacier—hæ being the Norsk for mer de glace. That great glacier, which, however, is much inferior to the Jostedalshæ, between the Sogne Fjord and the Nord Fjord, is thirty or forty miles in length, by fourteen in greatest breadth. It occupies the whole summit of a huge peninsula, from 3,000 to 5,000 feet high, lying between two main arms of the Hardanger Fjord. It has several outlets for its confined moisture, but of these the Buarbrae is by far the finest.

Our visit to the glacier derived special interest from its being made at midnight. A drive of a nule brought us to the Sandvæn vand, a grand little lake held in by the moraine already referred to, through which it empties itself into the fjord by a short but furious torrent. In rowing across this lake to the mouth of the Jordal River we have a splendid view of the valley and of the glacier. It would be difficult to conceive a more perfect scene. At the mouth of the gorge there are two huge mountain masses, consisting of steeply sloping rocks about 2,000 feet high, with trees and shrubs in the clefts, and with bold round heads, placed one on either side, and almost exactly alike in form, size, and character. They seem to stand like giant gins guarding the entrance to the pass. A lofty range of cliffs, crested with snow, recedes from each of these heads to the very top of the gorge. Between them we see a fertile valley, with woody and rocky mountain sides, and above all the stupendous glacier, frowning and terrible.

Arrived at the foot of the valley, we begin the ascent, which occupies one hour and a half. The road is very rugged, being covered with masses of stone, shingle, and boulders. The river, tearing and foaming wildly down the gorge, was in itself a sight worth going a much greater distance to see. It consists of four or five nules of continuous cataract, unrelieved by a single pool or quiet reach of water. Near the head of the gorge, where the ascent is very steep, the force of the torrent is terrific.

On both sides tower frowning precipices 1,800 feet high, and rendered more impressive by the fading light—it could not be called the darkness—of the night. The bed of the valley and the mountain sides to a considerable height are covered with small trees—hazel, birch, and elm. Far up the cliffs there are little plateaus, which are reached by the daring peasantry for the sake of the grass and wood to be got there. This meagre produce of the heights is sent down to the bottom of the valley by means of ropes or wires (hoy telegraphs), having the one end fixed some hundreds of feet up the cliffs, and the other made fast to a post at the bottom of the valley. As we neared the top of the gorge a single star came into view right over the glacier, as if pointing to our destination.

At length we reach the Buarbrae, and we are well rewarded for our pains. If a glacier be a river of ice, the Buarbrae may be truly described as a frozen cascade. It is as if the glacier, in descending the valley, had come to a rock, and had thrown itself over it headlong. At this point the valley is narrow, but the glacier fills it up from side to side, and presents a huge wall of ice 400 or 500 feet high, and with a very irregular surface. At the foot of the glacier there is a series of wide grottoes, out of one of which the river flows with tremendous force and speed. Into another of these grottoes it was possible to penetrate for fifteen or twenty feet. Within, the cold was very great, and water was dropping copiously from the roof, but the ice was hard as flint, and only with difficulty could small pieces be broken off. The grottoes are the measure of the natural waste of the glacier. On their floor, and piled up in front, are the rocks and boulders carried down in the bed of the glacier in successive years.

The whole scene was inexpressibly grand. Here we were face to face with the natural force which has done more than any other to transform the face of the earth, and in particular to make Norway what it is. To pass from the fjords to the Buarbrae is to pass from Nature's work to Nature's workshop. Glaciers generally recede every year by natural waste as much as they advance by the pressure of their mass. But this glacier is said to be steadily advancing down the Jordal gorge. It is, therefore, showing us how, in a bygone age, the dales and fjords of Norway were gouged or ground out of the solid mountains. The scene was made all the more striking by the presence of abundant vegetation in the neighbourhood of all this snow and ice. Nor far off a field of potatoes was growing luxuriantly, wild flowers were

■ bloom, and birch-trees and alders were in full foliage.

■ was midnight when we left the glacier; but the light was sufficient to enable us to see the landscape and ■ consult our watches. The walk down the valley in the weird half-light of the midnight sun, only partially concealed, was very impressive. The majestic griffins, now darker and more terrible-looking, were reflected grandly in the placid lake as we crossed it. The single star still shone above the Buarbræ. The Kellerafos still threw itself wildly into the air. The mountains at the head of the lake were shrouded in their mighty mantle of mist. The fjord stretched away northward between its beetling walls, and nature wore the calm aspect befitting the hours of rest and sleep.

THE STALHEIMSKLEV.

The distance which has to be traversed in Norway in search of picturesque scenery is very great, and the interest is not always equally well sustained. The traveller often encounters the striking feature of his day's journey at the beginning, and has to content himself with monotonous, and even dreary, scenes for the remainder. On the other hand, he must be prepared sometimes to travel great distances through commonplace regions before reaching the centre of interest.

An experience of the latter kind is encountered in driving from Vossevangen, midway between the Hardanger and the Sogne Fjord, to Gudvangen at the head of the Naeröfjord. The scenery ■ tame enough at the beginning, but it becomes grander and grander as we advance, until it culminates near the end in the marvellous Stalheimsklev, at the head of the Naerödal. The view of this gorge comes upon you as a complete surprise. There has been nothing ■ lead up to it, although the cataracts of the Strande River have relieved the monotony of the previous route. You come suddenly to the head of the pass, and you look down on one of the grandest scenes which even Norway can present. The gorge ■ flanked by stupendous rocky buttresses, and in the middle of it there rises the splendid dome-shaped mass of the Jordalsnut, or Thimble Mountain. Like the neighbouring cliffs, this mountain is of light-grey rock, almost entirely bare on the sides, and quite bare on its rounded summit.

As seen from the top of the pass, this mountain is perfectly symmetrical. Its sides form with the base angles of 60 to 65 degrees. From its self-contained completeness, and from the mountain masses which surround it, it is difficult to realise the fact that ■ rises to the height of 3,600 feet. Its broad, bald top seems to defy the heavens, as it has certainly defied all the efforts of man to scale it. A legend says that within a cave, marked by a dark hole on its western side, there ■ an iron door, and that in the unfathomable chamber within there are many lumps of gold. It ■ said that one man ventured within the cave and never came out again; and there is certainly as much chance of a man's coming back alive as there is of his ever reaching the cliff.

Coming to the top of the steep rocky mass, which closes in the gorge, we see the Naerödal 1,000 feet below us. We have ■ descend to the valley by a road constructed in the face of a mountain, which ■ almost precipitous. It is truly a marvellous piece of engineering. The Norwegian engineers are generally as daring as they are ingenious, but they have never conceived or achieved anything more marvellous than this. The road makes fifteen different turns between the top and the bottom of the cliff, and has the appearance of an immense staircase. It is rather fearful to look down the incline, or series of inclines, which you have to descend. Few travellers have the hardihood to keep their seats in going down it, and still fewer have the heartlessness to do so in making the ascent. On either side of it there is a lofty waterfall, the Stalheimfos on the right hand, and the Sevelfos on the left. The road at one of its turning points passes so near the latter that it comes within reach of its spray. The view of the Stalheimsklev from the valley is quite as striking as from the summit. One wonders how it ever entered the mind of man to make such a road in such a place.

From the foot of the cliff there is an almost level run to Gudvangen. The flanking cliffs of the Thimble Mountain look even grander from the valley than they did from the top of the pass. The road follows the brawling river in its tortuous course between cliffs 4,000 feet high. That there is much limestone in these rocks ■ evidenced by the masses of white debris ■ the foot of them. There are some tremendous isolated rocks in the valley, the result of landslips and fractures during winter. About fifteen years ago a great mass of rock, loosened by the ice, fell from a height of 3,000 feet into the valley below. Huge rocks leaped from one side of the valley to the other. One of these settled ■ the middle of the road, and could be removed only by blasting. The whole valley became dark as night, and the natives thought that the day of judgment had come. Near Gudvangen we see on the right a waterfall of which note must be taken. ■ ■ not very big, but it descends gracefully from the top of a cliff 2,000 feet high by three leaps, the highest of which measures 800 feet. Taking the three leaps together, this is the highest waterfall in Norway.

The sail from Gudvangen through the Naerofjord is remarkably fine. This fjord, which corresponds well with its name, is so confined that there are parts of it which it ■ said the sun never reaches from one year's end to the other. ■ is in this respect a typical fjord. On both sides of it steep cliffs rise perpendicularly from the water's edge, while the fjord wends in and out, carrying you from one land-locked basin to another. Here and there at the foot of the cliffs there are patches of bright green grass, on which goats and sheep are feeding, while at the top of them snow is lying to the depth of many feet.

An amusing object in the landscape is the Backkafjelt, or Pitch Mountain, so called from the black streaks in the light-coloured limestone rocks. A local legend, however, ascribes both the black streaks and the name of the mountain to an encounter between the devil and a valorous shoemaker, who, standing on the top of the opposite height, throw his pitch pot at his Satanic majesty, and blackened the side of the mountain for ever.

THE GALDER'S PASS.

Though the west coast scenery ■ undoubtedly the finest in Norway—in fact, ■ Norway, in as far as the tourist is concerned—no one can be said to know Norway thoroughly who has not made a journey across the country by one or other of the great routes—by Gudebrandsdal, by Valdres, by Hallingdal, or by the Thelemaiken. The overland route is not only delightful for what ■ reveals, it is also ■ new experience. You detach yourself completely from anything like a base of operations. Your communications backward are hopelessly cut off, and all that you can do is to push forward with what speed you may; for the step you have taken further implies that you have committed yourself ■ an unknown future. Provisions may fail—at least, you must be prepared ■ put up with what you can get, and be thankful, unless you have been foreseeing and farseeing enough to provide yourself with sufficient material sustenance for the whole journey.

On the more frequented routes, however, the question of provender now gives little trouble. On the Valdres route, for example, the station-houses are rapidly assuming the dimensions and the character of hotels, and one of them, at least, has grown into a fully-equipped sanatorium or hydropathic establishment. The other difficulties that have to be faced are those of procuring relays of horses at the roadside stations, and of finding sleeping accommodation at the stations at which it is customary to spend the night.

On the Valdres route, between Laerdaløren and Odnaes, the accommodation, as regards both man and beast, is good and ample; but it is not so ample that you can afford to dispense with the precaution of sending on a forebud (or order for horses in advance) or of engaging beds, especially when the party numbers more than two or three. It is not quite pleasant to arrive at a station at eleven o'clock at night and to find it filled to overflowing, so that you are compelled to drive to the next station, ten or twelve miles farther on, with the risk of being "crowded out" there also, and with the certainty of having to accept inferior quarters.

The Valdres route is in some respects the most interesting, as it is now also the most frequented, of the cross-country roads. It carries you across the bleak Filleljeld, by a steep and rough road, which reaches at its highest point to an elevation of 3,100 feet above the sea-level. The journey from Laerdal to Christiania can be accomplished comfortably in four days, and each day's travelling has a character of its own.

The great feature of the first day's journey is the wild and rocky Galder Pass, where the Laerdal River rushes and writhes through a narrow gorge, between lofty overhanging cliffs, boiling and surging in tremendous natural caldrons, worn out by the stream. From the road, which follows the winding course of the river, fearful glimpses are obtained of the surging torrent, one hundred feet below. High up the cliffs, on the northern bank, we see several farm houses in most perilous situations.

Above the Galder Pass, the valley opens out. The mountains rise in terraces on either side, tier upon tier being covered with pine forests. Above the line of vegetation, bare cliffs shoot up to the region of snow. The river flows rapidly onward, now in dark blue pools, now lashed into foam by the intersecting rocks. You cannot see the mountains for the rocks, nor the river for the cataracts. We cross at one place a remarkable bridge, consisting of a single arch built of huge blocks of granite, held together by their own weight and without an ounce of mortar.

BORGUND KIRKE

Soon after crossing this dry stone bridge, a turn of the road brings us to the famous old church of Borgund, a picturesque wooden structure, which dates from the middle of the twelfth century. It is built entirely of wood, even to the tiles. Its remarkable preservation testifies to the lasting properties of the Norwegian pine. Its quaint porch and fantastic roof, with its curious dragon heads, have been made familiar by photographs and drawings all over the world.

Norway is famous for its old churches. The Trondhjem cathedral, which dates from the twelfth century, is the most beautiful and the most interesting church in the three Scandinavian kingdoms. There the kings of Norway have been crowned for seven centuries, and there the kings of Sweden and Norway are still crowned. The fine old cathedral is at present undergoing a process of restoration on an elaborate scale, which throws similar efforts elsewhere completely into the shade. The work has now been going on for twelve years, but so thoroughly and so conscientiously is it being done, that other fifty years at least must elapse before it is completed. It is very creditable to so poor a country as Norway that it should have undertaken such a work as this, and it is not the less creditable, that it is being carried out in a style which recalls the enthusiasm and the self-sacrifice of the monkish architects of the Middle Ages. The octagonal apse, now completely restored, is simply magnificent as an example of architectural devotion, and when the whole church has been renovated in the same style, it will be, without question, the finest ecclesiastical edifice in the north of Europe.

I would fain linger over these scenes, and recall others hardly less interesting and delightful, which will be to me, as to others who have witnessed them, never dying memories. It will be pleasant, too, in after years, to recall the valued friendships which are associated with these experiences of travel. The boundless kindness and hospitality of the Norwegians met with in Christiania, in Trondhjem, in Bergen, and in many more outlandish places, can never be forgotten. Grateful acknowledgment must also be made of pleasant intercourse with fellow-travellers—with Swedes and Danes and Russians, with Germans and Frenchmen and Dutchmen, with Englishmen and Scotsmen, and last, though not least, with Americans, in whose company the acquaintance of the fjords and the fjelds was happily made. These friendships—casual they may be called—will be not the less precious or enduring because they are cemented by the bond of a common sympathy with nature in her grandest as well as in her tenderest moods

SUNDAY READINGS.

By THE EDITOR.

MAY 4TH

Read Psalm xxi. Matthew xxv. 35-39

THE fourth word from the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken Me?" marks the crisis of our Lord's sufferings and the climax of His spiritual agony. ■ was uttered a few seconds before He died, and when ■ was uttered the cloud of woe seems to have passed away for ever.

They are perhaps the dreariest words ever uttered on earth. To die under the sense of utter forsakenness—by man and by God—would be a desolate close to any life, but as coming from the lips of Christ, this cry is full of mystery and woe.

Dare we seek to learn the meaning of these words? As they were spoken loudly and in the ears of men, we may believe that they were uttered for man, and that they were intended to teach him somewhat regarding the experiences of Christ in that hour so full of significance for us all. But if they are thus given for our instruction, they must surely be also intended for our most reverent inquiry, and for our best and holiest moments. Let us then approach them with humility and Godly fear

It is probable that the first three Words from the Cross were spoken during the first hour—or nearly so—of His passion, that is, between nine and ten in the morning. But after His merciful saying to the penitent thief, the lips of Christ became sealed. For about five hours this silence was unbroken. At mid day, a strange change began to take place in the aspect of nature. A weird gloom deepened over the sky, and grew more and more portentous. We may also believe that under this ominous shrouding of the earth, there must have fallen such an awe upon the crowd as to have stilled their mockery. ■ the centurion acknowledged the impression he had experienced at the spectacle of the Cross, and if the people returned to Jerusalem after Christ died, smiling on their breasts, we may well suppose that, long ere the end came, a fearful quiet had settled on the crowd. At least, so I imagine the scene—the three pale figures on the Cross against the black sky, and a stillness only broken by the painful sighs of the dying. During that long silence of five hours, Jesus was drinking drop by drop that cup of inward suffering of which He once had spoken. The silence concealed and yet measured the infinite descent of His spirit into the abyss of His consciousness of human sin, and its tremendous import is revealed, when, like the sharp lightning which cuts the midnight with a stream of fire, there suddenly bursts through the hushed air the piercing cry, "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani?" "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?"

I have said that these words mark the climax of the passion. No one who has weighed the evidence can have any reasonable doubt that the physical cause of our Lord's death was not crucifixion, but rapture of the heart. His heart literally gave way under the intense strain of acute mental anguish. If so, then notice the position of this cry. Immediately after its utterance there comes the consciousness of physical want—"I thirst"—and the other voices, "It is finished," "Father, into thy hands I commend my Spirit," betoken calm, if not victory, before "He bowed the head and gave up the ghost." The cry of desertion shows us, therefore, that the lowest depth had been touched, and that this was the rebound of His being back to God. Let us consider ■ more closely.

(1) It expresses the confidence of faith. We will not understand the agony if we fail to give due weight to this. The heavy burden lies on faith—lies on it as if ■ would break its strong bands, but that cleaving cry ■ God shows that nothing could separate Him from the Father. Faith, though burdened, breaks not.

(2) With all reverence I must express my belief that these words do not teach us that Christ was really forsaken—as ■ is sometimes said—because judiciously suffering for us the direct anger of God. The lost in hell might be spoken of as being in that sense forsaken of God, but surely He who once said, "Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life for the sheep," was never more truly "the beloved Son in whom the Father was well pleased," than in that hour when there went up the cry of Sonship obedient unto death! The twenty-second Psalm, from which the words used by Christ are taken, teaches this very clearly ■■ begins with the voice of agony, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me!" it is equally full of unbroken confidence, nay, ■ expressly says that God "hath not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted—neither hath He hid His face from them, but when he cried unto Him He heard."

(3) Nevertheless the cry is unspeakably painful. Every syllable is fraught with sorrow. We know not indeed which word should ■ selected for emphasis, for each one suggests some new grief. "Why hast Thou forsaken me?" It is a terrible experience for any one when in his agony he puts such a questioning, "Why?" to God, and in hours of bitter woe asks, "Oh, my God, why thus?" But what anguish must it have been when from the lips of Jesus there was wrung even a momentary questioning of the Father. "Why hast Thou forsaken me?" "I am rejected of men and deserted by my disciples, but Thou, oh my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" Lastly, what a word is that "forsaken." Remember what the Father had ever been to Jesus, and then imagine, if you can, the abyss of woe which is indicated when He suffered even for a moment the sense of forsakenness, and when the blackness of such a possible experience swept even for an instant through His consciousness, and He tasted the sense of utter desertion—forsaken ■ all, of man, of God himself! The cry is indeed anguish itself.

MAY 11TH.

Read Psalm lxxviii and Hebrews from 12 to 2. 20

It would be wrong to dogmatise regarding the awful words in which the cry of anguish was uttered on the cross. We can only express the meaning which they bear to ourselves.

Now when we ask, "What was it which gave to our Lord this terrible sense of separation from the Father?" there are two answers which suggest themselves as expressing what we may believe constituted at least some of the elements in His cup of suffering. These are (1) The agony of His soul as in contact with sin, and (2) The agony of His soul as in contact with death.

(1) "Surely," said Isaiah, "He hath borne our sins and carried our sorrows. . . . The Lord hath made to meet upon Him the iniquity of us all." We must take these words as simply telling us that our sins—not the punishment of them, as it is often said—fell upon Jesus as His own burden. Remember that He was not a mere individual among individual and separate men, but that He was the second Adam, the representative head of our humanity, and that He was this not in an artificial or fictitious sense, but as one who was born our brother, and united to us by ties closer than band father to child. What the root is to the tree, or what the head is to the body, Christ was to our humanity, so that He was affected by what we are as by a sensitive nerve of life. He stood before God identified with our humanity and clothed in ■ Remember, also, that this identity with man was combined with identity with God. He had perfect sympathy with the mind of the Father. And now conceive, however faintly, what it was when He became ■ the Crucifixion, not in a "legal" or fictitious sense, but in the most real manner, the object against which, and the instrument by which, the hatred of the world to God became expressed. For never was the real nature of that sin so expressed as when men rose in one storm of enmity against Christ, who had been ever revealing the divine Will, and said, "Away with Him, give us Barabbas rather than He." And this rejection, with its mockery and scorn, were but as waves on the surface of a deep sea. On that cross He fathomed not the sin of the Jews only who crucified Him, but the sin of man in his alienation from God. In proportion to His own perfect holiness and sympathy with God, so must He have shuddered from the foul tide that was rising on every side. As during these hours of silence, His spirit, burdened with the sense of human sin, sank lower and lower, apprehending its loathsomeness, His consciousness of its horror increasing upon Him till it seemed as if it would absorb Him, can we not feel the force of that cry, and how, when the blackest depths had been reached, and when the waves seemed about to close over Him, between Him and His God, His whole being, as if in one agonized effort, should have then bounded upward, "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" There never was suffering like this, not merely in degree, but in kind. "See if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow!" There never was suffering which from its nature could have been so pleasing to God, for it confessed what the sin ■ the world really is. It was a cry from humanity full of woe, but woe that was in absolute response to the holy and perfect will of God. It was the kind of suffering which only a holy Being could endure ■ was right suffering, for it was such ■ the holy and loving One ought to have endured when in contact with evil in those He loved.

(2) But not only was there the consciousness of evil, but we can trace another element of suffering in the consciousness of approaching death. I do not now speak of the natural horror with which death affects us all, but which the brave man meets, and which the holy martyrs have met, with calm and sometimes with triumph. Death had for Jesus a significance ■ could have for no one else. From the beginning of the world it had been recognised as the witness to man's alienation from God. It had been identified with sin in the whole sacrificial system of the Law. Death may seem a light thing to a soldier who throws himself against the hedge of steel. ■ ■ little more than a horrible necessity, "a debt that must be paid to nature," for the hardened and unbelieving. It is no more death, but a falling asleep in Jesus, for the Christian who rests in Him who hath robbed death of its sting. But for Jesus death was the very seal of His identification with sinful humanity. When He accepted it, it was the voluntary acceptance by Him of the responsibilities which fell on the humanity into which He had entered. He alone was able to recognise what death ■ in full consciousness. He alone really "tasted death." "He poured out," as if by an act of will, "his soul unto death." Can we not then understand with a new force the cry uttered a few moments before He died? Is it too much to suppose that in those moments His human body, which suffered hunger and thirst, and heat and cold, was then afflicting Him with the sense of coming dissolution, and that the consciousness of the swooning away of the natural powers and of the deepening shadows were for Him as for us all? And when He, whose life had ever been in the bosom of the Father, felt, in that hour, death—the very seal of man's alienation—asserting its loathsome power upon Himself—■ it dimmed consciousness and closed God out from His apprehension—as this brand of evil was pressing in and in upon the sources of His life, can we not understand how, ere all gave way, He should have cried in agony, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" and by that very cry reached back again to the Father who was ever near Him?

MAY 18TH

Read Psalm xxiii and Hebrews from iv ■ to v ■

One of the Evangelists tells us that some of the people who heard the cry, "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani," imagined that our Lord was calling for Elias. If it should seem strange to us that there could have been any who so misunderstood His words, we must recollect that there were there many foreign Jews whose language was not the common dialect of Palestine, but Greek, and to whom the name of Elijah as it appears in the Septuagint, Elion, was familiar. ■ is, therefore, not unlikely that, under the awing impression of the darkness and thrilled by that piercing cry from the mysterious sufferer, a superstitious fear seized them lest Elias, of whom ■ had been said that he would appear "before the great and terrible day of the Lord," might literally come in response to what sounded like a prayer for his assistance.

The fifth word from the cross, "I thirst," which followed immediately after, throws much light on the character of our Lord's sufferings.

(1) It shows that the pressure of the mental agony had passed away with the cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me." It is a well known law that when the mind is intensely occupied it becomes unconscious of bodily sensations. In the hurry of the charge and amid the thunder of the guns, the soldier scarcely feels the biting sword cut, swept along in the storm of battle, he is too much absorbed to be conscious of bodily pain. Now on the same principle the confession of thirst coming after the latter cry, reveals the recovered consciousness of bodily sensations, and the consequent departure of the spiritual trial which had been absorbing Him. That clearer interval which is indicated in the twenty-second Psalm and in the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah as closing the passion of the Messiah, seems here to have been reached. "Seeing ■ the travail of His soul, He is satisfied."

(2) This confession of physical pain teaches the reality of all His other sufferings. Some persons imagine that because Jesus was divine, He could not have really endured, as we have ■ endure, trial and agony. But no antecedent reasoning can give us light on the conditions of the Incarnation. We know, however, that whatever these were they did not prevent the agony of Gethsemane from being real agony, or the terrible woe of the Cross from being so deep that for hours all bodily sensation was forgotten. The soft word, "I thirst," coming as it did when that strain was over, shows that the weight of trial had been falling utterly unchecked by ought except the faith in which the Divine Son, crucified in weakness, was cleaving to God.

(3) But that this confession of thirst was the only instance of any complaint of bodily suffering having ever escaped His lips not merely at the crucifixion, but during His whole life, teaches us not only the greatness of the thirst He endured, but also the small part which physical pain had to do with the passion of Christ. This fact ought to rebuke all coarse descriptions of the pain of the crucifixion, and those in which the value of the atonement seems to be measured by the amount of bodily agony inflicted on the Sufferer. Those terrible delineations set forth in the pictures used at "the Stations" in Roman Catholic churches, and the no less shocking pictures given from the pulpit by Protestant preachers, seem equally condemned. The true sphere of our Lord's trial was spiritual, not physical.

(4) We are also taught a helpful lesson as to the endurance of pain—that awful fact in the experience of many a child of God. There are two ways in which we may be borne bravely. It may be borne with Stoicism or with Christian patience, and there is a wide difference between the two. Stoicism shuts the eye to the presence of pain, and clinches the teeth against its power. But patience seeks to recognise the meaning of the suffering, and to bear it according to the will of God.

Stoicism is not a part of Christian morals. It is the virtue of the savage or of the athlete, but intelligent patience which confesses suffering and bears it in meekness, is the glory of the Christian soldier. Stoicism seeks to despise pain; patience endeavours to bear it in a right spirit. There was no Stoicism in Christ, but there was patience—even the patience of Him who, "though He were a Son, yet learned obedience by the things which He suffered." Such calm fortitude is as high above Stoicism as Stoicism exalts cowardice.

MAY 25TH.

Read Phil. ii. and Heb. ii. 12-22.

Some of us, perhaps, may remember terrible moments in life when we were thankful that the sufferings of those we loved were past, although it was death which ended them. That is a sad sense of relief when, albeit our hearts are breaking, we say, "Thank God! it is all over, as the torments of pain cease for ever. It is with a similar consciousness that we listen to the "It is finished," from the Cross. For it was something more dreadful than bodily trial, which has been witnessed there. Putting it even on the lowest ground, it was the agony of the Divinest Being the world has ever seen which we have contemplated. We see Him there face to face with thoughts and with objects whose effects are visibly appalling. And that He should be in poignant anguish, and that His lips should utter a wail of desolation, arrests us far more than can any spectacle of physical torture. It is, therefore, with a profound sense of relief we catch the words, "It is finished!" which proclaim the end of the Redeemer's sufferings.

These words also tell us that the one sinless and perfect life the world has seen is not only terminated, but that it has been perfected. The completeness as well as the conclusion of the life are thereby expressed. There are certain qualities which only trial can bring forth. And the Cross stands related to Christ's life on earth as being the trial and thereby the perfecting of the life of Sonship towards God, and of divine brotherhood towards man. And so it is written that 'though He were a son yet He learned obedience by the things He suffered,' and that "the Captain of our salvation was made perfect by suffering." The passion of the Cross may therefore be regarded as revealing the greatness of His obedience, the strength of His faith and the power of His love—and when He said, 'It is finished,' He but repeated in another and higher form the calm and triumphant confession, "I have glorified Thee on the earth, I have finished the work Thou gavest me to do." And what work can be compared to this perfect and completed life—the embodiment of an ideal goodness, that shall remain for ever the unique heritage of our humanity?

And this perfecting of Christ as our Redeemer through suffering is of the very essence of the Atonement, in whatever sense we understand it. It was the one complete, satisfying response offered to God in our humanity and must therefore stand alone—"one offering whereby He perfects for ever those that are sanctified." Undoubtedly the sacrifice of Christ must in another sense lead to sacrifice. It was not intended to supersede the necessity for similar self-surrender on our part. For it being spiritual, it becomes a quickening power, recreating its own image in all who receive Him. It is therefore in this aspect of the truth not solitary. But as being alone, complete and perfect, it is solitary. It is on the ground of His having thus rendered in our humanity what we from our sinfulness never can render, even a perfect response to the righteous will of God, that we can look up to our Father through Christ, in the freedom of children, and rejoice in His finished work. We cannot see as we ought, but He, our Head, has blessed it. We cannot respond as we would to the all holy will of the Father, but He has responded. And in Him we stand, and through Him we find perfect access to God. The farther we advance spiritually, and the more we, ourselves, seek to yield the answer of Sonship to the will of God, the more will we be taught in the light of Christ's finished work, our own shortcomings, and the more will we be brought back to Him—who for our humanity, rendered the one perfect offering of Himself unto God. The "finished" and complete character of His work must, therefore, remain for ever the one foundation of our confidence.

Lastly, this word, "It is finished," may be regarded as the solemn closing of a long past. From Adam downwards, the one chief thought had been set forth of redemption through the suffering Messiah. It had been shadowed forth in promises, outlined in types and ordinances, embodied in the life of a nation, in their laws, their kings, their priesthood, their ecclesiastical arrangements. Like some theme in music which is expressed through vast variety of tone and harmony, so through a wondrously linked succession of individual and national experiences, through institutions and the inspired words of prophets, was it set forth how "the Christ must needs suffer and enter into His rest." And with the word, "It is finished," He calmly pronounces the close of that long past. But like every other end marked also a beginning. Two eras met there, and we may believe that if there was a sublime sense of satisfaction in the perfect completion of the work to which all the past had led up, there was also an intense joy in seeing the great future which was to be the priceless fruit of His sufferings and death. If it was "for the joy that was set before Him" that "He endured the cross and despised the shame," may we not believe that the utterance of the "It is finished" had in it also a foretaste of the coming triumph. "Seeing the travail of His soul, He was satisfied." And so the word of perfect completion led to the last sweet word of perfect rest, "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit."

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST.

By JOHN FENNELL

By SARAH TYLLER, AUTHOR OF "CHLOËNE JACQUELINE," "LADY BYLL," ETC.

CHAP. XVII.—HAY-MAKING AT WHITCHILLS.

IRIS awoke next morning from an uneasy lying sleep, in which she was haunted by a vague sense of something wrong, some impending family strife and convulsion. She did not feel the slightest necessity for being gradually lowered into a wholesomely sober and tranquil mood. She was as low as she could be without the tranquillity, amidst the sense of vanity of vanities, among the stale and flat relics which are apt to belong to the bill of last night, though at twenty one the languor of fatigue is not added to the debt which has to be paid.

There was no use thinking of not going to Whitchills, however awkward and terrible the hay making might present itself to her in anticipation. She could not feign bodily illness which she did not feel, and though she had felt it, she had a vivid perception that Lady Fermor who was out of humour already, would have scouted any ailment short of the dangerous eruption of small pox or the dangerous revelations of delirious fever. She would have dragged Iris in her trim to Whitchills a half-dead offering to its master, should he condescend to accept it.

Iris could not beg off from the expedition like the Mildmay—Mrs Mildmay on the score of a severe headache, and Mr Mildmay because he had business letters to answer, and some other things to attend to, before he left with his wife next day.

"More prying to do," Lady Fermor commented behind his back. "Well, they are no less, a couple of kill joys, he with his stupid pomposity, and she with her die away airs."

Tom Mildmay's excuse to himself was "That match is not made up yet, from what I saw last night, and surely I am not called upon to put myself out of my way to push the girl's interests or hatch the old woman's chickens."

There was only one small comfort of which Iris could avail herself. She arrived at a clear understanding with Lucy Acton, as she had come to an explanation with Lady Thwaite.

"I here is not one word of truth in the story that I am to marry Sir William Thwaite," she impressed on Lucy with solemn earnestness, "only I fear grandmamma wishes it," she added with a fall in her voice and an involuntary tight interlacing of her fingers. "But I could not do it even for grand-mamma, my duty ■ her and to poor grand-papa does not absolve me from my duty to myself, to Sir William, and to God, Lucy. He ordained marriage as the nearest, most sacred tie, a relationship we might not enter into lightly, with divided minds. Think how unlike Sir William and I are, with not a taste, very likely not an opinion or principle in common."

Lucy listened startled, while Iris continued to speak in the same unnaturally grave, almost portentous, tones.

"I don't mean that he is a bad man, very likely he is far better than I am, since he has stood so great a change in his fortunes, without breaking out into any extravagant or outrageous conduct. But have you forgotten how we used to talk of him, and laugh and wonder whether he would put his hat under his chair, and what he would do with his gloves and handkerchief?" asked Iris, with a reproachful, wavering smile. "A wiser than half-educated, under-bred man, a man rustic and dull as one might fairly expect, and very possibly arrogant and vulgar-minded, though he has had no great opportunity of showing it, and I never suspected it till last night," said Iris in her truthfulness. "Oh! Lucy, how could I marry such a man? How could you ever think it?"

"I beg your pardon, dear, if I have hurt you," Lucy apologized in a convicted voice. She was sorry not only because she had brought herself the length of making up her mind to the match—hardly for the sake of her subscription lists, since, to do her justice, Lucy was a good deal more of a woman than a secretary—but because she happened to be a practical, sensible girl, largely trusted by her elders. Young though she was, she knew something of the sad reasons, with which Iris was very partially acquainted, why it would be by far the happiest prospect for Lucy's friend if she could find herself early and safely settled in life. Supposing Iris could have brought herself to entertain a suitable regard for Sir William, and he were the worthy, plain fellow that Lucy had been persuading herself for the last twelve hours he undoubtedly was, here would have been a grave difficulty joyfully solved ■ once.

But, of course, it was for Iris to judge, and if she could not of her free will look on Sir William in the light of her future husband—which was not surprising, after all, poor child!—it would never be her friend⁴ Lucy who would use pressure on Iris's inclinations. Lucy would leave that ■ Lady Fermor. Lucy would even aid and abet Iris against her formidable grandmother, so far as the welfare of the Rector and the parish would let so good a churchwoman endanger it for any private and unkind matter. However, the affair was unfortunate altogether, and Lucy feared with some reason there were hard times in store for Iris.

As for Iris she was still capable of thankfulness for small mercies. It was a relief to think Lucy would not come to her again and speak of Sir William with the forced, sanguine praise, adopted last night. Iris had a sense of support in the conviction that Lucy would help her when she could, in keeping out of his reach ■ the bay making—were it but to atone for the pain which her friend's credulity had given Iris. Such an atonement would be a hundred times better than any amount of apologies.

The girls had fixed to wear nearly similar gowns—white, with blue ribands for Iris, and pink for Lucy. But when Iris appeared before her grandmother she was summarily dismissed to change her dress.

"You look too washed out this morning for that childish white frock, girl. What a wretched constitution you must have to be tired out by one ball! Put on anything rather than that white rag to make an exhibition of your sickness, which is only a bad trick, after all, for you can walk to Knotley or Mistley Down and back again, and feel no worse of it, when you choose."

Though Iris was prepared to be miserable, though she despaired of pleasing her grandmother this morning, she had not attained the age when vexation and worry merge into personal hopelessness, and there is a certain listless, half-bitter satisfaction in being utterly indifferent to externals. Iris had still the feelings of her kind, in seeking, however unhappy she might be, ■ comply with her obligation to the world in making the most of her personal advantages, and looking her best under difficulties—whether in public or in private. It seems perverse of Iris, for, apart from her grandmother's wishes, ■ ought to have served the girl better ■ wear sack-cloth and ashes, and look in harmony with her attire. Instead she put on a garment of mixed dark and light blue, which set off her fair complexion, even in its dullness and waxiness, this morning. She tied on a straw hat with mauve ribands, which warned her present lack of colour, and removed from the pale pink in her cheeks the slightest strain of sallowness. If she were no longer like the red, red rose, she was like the maiden's blush, whose very faintness of tint is exquisite, and competes successfully with the hue, "angry and bright," of its brilliant sister.

Lady Fermor made no comment on the change, though she spoke a few words apart to Iris. "You will mind what you are about, Iris. There is neither to be mock-modesty nor barefaced flirtation. I think either of them is shockingly bad taste. I was sorry to receive a hint that you had been guilty of the one or the other last night. What! you do not understand me, Miss Compton? I give you credit for more brains. What do you call mock-modesty but an assumption of ignorance of a gentleman's intentions, which have been patent to any one who chose to use his or her eyes for the last three months? If the ignorance had been real it must have been idiotic. And what is your idea of a boydenish flirtation but to turn your shoulder and run away from a man who has my leave to pursue you, and will stop you before many days are done? I could give you a good shaking for your pains."

"Grandmamma, will you let me speak to you?" begged Iris, shaking already in every limb before the crisis, but nerving herself like a bravehearted girl with a clear conscience, for the encounter.

"No, I will not," answered Lady Fermor with hardly restrained violence of absolute denial, so that the sound reached Lucy in the other window. "I have no time to listen to your flighty maudlin nonsense, besides, there is nothing further to be said. I have already told you that you are not everybody's bargain—that I am doing my best for you, while you are behaving like an ungrateful baby. Come, Miss Acton, I hear the carriage drawing up."

Such was the seasoning which Iris had beforehand the various courses of a Dresden fete.

Lady Fermor's party and Lady Thwaite's party constituted the principal people at Sir William's hay-making. The Hollies had been otherwise engaged, and the contribution from the Rectory, from Knotley, even from Birkett barracks was of inferior importance. If Lady Fermor's ball had become Miss Compton's, Sir William Thwaite's hay making was more than half Lady Fermor's. Though Lady Thwaite had engaged to give the guests tea in her old drawing-room, the mistress of Lambford put in her oar again and unceremoniously robbed the former mistress of Whitehills of all save her bare perquisites, while Lady Thwaite was too much of a woman of the world to do more than shrug her shoulders imperceptibly and smile, and gracefully waive her superior claims.

Lady Fermor took the initiative. She knew, or held that she knew, exactly what to do. She had the programme cut and dry. She drove straight to the hay field, where Sir William was restlessly awaiting his guests, while his reception of them there could be made a more informal and easy matter than could have been managed in the house. The old lady at once occupied the arm chair which she had directed to be brought out for her, and asked for a glass of wine to drink the hay makers' healths and prosperity the crop and its master, which she did in a spirited little speech composed for the occasion. Then she ordered all the select company to find rakes and toss the grass with the best, while she sat and presided over the work and boasted of the hay-making machine which had superseded hay makers. Lambford. Thus the hay-field was as it were de cluded open to the better classes, and the fete set a-going sheerly by the energy of Lady Fermor.

The scene was pleasant to see. The great hay field consisted of acre upon acre of billowy meadow land just adjoining the park of Whitehills. The field commanded clumps of fine old trees and vistas of green. At the end of one vista stood the long, low, white manor house, which had survived the vicissitudes of centuries, of kings, and of people, and had still been handed down from Thwaite to Thwaite, till it fell into the hands of a sergeant in a marching regiment.

Not infrequently the moist climate of Eastwich had a mist—silver or golden, or dark-white—like a shroud, to hang its light, loose, wavy veil, or to wind its hazy, tight, straight folds about the landscape. To day, after long dry, warm weather, there was no more of this mist than the softest amber haze of heat, which tempered the droughty blue of the sky even more than one or two fleecy white clouds, flecking the expanse and making chequers of shade, afforded a sense of refreshment. The weather-wise pointed to these clouds, and coupling with them the well-known sign of the low darts here and there of the maize, said Sir William was drying his hay in time, for the fine weather would not last much longer.

The swathes of grass passing from green to russet filled the air with dusty sweetness, as they were whirled and swirled about, not with the precision and monotony of the hay making machine, but with the more picturesque irregularity of human arms and human wills. Here and there a precocious cluster of hay cocks showed where the early sun had shone most strongly and the early workers toiled most diligently.

The true workers, tanned and freckled, with an ancient green stained smock frock or two lingering in the ranks of jackets, and a snow white, deep pink, or fresh lilac sun bonnet asserting itself at different points among the brown straw hats, were in keeping with the occupation. It was pursued with a sort of dogged industry and slow humorous pretence of the primitive hay makers at not so much as seeing their esoteric faithful assistants.

Lady Fermor, in her chair, with her nodding plumes, and her stiff fingers covered with rings, looked the mediæval châtelaine to perfection. The artificial workers lent greater animation and gaiety to the heavier, more sombre groups among which they mingled for a few hours. The ladies and gentlemen brought delicate play and airy flutter, like the accompaniment of fairy music ■ the deeper tones of the human choir. There were the lighter swish of soft dresses, and the daintier effect of wonderful shades of colour in prim rose and daffodil, peacock blue, cardinal red, and sea coral. There were graceful gambols with badly poised new rakes and pitchforks, freedom ■ rest every other moment, the continual refrain of merry jesting and laughter, accompanying a labour of love and fancy, and not of strict necessity, and work a day and woe.

Doubtless there were some gloomy and saturnine souls that resisted the intrusion of fumes among the bittered warriors and amiable, the beaten victims of the sweat of the brow and the bondage ■ poverty and toil. Sir William himself was not without a tendency to look, from time to time, in this light at the party he had permitted if not originated. But the apathetic, much enduring Eastwich labouring men and women for the most part treated the liberty taken with their class in a more genial and wholesome, if more superficial spirit. The appearance of the gentlefolks in the field formed a fine sight, their antics proved a famous diversion to their humbler neighbours. And for that matter the grandees had their troubles as well as their gay doings, and were but dust like the rest of the world, which was a comforting reflection.

There was the squire, looking none so hearty and heedless that anybody need eat out his heart with envying him. Mayhap he wished himself back among his early friends, doing a day's work, trudging on the march, talking and smoking their clay pipes over their mugs of beer, when the sun went down. Mayhap working at being a gentleman, to which he had not been bred, turned out the hardest work of all. The women among the real hay makers thought surely they would have a taste of cowslip wine—still extant in Eastwich—or elderberry wine and diet cake to sweeten their mouths after the usual field fare, when the gentle folks were holding their feast.

In the mean time Sir William, though he wore an expression of inflexible gravity as one on the eve of a grand epoch in his life, was not a blot on his company. He showed best in his morning dress, in which he was most at home—any rusticity or obliviousness of what another squire would have done, without a thought, did not come into prominence, or merely peeped out with a species of propriety in the relaxation of the hay-making. The sort of fettered air which haunted him at other times, with a depressing effect, had largely disappeared on this occasion. In his tweed suit and straw hat he looked the comely, stalwart young fellow he was, he moved about almost freely, almost lightly.

Iris's vexation and nervous oppression—when they were not at once confirmed by Sir William's conduct, did not remain proof against the fresh open air attractiveness of the scene, with its touches of sentiment and fatalism. She had visions of Madame de Sévigné at Les Rochers, and Madam Delany at some of the innumerable country houses of her innumerable friends, from the "dear Duchess" downwards, of Lady Sarah Lennox on the lawn before Holland House, when Kensington was a village and a king rode by, of a picture which hung up yonder in the drawing room at Whitehills. It represented a Lady Elwate whom Sir Joshua had painted as a shepherdess, and neither her husband nor anybody else had resented the masquerade, though the very next generation had punished, with life long expulsion from the family, a son of the house who took a gamekeeper's daughter for his bride.

The light returned to Iris's eyes and the colour to her cheek. Sir William had not so much as spoken to her, except in a general welcome to Lady Fermor's party. He did not come near her. Was a great deliverance granted to her? Had he got his lesson so that he would not affront her again by confounding common charity with full sympathy and warm regard. In that case her grandmother could do nothing and he would soon forget his balked expectations. She, Iris, did not think she could ever again slumber in such sweet security and lightness of heart, as she had allowed herself to feel, but at least she might be happy to day in the sunshine, in the meadow, among friendly young people, her contemporaries.

Iris and Lucy and Ludovic Acton, with Lady Thwaite's niece Janie, flung about the future hay for a quarter of an hour, in an orderly professional manner. Then Lucy, backed with half-shy glee by Janie, turned upon the naval lieutenant. They showered the contents of their rakes upon him till he was stuck all over, from the crown of his hat to the toes of his boots, with seeded grass. Iris looked on and laughed with maidenly coyness. Five or six years ago she would have been forward in the game, for which she still felt a secret inclination, but she was too grown up and decorous to engage in sisterly or schoolgirl romping. He did not mind it, though there were stray specimens of the seeds in his sandy beard and moustache for the next hour. His sister was constantly imploring him, in vain, to let her pick them out. He said they did not bother him and would not at all interfere with his flute playing. He had brought his second best flute in his pocket, as he felt certain Lady Thwaite and Sir William must have made some provision for drawing-room music. For anything farther the seeds ought to stay where they were, as a punishment to Lucy for her unsisterly behaviour. He did not mean any reflection on Miss Janie, who could do as she pleased, and was not to be considered accountable for his acquiring the look of having slept last night in a hayfield, like any tramp or vagabond. It was a member of his own family, his sister Lucy, the prop of the Sunday-school, who had set herself to draw down on him the slanderous inference. It was too dreadful, almost more than could be borne with manly fortitude.

The wit was of the mildest description, but the girls laughed as if it had been Attic salt. They laughed too when Ludovic was the first to complain of an ache in his strong back, and to propose a saunter round the meadows, where the saunterers gathered that was left of the queen of the meadow and ragged robin.

Iris suggested that they should sit down when Mr Acton might convert himself into a Corydon or an Orpheus, on the spot, by piping to them on his reed—toot-tooting on his flute she meant, if he had not broken it, when he had disobeyed Lucy and everybody else, and got his boots in a mess of clay, in spite of the dry weather, by burrowing in the side of the ditch after a harmless hedgehog. But Lucy forbade him, insisting that the hay-makers would consider the piping an invitation to leave off working and take to dancing—not such dances as came naturally to Arcadian shepherds and shepherdesses.

Among the bona-fide workers was a woman who raked and spread the grass slightly apart from her neighbours. She had come on Sir William's express invitation, but she was not well received by the other field-workers. They had little to say against her. It was nothing to them that old Abe Smith had a doubtful reputation as an under-keeper, and only retained his post till he should cross the seas to his son, by a cross whim of old Sir John's which he seemed to have left as a legacy to the present baronet. It was even little to the ladies and wives and mothers that Honor was not like other young women. She was masculine and wild in her ways. Instead of staying in the cottage at Hawley Scrub, and attending to her housewifery, as they stayed at home and scoured and washed and plied their needles when they were not at field work, she lived in the woods, summer and winter, like her father. She was said to aid and abet him in his nefarious doings, if so be he had nefarious doings. She was not a relation of the common country people's, old Abe being come of a nearly extinct race of settlers, while Honor's mother had belonged to the Quarry-folk who dwelt hard upon Mintley Downs and were, next to the ancient squatters, the most unsettled and unruly natives of the district. But the great offence was that Honor was not and never had been a field worker, and the ordinary Eastwich field-worker looked as dubiously and disapprovingly on an interloper, as any exclusive set, high or low, objects to an intruder into their charmed circle. The squire might bring as many ladies and gentlemen into the field as he liked, but a strange field-worker was another matter. That was not to be thought of. That was not Eastwich manners.

The solitary figure was conspicuous in the black gown, with the red handkerchief not worn round her throat, but drawn over her abundant brown hair and knotted under her chin, as her sole protection against the beating down rays of the afternoon sun. The head-gear lent an outlandish, half gipsy air to Honor, ■ which she did not object. It certainly suited with her being held at arm's length by her fellow workers, nor did she appear to mind the ostracism. Perhaps she took it as a compliment, for hers was an odd character, with its own peculiar pride, as well ■ its dash of cynicism. She might put down the distance at which she was kept to the fact, that, as a keeper's daughter, if he had been a flourishing keeper of unblemished fame, she would have moved in a grade of life considerably higher than that of the day-labourers, her present companions. This reflection doubtless helped her philosophy, for she looked contented enough whenever she paused ■ contemplate the amount and the thoroughness of the work to which she was unused.

Sir William did not fail Honor Smith. Like Lady Fernor, he did not lose sight of a friend. He came down to her corner of the field several times, and spoke with her, asking how her father was, when he proposed to take out their berths in the Liverpool ship, how she was getting on with her work, and how long she thought it would take for the grass to dry. But Sir William spoke also, though with greater effort, to other men and women in his party, with whom he had struck up an acquaintance. There was nothing at all striking in his notice of Honor Smith till Major Pollock strolled towards her, and began to talk to her in a way that interfered with her work, and annoyed her, to judge by the manner in which she rested on her rake, and flung back her head.

It was then Sir William crossed the field swiftly to Honor Smith's aid. "You know, Honor, I am looking for half the field being in haycock to night." He addressed her as if she were his friend as well as his servant, while he ignored the unwelcome, compulsory guest brought upon him by Lady Fernor. "I count upon you doing your best. Look here, you must not permit any interference with your work."

"All right, Sir William," she said, very much as a free-spoken man would have answered him, while her white teeth flashed out in a broad smile, against the warm brown of her cheeks and the red of her handkerchief; "will you be so good as to repeat your orders to this here gentleman?"

In spite of her smile and her masculine tone, there was very much of the woman in the mingled impatience, anger, and disgust of the last sentence.

"Oh! I'm off. Excuse me. I had no idea I was guilty of an intrusion," the Major mumbled superciliously and impertinently, as he lounged away, giving more freedom to the expression of his thoughts the farther he got out of Sir William's hearing. "So my gentleman has two strings to his bow, low hypocrite and temperance dog that he is! It would not be a bad idea to give the old beldame a hint."

But Major Pollock did not feel equal to fulfilling his intention, though a fine opening presented itself to him the very next moment. Lady Fernor, who had been fully alive to the little episode, made an imperious signal for him to come to her side, and told him roundly, "Pollock, if you cannot behave yourself ■ this time of the day, you shan't enter decent society under my auspices again."

"What does the mean by decent society?" mattered her follower, as disloyal as he was abject. "Her own, or that of the stuck up swashbuckler whom she means to call her grandson, or the red-capped woman who is Miss Compton's rival? A fine collection!"

But though Major Pollock refrained from using his foul tongue when he was called to account, and was cowed by Lady Fernor's rough reprimands, he registered both the offence to his pride, and the choice communication he desired to convey, for a future occasion.

Lady Fernor's seat was not far from a gate into the park where a side path led to the house. Sir William had done his best to make everything easy for his patroness. He gave her his arm and conducted her carefully ■ the gate, a movement which was a sign for the company to follow their leaders. Within the gate a sedan chair which had been used by the late Sir John was drawn up. Sir William placed the old lady in it. Then he took his stand by the open gate and in a dumb show, which was not without its clumsy grace of honest hospitality, did not so much receive as show in his company. He was making himself their servant according to his sense of a host's part. As Mrs Compton came up he found voice to address her. "I hope you are enjoying yourself, Mrs Compton."

She had no choice except to answer, "I thank, I am enjoying myself very much, Sir William." She felt aggrieved ■ well as troubled, by the hot flush of pleasure, the momentary broad smile which her matter of course words brought into his face, and by the emphatic nod of acquiescence and approval volunteered by her grandmother.

Sir William would suffer no one but himself ■ wheel the chair along the by path which turned into the main sweep and terminated at the entrance to the house.

The rest of the party, preceding the two, entered the fine hall which had failed to impress its owner on the March day when Mr. Miles brought the heir home, and passing the library went into Lady Thwaite's old drawing room.

The former Lady of Whitehills was in her element as she again presided in the well-known domain, welcoming everybody, entertaining everybody, seeing that Mrs. Cray and Cumberbatch supplied the company with tea, or wine, or ices as they preferred. Mrs. Cray did not relish the deputy mistress. The housekeeper might stomach an "own lady," if Sir William chose ■ bring her on the scene, but not the late madam who came to remark on changes, and call for this or that ■ which she had been accustomed, but which was not cleaned and put out for the occasion. But as for Cumberbatch he was as much in his element as Lady Thwaite was in hers. He considered this was something like a return, on a small scale, to the dignified hospitality of the Dean.

Lady Thwaite was supported by the Rector in a flush of benignity, divided between the advisability of lending his countenance to a lady who was in the position of hostess—a trying position under the circumstances, or of hurrying off to relieve Sir William of the charge of Mr. Acton's old prodigal, the most unmistakable and unmingled prodigal in his flock.

Lady Thwaite had an elevating sense of magnanimity in doing her duty, under such altered conditions, in the Whitehills drawing room; she had also a considerable feeling of enjoyment in displaying the magnanimity, knowing that almost everybody to whom she sent a cup of tea and a shaving of bread and butter, or a pile of grapes, or a peach in lieu of the strawberries which had not waited for the second hay cutting, was remembering to say, "Poor dear Lady Thwaite! how unselfish and amiable she is, and how much Sir William and the rest of us are obliged to her, for she must feel all this dreadfully. She must be overpowered by a throng of old associations."

Lady Thwaite was not overpowered in the line sketched out for her, but she had some pensive perceptions which gave her the agreeable conviction that there was no sham in her magnanimity. How well her old drawing room looked, bare as it was! what a poor little place her drawing room at Nether-ton would always ■ in comparison! Of course she could not carry off the carved cornice, the caryatides of the chimney-piece, the space, those odd available nooks with their charming air of retreat, and delightful lights and shades. That relic of the musicians' gallery, the only one left in the county—she used to be so proud of it and show it off to all strangers. In like manner, she had exhibited the two Sir Joshuas. They were heir-looms, but she might have asked for the fragment of old tapestry hanging over the ruling of the gallery. She had been too modest, particularly as Sir William doubtless imagined ■ a bit of old carpet, and wondered what it was doing there.

Iris could not escape from certain new sensations when she entered Whitehills again. She had the taste to value it, and she could not avoid reminding herself that if Lady Fermor and Lady Thwaite were right, as her awakened instincts told her they were, all might be hers. This might become her stately, beautiful home—her home, with a man on whom its mellowed dignity, refinement, and comfort would be thrown away, who might like to pull down the old pile and replace it by a hideous staring modern mansion, which had not borrowed one idea from Ruskin or Morris, Kensington or Turnham Green. If Sir William did not meditate such wholesale desecration, he was probably only waiting for his marriage to re-furnish Whitehills "right off," like a new pin, as she had once heard him express himself, with waggon loads of gorgeous chairs and couches, and curtains brought down from some advertising warehouse, and only the modern antiques rejected along with the veritable antiques. Certainly taste was not everything, was not very much in a man's moral and spiritual composition, still it stood for a good deal in the girl's mind—for that culture which, however laughed at in its extravagance, still marks the difference between knowledge and ignorance, polish and roughness, and represents to a gentlewoman easy sympathy, natural companionship, familiar interests, and almost involuntary respect and regard. She was right in what she had said last night. Whitehills, even though it had been Warwick Castle or Windsor, was not worth a girl's selling herself that she might be its temporary owner and dwell there in loveless state and bounty, in heavy dullness and loneliness, in constant petty affront and perturbation, for what its untutored, sometimes uncouth, master might or might not say.

and do. Iris felt calm again. She could go and look at the Sir Joshua with Lucy, and speculate whether the Lady Thwaite of a hundred years ago had ever tried making hay, or had been at the pains to look at the process, save in some French print of "un amusement pastoral," though she had been an Eastwich bride and had dwelt at Whitehills for the most of her life. If it had been otherwise, could she have dressed herself in what looked like a pink gauze sacque, and worn a mob cap with a hat suspended by the ribbons half way down her shoulders, and employed such a toy rake as would not have gathered more than half-a-dozen blades of grass at a time?

King Lud had his will. There was a little music extracted with difficulty from the old piano, for Lady Thwaite had carried away her Broadwood, and this was an instrument "as old as the hills," the most musical man present felt bound to protest with a groan, an out of tune thing, without the additional octaves, which had been used by Sir John's last unmarried sister. Lady Thwaite played first, but Iris, though she played among the other girls, declined to follow immediately after her hostess.

CHAPTER XVIII.—THE BEAST THROWS HIMSELF AT BEAUTY'S FEET

Iris was getting too bold, far too bold, she took herself to task disconsolately soon afterwards, when all her nerves were jangled, and her heart sent again fluttering in her throat. There had been some talk of the garden, and Lady Thwaite had asked Sir William about the lilies which ought to be in blossom on the pond, and about the Japanese lilies which she had introduced with success into the tank at the end of the largest green-house. There was a little stir indicative of an adjournment to the gardens, but Iris felt quite safe in joining in the movement. It would only be the young people who would go out again before returning home to dinner, and mentally she clasped Sir William, in spite of his last night's waltzing, with the elderly folks, and seated him in her imagination beside Lady Fernor, to whom he seemed bent on doing the honours of his house. Iris was ready to acknowledge, even in her present prejudiced state of mind, that the homage did not come ill from the prime of manhood to tottering, though untamed and undaunted, old age. Instead, her dream of security was rudely broken by her seeing Sir William standing in front of her, and hearing him say, "Miss Compton, would you mind going to see the lilies?"

XXV.—55

She did mind, but she could not say so. She had an instantaneous comprehension that the hour and the man had come, and she must meet them with the courage which other girls summoned up for similar trials. She took his arm and walked out, with the knowledge that all the eyes in the room were fixed on the couple, as they had been last night. She dared not let herself think that Lucy must be pitying her, lest the sense of her friend's compassion should shake her firmness.

Slight and matter-of-course as the advance might appear, it was really the most direct, unmistakable approach he had made to her that day. She would never have looked upon it as anything save a host's politeness and Sir William's growing savoir faire, if it had not been for what she had been told last night, which had robbed her of her ease and peace of mind, till she could not put an indifferent interpretation on a simple action.

Iris could not tell whether Sir William had been spurred on by her grandmother to take the leap which lay before him, or whether it was the spontaneous impulse of a man with regard to whom she had not doubted that he was a brave man. He might never have read poetry (if she had known it, he had taken to reading it lately, and had gone through dozens of love poems on her account), still he might by instinct have arrived at an entire agreement with the gallant Montrose —

"He either threw his fate too much,
Or his devotion was small;
That does not put it to the touch
Is a gun or lute it all."

Yet she felt the arm on which her fingers were resting trembling as she walked along the corridor, and she feared she would need to have coolness for both. She had read that in certain circumstances, under the influence of passion, strong men are sometimes weaker than fragile women. But whatever other girls had done she ought to be able to do, and surely she would take his rejection like a man. She knew he could not conceal his feelings, and she did not expect him to be forbearing and generous, especially after what her grandmother had done. He might be rude and angry, but his anger was not what she feared.

Withal, modest as Iris was, she never doubted the sincerity of Sir William's sentiments, she never fancied that he could be influenced by any other motive than unfortunate misplaced attachment to herself. There was little distrust, and almost no suspicion, in Mrs Compton's nature, neither was there the least tendency to double-dealing or trifling. There was not the making of a coquette in her. Now that the moment, from which she had turned away with the greatest repugnance, was at hand, she would rather face it and have ■ over, because it would be better for both of them. Then she would reckon with her grandmother, at least the gentle, inexperienced, ill-armed girl would match herself with the woman who had eaten of the fruits of the tree of the knowledge of evil to the last bitter sweet morsel, who could be as furious as she was unscrupulous.

Iris only made a single attempt to direct the course of events a little in her favour, and in his favour also. Everybody seemed bound for the gardens, had she and he not better have it out where there were fewer spectators? At least spectators less interested in watching the couple from a distance, and greedily scanning each sign of the result of the interview. If the poor man were in danger of making a spectacle of himself, ought she not to screen him as far as she could from exposure?

"If it is all the same to you, Sir William," said Iris, with an involuntary tremor in her voice, "I should prefer to go down to the hay-field again. I should like ■ speak to an old acquaintance there."

"Whatever you please," he told her hurriedly. "We may come back by the lilies. They are like—they make me think of you—I mean of how you looked last night."

She had nothing to answer. She was afraid he might go on ■ reproach her with slighting him at her ball. Yet how could he have felt the slight if he cared to remember her looks last night? She was afraid everything remained to be told. She began to talk fast on another subject in order to excuse herself for neglecting the lilies. She was nerving herself to give him a hearing and an answer once for all. But she did not see that she need keep silent, and bring on a premature declaration—that she might not rather stave it off as long as possible. It was inconsistent, but it was the struggle between her girlish courage and girlish cowardice.

"I wish to go down and see Honor Smith," she said, ■ what sounded to him as the most extraordinary coincidence. "I used to know her long ago."

She succeeded in arresting for a moment the words which were trembling on his lips, and arousing his curiosity instead.

"Do you know Honor Smith?" he inquired in surprise. "She did me a bit of a service not long since; that ■ how I came ■ know her. How did it come about that you and she were acquainted?"

"Simply enough. I was living alone with my governess ■ Lambford. Grandmamma and grandpapa used to go a good deal about in those days, and I was always left at home with Miss Burrage. She was ■ good, kind woman, who tried to make me care for others, and she began with little girls like myself. The Rector told us of a child, a few years older than I was, who had fallen down a bank and broken her arm. She had no mother or female relative, she was lying alone, only taken care of by her father and brother, when they were at home, over ■ the cottage at Hawley Scrub. Miss Burrage took me there several times, and we did what we could for poor Honor. When she was well again she used ■ bring me presents of wild flowers, blackberries, and nuts and birds' eggs for years afterwards, till grandmamma put a stop to it. She says people did not run in and out of cottages and have such acquaintances when she was young. I am afraid she had heard something to the disadvantage of Honor and her family."

"Just so," said Sir William with his impenetrable manner. "But you have no horror of poor common people and their ways?"

"Horror!" exclaimed Iris, a little taken aback, "I should hope not. Neither is grandmamma horrified, but she thinks the social line between the classes should be strictly drawn. 'They were so, long ago,' she ended a little nervously, with a consideration for his organ.

"Then why did she open her doors to me?" he startled her by asking a little sarcastically. "I beg your pardon," he added immediately with a softened manner. "What although it was because I had come into my own, and was master of Whitehills here, since I do not believe you would have made the same distinction—I do not mean that I do not know what was fitting for the likes of you—but at least you could keep company with Honor Smith and not forget what was due either to her or to yourself. You two were friends. It is what I should have expected from you."

She was saved from the necessity of saying anything further. The two had been walking fast, and Honor had made such progress with her work that she was turning over and spreading the swathes of grass close to the park wall, while the rest ■ the hay-makers were several paces behind.

"I have brought a young lady to see you,

Honor," he said, with an eager pride which hurt Iris. "She says that she does not want an introduction, for you and she were thick together when you were children."

"Miss Compton is very kind," said Honor with some pleasure in her face and voice. At the same time she looked sharply at the two, and she stepped back, idly moving the bay with her foot, instead of drawing nearer. "It is a power of years since we were acquainted," she added with growing reserve, "and I have not had any other friend of the kind, so that we have fallen out of knowledge like, and it don't seem worth while to take up the past and begin to build upon it."

"Nonsense!" said Sir William bluntly.

"I am not surprised that you should think so, Honor," said Iris, a little pained nevertheless, "but I could not help our old friend ship being stopped—it was always pleasant to me. After Miss Burrage left—you remember Miss Burrage, and how she could put your bandages right, and knew exactly what you would like to eat and drink?—I was as lonely a girl as you were, perhaps lonelier, for I had neither father nor brother. You may see and believe I have not forgotten you."

"Oh, don't go for to heed what I say, miss!" burst out Honor with shame and contrition. "I have run clean wild, as the other women among the workers will tell you. I am as bad as the women who put in druggins, or get into the Queen's ships in Jack Jar's clothes, and are only found out when they are dead or dying. It would be a jolly lark, and I think I could die game. But I am speaking to a delicate young lady as was good to me when I was sick and little, and I might speak what would suit her ears better. I am glad to have seen and spoken with you again, Miss Compton, and I wish you all the happiness you deserve," she said a little formally, and glanced doubtfully at Sir William.

"Faith, you're in a queer humour, Honor," said Sir William discontentedly. "I never heard that you set up for a rowdy or a gipsy."

"You don't know me yet, Sir William," answered Honor curtly.

"Is it true, Honor, that you and your father are going to cross the sea?" inquired Iris. "If so, will you let me wish you all the freedom you like, and all the prosperity you can meet with out there? Some day we may hear of you as successful settlers who have not feared privations, and who have held the last of the Red Indians at bay."

Honor looked up with a brighter face. "Yes, you may. That's a good wish, then are kind words." Then a shade of solemnness fell again across her face, and she bent her head over her work and began anew to exert her entire energies in drawing together and shaking out the bay, as if she would put an end to the conversation. "It is the best that can happen to me, since I've missed what the likes of you might have made of me," she said again with bitterness.

Iris attempted no rejoinder, no fresh reminder that she had been without power to act otherwise than she had done. She stood silent for a moment, at last she turned back with Sir William strolling by her side. "I never thought Honor Smith would grow into a woman like this," Iris said regretfully. "She was such a bright, warm-hearted girl."

"You see," he said awkwardly in his agitation, "she missed her great good, and how am I ever to ask it for myself—that you will take me and make me something better than I am, better than anything I have ever thought of?"

"Don't speak so, Sir William," she begged him low, but with the utmost earnestness of entreaty. "Indeed, I wish you and every human being well, but you are asking what I cannot give. No human being is able to aid another in the way you seem to think. You can be a good man—the best of men if you will, with God helping you. You do not need to ask a girl like me, or the mightiest power on earth, to help you."

"But you may do what you can to help me," he urged. "You may make me a happy or miserable man, Miss Compton. Do you know the difference between the two? You may make this place a blessing or a curse to me, and perhaps to more than me. I know, none better, how terribly far I am from you—what a tremendous favour I am asking, but if you could bring yourself to grant it, there is nothing I can imagine that I would not do to pleasure you—to make you as happy as a queen. My sister—I had a sister once who did not think so badly of me—said she believed I could make any woman happy if I tried. That was rank folly, and because she was rare fond of me, for I was her lad, whom she had mothered for many a year. But, Miss Compton, there's nothing I would not try."

"Oh, don't say that again!" besought Iris in her pain. "I believe you, but I never thought it had gone so far as this. If I had only known—if I could have done anything to prevent it!"

"Did you not know? Could you not guess?" he asked wistfully, with a little resentment stealing into his tones. "I dare say I could not put it to you—could not make you understand as a man like yourself could have done, and I was a coward when I feared ■ scare or offend you. Your grandmother knew almost from the first. She gave me encouragement, she said plainly I had her consent, or I might not have presumed."

"Don't talk of presumption," she protested. "Only think how you are wasting your regard! Call up your pride, and don't waste your—your liking for me any longer. You have a right—every man has a right to ask a return for what he gives, or to take it back without letting it lie unacknowledged and unaccepted—I don't say spurned—no girl with a heart in her breast would spurn such an offering, unless it were forced upon her."

"In time she might stoop and pick ■ up," he said quickly.

"Oh, no, not if there were such unlikeness and such unsuitability as exist here. She would be very sorry that such an idea had ever entered into a man's head, but she must be firm when truth and happiness were at stake."

"I truth!" he repeated passionately. "I love you true as the heaven above us. Happiness! I should be the happiest man the world ever saw if you but said, 'Will Thwaite, next year, or five or ten years hence, I will give a thought to what you said after the Whitehills' hay making—if you go on improving yourself nearer to a gentleman, you shall have your reward before you leave this world.'"

"But that is not the truth, and the happiness you imagine would be a short lived delusion." She persisted in words that she knew must cut deep, but so the operator has to use the knife if he will save the victim, and she was doing what she had to do with keen suffering to herself. "It is not only that we have been brought up quite differently, with other customs and standards, but that we have ■ little in common, which makes your notion that we could become close companions and fast friends, and be so happy together, incredible in its absurdity. I forgive me for saying so, but you will soon see it yourself, you will be conscious before long that you have only been carried away by a passing fancy for the first girl you saw after you came to Whitehills, who spoke as she felt, out of simple good-will. You will thank me, yes, I believe you will have to thank me for saving, not only myself, but you, from a great blunder and a life long disaster."

■ there anything to equal the fearless confidence even of the wisest, most modest young girl, when she thinks the path of duty lies plain before her, and that she has to follow it at whatever cost? The only parallel is the innocent, uncomprehending sincerity which may crush with the weight of lead the object on which it falls.

Sir William's ruddy colour faded, and he writhed under the blow inflicted by the usually kind, gentle hand, but he had still a man's spirit left in him to resent and deny his share of her inferences. "You are wrong, Miss Compton. I mean you are altogether and hugely wrong, where I have to do with what you say. I may be—since you will have it I am—a poor lout of a fellow, but I know this, that my love for you is not a light fancy, and that I shall never thank you for parting us, if so be you do part us—never, though I were to live a hundred lives!"

She sighed an impatient sigh. He had succeeded in stirring up in her that sense of personal affront with which she had first heard of his suit. She began again to feel indignant on her own account, as well as deeply hurt for him. She spoke, as it sounded to him, more mercilessly and cruelly than before, though she judged it a just and humane cruelty.

"And I cannot, now or ever, care for you as you wish, as you are entitled to ask of any girl, if you are justified in addressing her at all, as you have addressed me. I must say," continued Mrs. with a swelling heart, and her little head held higher than was its wont, "that I don't think you are justified in—in making love or proposing to me by anything that I have ever said or done. You are not entitled to draw down such a trial on me, whoever maybe in fault. But it has all been a wretched mistake, and it is better to forget it at once, and for ever, than ■ seek to apportion the share of blame to everybody concerned," she hurried on. "Sir William, you spoke of my stooping to pick up your regard—it is you who are stooping and degrading yourself, if you say another word to me on the subject, after what I have said to you—with real sorrow and shame, because I would not hurt any one if I could help it, because I believe you have been misled and have deceived yourself."

They were standing just within the gate in the path which led to the house. He turned round with face in a flame again, and hands which were clenched in desperation. He could not restrain himself, as a man differently constituted and differently trained might have done.

"Do you mean," he said slowly, "that nothing I can do will make any difference, that you will never look on me as a lover or a husband? That not only I don't take your fancy now, but that you will let some other man take ■ and welcome, and hold yourself free from any wrong done ■ me? But that is not all you think I have wronged you by telling you, with my lady's permission, that I love you as I love my life, that I have loved you from the first moment I ever saw you. You will hold me a mean rascal, a low dog, if I demean myself further to cringe and beseech you for what you have said I can never get."

"Yes," said Iris faintly, "that is in some sort my meaning."

"Then don't be frightened, Miss Compton. I won't demean myself—you have heard the last of the story. You have done with me, and I hope you may never repent having stripped life of all it held sweet, even ■ your greatest inferior, a beggar who began life in the gutter and was the blackguard of the barrack yard. I hope you'll never be sorry—if women have any pity in their breasts—for sending him back to where he came from, with ten devils, instead of one, to bear him company."

He was breaking from her abruptly, when the most inappropriate interruption stopped him.

Refreshments had been sent out to the hay makers—an ample and choice store of meat and drink—by the orders of a man with a full heart, who had let himself be duped into thinking that the day was to bring him blessedness, either in sure prospect or in fulfilment. The company who were about to enjoy their feast had seen the squire in the hay-field again with a young lady, and afterwards standing in conversation with her just inside the park gate. The best-mannered were struck with the opportunity of thanking him, and according to immemorial precedent, drinking his health. But they were too bashful to intrude on him and his companion in a body. They deputed the oldest apple-cheeked man in the greenest stained smock-frock to cross the field with his body bent and his knotted hands clasping a mug of ale, as if it contained the elixir vite. He was to act as proxy for the others, and express their general gratitude and satisfaction.

"An' it please you, squire," he suddenly wheezed, turning up on the other side of the gate, and relieving the tension of his mind by leaning on it, and resting his mug on the top bar, "I have come to say that we're greatly obligated for the wittles and we're a drinking of your very good health." He paused a minute and then gave voice to a happy original thought, which had slowly dawned on his mind as he was crossing the field, "And we'll add the young lady's very good health, and long life and happiness to you both."

At this ill-timed union of healths, with the inference conveyed, poor Sir William's last shred of endurance and composure gave way.

"Get off with you and your tom foolery," he cried, dealing the gate such a rough push that he sent the old deputy staggering a few paces. He still clasped the mug, though its contents had been dashed in his face and spilt all over the ground, leaving him usefully staring, so far as his wet eye-lashes would let him, at the empty bottom of the vessel.

Iris shrunk back, shocked at the unseemly outbreak. The next moment she flung open the gate, went out, begged the old man's pardon, and pressed upon him her slight arm to lean upon, till he had recovered his footing. Then he pulled out his cotton handkerchief and mopped his face, and shaking his head, began, in spite of the repulse he had sustained and the disconsolateness which followed, to make rapid way on his return to his discomfited companions.

Sir William had started off in another direction. There was no more thought of showing her the lilies which she had resembled, with their white cups rocking tranquilly on their green leaves. Some of her fellow visitors were appearing at the end of the side path. Discomposed as she was, she saw that her best plan was to join them and pass in with them unperceived, if possible, to the drawing-room where Lady Ferner was waiting for her, and where Iris might say good-bye to Lady Thwaite before the party left. So many petty, yet useful obligations, belonging to a long code of social rules, held Iris bound to self-restraint and courtesy. But poor Sir William, like a half-savage, did not see why, when a tempest of misery had swept over him, when what of rank and social importance he possessed had become a second time utterly embattered to him, he should grin and bear it. He was furious with the sense of being befooled. He was stung to the quick by Iris Compton's absolute, wrathful rejection of him. Why should he go back and bow before a pack of fine people who did not care a straw for Will Thwaite? They would, if they knew all, turn their straight backs upon him in righteous indignation, and shun, as they would flee the plague, the most distant association with a drunken brute who had lain under the sentence of the lash. They only noticed him and came to his house in their ignorance, because he was the reaster of Whitehills, and bore the title of Sir William, and was willing to treat his betters according to their idle fancies.

Long after Iris had accomplished successfully her unnoticed return to the drawing-room, so that even Lady Fermor did not observe where her grand-daughter sat among a group near one of the doors, there was a murmur, rising as loud as politeness would permit, for Sir William. Where had he gone? Was anybody responsible for his absence? Why did he desert his post and his guests? Here was a hitch in the simple ceremonies; here was a hole in this gentleman's coat which he did not button round him so tightly, that the coarse jacket of the free-and-easy working man failed to peep through. Must the company go without taking leave of their host, without starting with his last greetings ringing in their ears?

Lady Fermor was craning her neck and defying a draught in order to look out and find what had become of Sir William and Iris. For a wonder the old lady said nothing. All at once she discovered him in the hay-field and detected Iris at the farther end of the room. Still she said nothing, but she squared the fleshless jaw of which age had revealed the massive bony outline—the most conspicuous feature except the eyes, in the face which had otherwise shrunk and withered into a mummy-like representation of its former buxom self. That squaring of the heavy jaw, with a bending of the furrowed white brows, set on Lady Fermor's face the seal, not of a frown but of a scowl, which few people cared to encounter. She continued to screw her eyes and her glass on the hay-field. The hay-makers had eaten through their meal not the less resolutely, though a little less jovially, because of the rough reception their messenger had met with. But one appetite had failed, and that belonged to Honor Smith. She played with her food and showed herself perplexed, if not put out.

At the end of the meal, the feasters began to show that it was time for them to betray a lurking, lingering resentment of the squire's behaviour. They had polished the bones of a jolly good supper, roast and boiled, whole sides of bacon, pancakes and apple dumplings, with plenty of ale to wash them down. They had nothing to complain of on that score. Everything had been as handsome as at a harvest thanksgiving, or a Christmas dinner, with no call to go to church if not inclined, or to listen to the parson preaching at them out of his pulpit. All the same they did not like their best thanks and good wishes to be trampled upon—leastways, knocked to the ground. Martin Weeks had not been in his working clothes, his best coat and waistcoat would have been next to ruined. Ale stains were not so easily rubbed out. Some squires they knew brought to mind the old saw about beggars and porters. Tottle ways were not the ways for a squire. Sukey Vass knew a man as were a tottler and the water went to the brain and killed him, same as he had been a babby.

"You are a graceless, wooden-headed crew!" cried Honor Smith, starting to her feet and speaking loudly and shrilly, among the half-servile growling and muttering, "to eat a man's bread and wag your tongues against him with the morsel still between your teeth or half-way down your throats! Can't you tell for yourselves, sunmat has taken a rise out of the squire since the afternoon? He ain't himself. Do none of you never fly into a rage, and sling about the chairs and tables, when you dunno whether your head or your heels is uppermost?"

"A man with a second crop of hay like this here, which he has gotten the whole field in cocks, and the clouds still holding up, has little call to go into a rage," pronounced a ruined farmer in a tone of oracular condemnation.

How Honor's interference might have been taken, and whether she might not have provoked disagreeable reprisals, remained unproven, for the squire himself was desecrated walking towards his hay-makers. He did look, in spite of his good clothes and his soldierly air, disordered and not himself, as Honor had said.

"Good night," he said to the people gruffly. "You have had a long day's work, and the hay is safe. I ought to thank you as well as pay you. Will that make amends for anything I've said or done amiss? Look here: surely you need not mind what a fellow from the ranks without manners, like yourselves, says or does against the grain. Have you grown so nice as to weigh words and looks like the high and mighty folk up yonder?" indicating the house with a jerk of his elbow.

He did not wait for an answer; he drew Honor Smith aside, and said something which caused her to stare and redden, though she was not given to blushing. His words were, "I'll be rid of the plaguey lot presently, Honor, and, remember, I'm coming over ■ you for comfort I'm as dead beat as the hardest worker among you—as I ever was in India. Make haste home, or I'll reach Hawley Scrub before you. I've something to say to you and your father that may stop your voyage across the seas."

Lady Fermor was looking through the trees at the hay field, at the dispersing hay makers, and at a couple standing for a moment apart from the others. Her familiar spunt, Major Pollock, was at her elbow. He looked the incarnation of malice as he showed his teeth in a grinning snarl. Generally his mistress kept him well in hand, but he could not resist so fine a chance of retaliation. "Strapping gipsy, as black and red, eh? my lady? Curious how the most refined tastes will wander, but when it is a case of 'like draws to like,' I should say the game is up. What will you wager that the future mistress of Whitchilla is not standing yonder? Exceedingly romantic, though low all round. A misfortune for the county, a shocking scandal, but not so very surprising after all, if you measure the merits and antecedents of the matter of the place. Looks like it, from this abominable forsaking of his company, and flaunting the rival attraction in our very faces."

"Pollock, I should never speak to you again," the enraged old lady turned on him, "if it were not to show you what a fool you are, and what an idiotic error your slanderous tongue is leading you into. That girl pulled Sir William Thwaite out of a pond at the risk of her own life. He told me so himself. Man, are you worse than a beast, that you cannot understand common gratitude?"

"Common gratitude is sometimes an uncommonly deceitful and dangerous commodity, particularly when it leads a man and woman in different grades of life, nowadays at least, to strike up a friendship. But, of course, I stand corrected before your ladyship's superior information." Major Pollock bowed with mockery in his bow, but still with an appearance of submission.

Carriages and horses were being driven and led backwards and forwards along the sweep before Sir William came into the drawing room again. He made no apology for his protracted absence, but said, in what sounded like a general leave-taking, "Ladies and gentlemen, I hope you have enjoyed yourselves." There was a change in his tone, which a subtle student of human nature might have detected and puzzled over. The earnest desire to play his part well, the anxiety to please in certain quarters, which had weighed upon him, had disappeared. He moved more freely, almost with a defiant swagger, while he spoke rather in grim banter than in cheerful hope.

"Thwaite, what have you been making of yourself?" cried Lady Fermor, peevishly, as if she had a right to call him to order, and to claim a compensation.

But he did not accord to her the slight atonement he had made to his working-people. "Nothing," he answered laconically, "except that I found something to keep me outside." He took her down in silence to her carriage and put her in, allowing Ludovic Acton to hand in Iris and Lucy. "Good-bye, Lady Fermor," said the host, standing orthodoxly enough, bare-headed on the door steps, but going on to speak, with an odd emphasis, words which the occasion hardly seemed to require. "I am indebted to you for all you have done for me. Good bye, Miss Compton." He forgot to speak to Lucy.

"Mercy on us, man! you are not taking farewell of us for ever," Lady Fermor was moved to ejaculate, "we shall see you to-morrow, if you do not walk over, in the course of the evening, to inquire whether my old bones are no worse of your hay field and of the late hours last night."

"Excuse me, my lady—I am bespoken elsewhere," he said, but his words were drowned in the roll of the wheels.

Lady Fermor sat on the same side as Iris. "Something is up," the old woman mumbled in her grand-daughter's ear, "and I shall hear what you have to say on the subject, Miss Compton, the moment we get home."

Iris had no other thought than to tell her grandmother what had passed, severe as the ordeal was, she would go through with it. Indeed, she was not sure that it could be quite so bad as what she had undergone already that day. She had her share of the courage and steadfastness which make martyrs, but she could not speak before Lucy, though she sympathized with all her might in what she guessed of the circumstances. Lucy would even have annihilated herself, or jumped out and walked home under the last hazily hot beams which the sun, low in the sky, sent out over the pastures and ponds of Eastwich.

Iris sat and tried to be brave for what lay before her, while her mind went back with painful pertinacity, and rehearsed word for word the scene in which she had figured. How unreasonable he had been! How presumptuous! Yes, she must say it again, how violent! But there was one thing he had never once mentioned Whitehills as an inducement for her to change her mind. Lady Thwaite had brought his place and position prominently forward, and, no doubt, Lady Fermor would dwell upon them, but he had not done it. He had ranted egotistically about his misplaced passion, but he had not shown a trace of mercenaryness, in this respect he had displayed the spirit of a gentleman.

Iris thought this with a little softening in her wholesale condemnation—even as she was making up her mind that she had seen the last of Whitehills for a long time—at least until Sir William had found another girl whom he would be more justified in addressing, who did not mind his ignorance or rusticity, or who balanced against them the fine old manor house, the noble trees in the park there, the position in county society, with, perhaps, the additional bribe of persons in towns, opera boxes and routs ad infinitum.

Iris did not wait for Lady Fermor to bid the girl follow her grandmother to her dressing room, where Iris had gone as a little child to receive her deserts whenever she was in disgrace, her prompt anticipation of Lady Fermor's commands on this occasion had some effect in calming down her judge.

Lady Fermor threw herself into an arm chair, untied her bonnet strings, and asked, with more self-restraint than might have been expected, "What is the meaning of all this, Iris? What have you been about?"

"Sir William Thwaite asked me to marry him, grandmamma, when we went out together, and of course I had to refuse him," said Iris with dry lips, but without hesitation, without sobbing breath or wailing tears.

The information, together with the manner in which it was conveyed, struck Lady Fermor dumb, for an instant she sat glaring rather than staring at Iris, and tapping the arm of her chair. Lady Fermor could storm against weakness, she could meet violence with violence, but simple firmness which, as she knew by experience, might prove inflexibility, tried her to the utmost and well nigh got the better of her. "Then all I have to tell you," she said at last, speaking nearly as quietly as Iris had spoken, "is that you are even sillier and more stupid and full of conceit, than girls in general. I have done the best I could, and found an excellent match for you. There is not a mother far or near that would not be pleased to establish her daughter at Whitehills, and Sir William is a good, honest young fellow, who might make any right-minded, reasonable creature happy."

"But grandmamma," interposed Iris in vain.

"Girl," the old woman put her down, "you knew the world, you would understand what he is worth. He is fond of you, which is a deal more than you deserve, but there is no accounting for men's tastes. I have tried to do better for you than I was able to do for your mother, and you have done what you could to thwart me. Do you not believe me, that you are not every man's bargain? Few good sort of men, as you described Thwaite the first time you saw him, would care to seek you, because you are come of people who were no more sale than they were snags."

"I—I don't wish to marry," stammered Iris.

"Hold your tongue," cried Lady Fermor. "You will suffer for your folly, and you need not look to me for assistance. You are entirely dependent on me and your grandfather, your precious father managed to run through his means and did not leave you a penny. We have cared for you nearly all your life, and I must say you are rewarding us well. You have been ungrateful and disobedient, and you have disappointed me thoroughly, though I can't say I ever had much hope of you. I don't put my faith to cant and goody-goodness which you were so quick to learn from that fanatic Burrage. But I have not done with you yet, Miss Compton, only Tom Mildmay and his wife are waiting for dinner, and I must go down and keep them in countenance. Girl, if it had only been to snap my fingers in their faces, and take my place in the county before them, you might have consented to please me and make a good fellow happy, but you don't deserve the luck you have thrown away, and he is worth a dozen of you."

Iris knew it would only increase her offence to attempt to answer Lady Fermor further. After the day's tribulations she was still fain—even without Lucy's encouraging assurances—to cling to the impression that she had got off more easily than she could have dared to look for, and that Lady Fermor would have done with her grand-daughter from that night, so far as Sir William Thwaite's egregious blunder was concerned. The girl could not guess how little her grandmother cared for one girlish refusal, or a dozen girlish refusals, if she could put the gentleman on the brick and coax him to come on again, and yet again, until, by mingled wearing insistence and harsh persecution, she might sap the foundations of conscience and inclination, and force the rebel to yield.

CHAPTER XIX—"ONE WAS FAR AWAY, AND ONE WAS NEAR."

THE sunset still made red bars above the full green of Hawley Scrub, when Sir William kept his appointment with Honor Smith.

Abe was from home, only Honor had sat up for a little time by the dilapidated and dirty lattice window. The absence of any glow from the hearth served to increase the cheerlessness of the neglected house place. But the coo of the cushet dove came in from the scrub, and some woodruffe which Honor was drying, not without a likelihood of its being left to rot on the window sill, filled the place with an odour that, in its sweet fragrance, has always a scent of decay. It seems to belong more to old memories, dead hopes and graves with the paths to them no longer trodden by lingering feet, than to the living fragrance of budding desires and happy expectations.

Honor was weary with a day's work, as foreign to her as if she had been a lady, though she was strong with the strength of a fine physique and an open air life. She was a picturesque, but not a home like figure, as she sat there in the gathering dusk with her brown fingers interlaced and her head, still covered by the red handkerchief which had shaded her from the sun, thrown back against the window frame, catching the last rays of light. She was in a quandary, as she would have said.

"Whatever does he want here?" she asked herself, bewildered, "he is not the man to come on a hang dog errand, and I am not the woman to whom he would come in that case. Whatever else I've been, I've been true to poor Hughie. How long it seems since I seduced him last, lying a-dying in quod at Birckett! I'm afraid I'm forgetting the very lines of his comely young face. But no man as knows me would liken me to a light lass, any more than he would liken the most delicate lady in the land. What is there between him and Miss Courtenay? What can there be save his lands and the Sir before his name? and she ain't the one to sell herself, not if I know her. If any one said I done it, I would be rate mad. Father said Squire were a kind of gentleman in his way—all the same, Sir William was reared a working man, and it do come out in him and pulls him down to his natural level. Some rises above it, sure and certain, like Uncle Sam, but then they raise themselves by their own struggles and by slow degrees, learning as they go, and ain't tossed up as with a pitchfork and left to come to grief, like a larch tree in a hot-house, or a living hare in a house place, or a swallow in a cage."

Sir William walked past the window as she spoke, and entered by the open door without the ceremony of knocking. His first actions were to toss his hat on the table, and to pull off his coat and fling it over the back of a chair. His first words were—

"There, I'm rid of them, like some other fine things that wac not for me, and were not all gold though they glittered."

He stretched out his arms in his shirt-sleeves, and then throwing himself down in a chair, rested them on the table before him, and leant his head upon his hands.

"Does aught ail you, Sir William?" she asked with genuine anxiety, "there is always gin or rum in the house. I know you don't taste drink as a rule, but when you are overdone and would be the better for a glass, wouldn't you have it? Just say the word."

"No," he said, looking up with a haggard face, "don't ask me. Do you know, Honor, the last little straw between me and drowning in the lowest depths of sin and misery is that I swore drink, at the word of a dying woman. But I'm not ill or in trouble—at least, I'm going to turn over a new leaf, and be all right after to-night. I am glad your father is out."

"Why so, sir?" inquired Honor, a little coldly.

"Don't 'ask' me," he forbade her hastily.

"But how can that be, when you are Sir William, and our squire and master?" she demanded with a startled laugh.

"I ain't Sir William to you—anyhow. I don't want to be so any more, and if I continue your master, it is only on the understanding that you be my mistress. Honor, I'm glad your father is out, because I want to tell you all about myself—a poor subject," he broke off with a bitter laugh.

"If you are in a story-telling humour, I ain't the one to balk it," said Honor, dying to hear what he had got to tell.

He started at once, as if eager to begin, describing his early days and the shifts his sister Jen had made ■ provide for their needs—details very patent to Honor's comprehension. He went on to his youthful outbreaks, not extenuating or omitting a single particular of his enlisting, his successful career as a soldier in India, marred by his habits of dissipation and wild recklessness, and his last outrage against military discipline till he lay in the cell awaiting the sentence of the lash.

"Oh! poor lad, poor lad! This was worse even than my Hughie's fate," cried Honor, moved ■ the depths of her soul by what she could so well understand. For getting the difference of rank she put her hand on his shoulder and began to stroke his arm.

He looked up ■ her, with his face wan from the strain of the last twenty-four hours, and the agony of the associations he had been recalling.

"So you pity me, Honor, after you have heard nigh hand the worst, for my sister Jen died and then her husband hanged himself. You ain't shocked past looking on me as a fellow creature."

"Shocked! what should I be shocked at? I could cry my eyes out for you, if that would do you any good."

"I know," he said softly, "and you are the woman for me, the woman who knows all, and yet does not cast me off, and treat me as dirt beneath her feet."

"Who cast you off, Sir William?" Honor inquired point blank, without any of the restraining delicacy that might have shut her mouth, had she been a woman of a different temper and rearing.

"Never mind," he said, flushing hotly, "and didn't I tell you not ■ call me Sir William any more? Say, Will I thwate, I will marry you and help you to bear your burden. We'll go our own way and be happy in our own fashion. We'll cast care to the winds and not waste a thought on our betters, or suffer them to lay a little finger on our lot."

He spoke excitedly and a little wildly, though he had not been drinking.

She sat and stared at him, not able to believe her ears, ■ this instantaneous and wonderful solution of the riddle she had been trying to read.

"Are you in earnest?" she asked breathlessly.

"In earnest! What do you take me for? I have spoken my whole mind—made a clean breast of it for the first time these many months and, by George! I feel as if I could breathe freely and be a man again, and not a mountebank and puppet. Will you not make my freedom and happiness complete by coming to me, Honor, and letting me know I've a real friend—one that knows me—all about me, and looks over all that's sorely amiss in me, all I lack, and all I've done wrong, and cares for me in spite of all?"

He spoke with eager passion as if he had no other desire, and it was true that making a clean breast of it, as ■ called it, had been an immense relief to him. For he had been a man naturally open as the day, on whom the unaccustomed reticence of the last period of his life had hung with the dead weight of iron fetters. He was also a man who, as a matter of temperament, craved sympathy, to whom a woman's immeasurable tenderness had once been so familiar, that he had lived surrounded by it, without thinking of it, but, when lost, it was for ever missed.

She sat dazzled. What! could she be the mistress of Whitehills at a word? But it was not of the grand house, and servants at her call, of soft living, fine clothes, and being a titled lady, that she thought first and most. The attractions which would have been all powerful with most poor girls did not lay hold of her to any great extent. It was to be the mistress through him who was their master—the man that thus addressed her—of the lands and the woods where she had ranged on sufferance or in secret, of the wild creatures that had been her solace and her prey, to come and go when she liked and how she liked, to defy the upper keepers and have her father do the same—these were the ideas which took possession of her.

It was on second thoughts that she considered she would be regarded with mingled consternation, admiration, and lively envy by everybody she knew—the colony at the quannies, her mother's people with whom she had kept company, and the field-workers, who had so lately held her at arms' length.

Neither was the man himself distasteful to her. She had the liking for him that many persons—women especially—entertain for those they have happened to succour.

His tale had filled her with a tumult of fellow feeling and pity, for just so had the poor lad to whom her heart had been given in early girlhood been set upon, driven to stand at bay, and then forced to pay the penalty to the utmost tittle of the law. And while, as she had been saying to herself within the hour, Hughie Guild's lineaments were waxing dim in a memory which had long been faithful to him, the comely features of another—the manly figure on which she set such store, the soldierly carriage (reminiscent of the great man of her family, Uncle Sam), the waves of chestnut hair, the ruddy colour, the smile she could call forth, which was able to brighten indescribably what had perplexed her in the gravity, almost sombreness, of Sir William Thwaite's face—were all now taking her fancy and knocking at her heart.

Her indignant spirit, which from the date of Hughie Guild's cruel death had set womanly rules and household restraints at defiance, was in sympathy with his spirit when he threatened to turn upon the class into which he had been grafted and shake off its yoke. Her nature, run wild, was yet full of esprit de corps and class prejudices, which disposed her to war with the upper ranks generally, while her lawlessness also inclined her to strive with her very fellows, nay, with herself and him when the time came.

It would be the best game she had ever played, for her and "Will Thwaite" to set up Liberty Hall at Whitehills. The temptation to answer "Yes" to Sir William's question was strong, and growing stronger every instant while she hesitated. But to Honor Smith's credit she made a stand. "What about Miss Compton?" she said suspiciously, watching him closely. "This be'n't in keeping with your walking about the hayfield, your two selves, and speaking to me, like you were the friends and sweethearts as folk would have it you were. I shan't speak another word till you tell me the right-down truth about Miss Compton. Her ain't saucy, nor do she take up poor folk like playthings or babbies, to pass away the time and be taught by her wisdom, as if hard times weren't a mighty sight powerfuller teachers than fine ladies and rectors' wives and daughters. But her's real good, and were rare kind to me long ago, and though all that soon came to an end, it were none of her fault. She's a deal nearer heaven, I guess, than the likes of me, or maybe you either. Yet if you have been sweet upon her, and she have but looked on you ■ listen to you—though knowing summat of you both, I'm free to confess," owned Honor candidly, "I do not see as how that could be—still, if them words you have spoken ain't no more than the outcome of some quarrel between you two, I tell you, lad, I don't want ■ listen to a fellow mad with rage and jealousy. I shan't come between you. Go and make it up with the fine young lady, and let me be. I'll forget your words before you're out of the door. I'm none to set on a man, or on being Lady Thwaite," she said, with a toss ■ her head, "that I should bear them in mind and plague you for your hasty folly."

"You're all out, Honor," he answered, with a loud laugh, "except in not being able to see how metal and clay couldn't mix together. Miss Compton would no more quarrel with me than she would quarrel with the servant at the back of her chair." he ground his teeth as he made the illustration. "Her single word with him would be to dismiss him from her presence and forbid him ever to enter it again. So you see, though she may be good—I would be lying like a trooper if I pretended she were not good—she ain't good to me. I'll never speak to her again while we live. I tell you I have done with the whole small fry of ladies and gentlemen to which she was the single creature worth a sigh. What is the use of a man's succeeding to land and money if he cannot please himself? I have found out that ■ list, and if you and Abe won't have me, Honor, I don't know what is ■ become of me. Perhaps, as nobody wants me, I had better put a bullet through my head, and have done with it all, at once."

"Not so fast as that, Will, and who says as nobody wants you? I want you, and I'll do my best to make up to you, and be a good wife, as I would have been to poor Hughie. You have heard of Hughie Guild? I be'n't a bit ashamed of Hughie, not at this moment, when I seems to be giving up the last thought of him," she went on, with a flash of her eyes and a swell of her fine throat. "I ain't going to hide what him and me were to each other, when we walked out on the long summer nights, and met for a word in the frosty winter mornings, and my heart was tender and trusty, like his'n. Oh! I doubt I was better worth looking ■ and speaking to both, in them far off days, than I am now," she exclaimed wistfully, with a glance at the black gown she still wore for Hughie, and a twitch at one of the ends of the red handkerchief. Then she struck a chord in perfect harmony with his mood, "I don't want to have secrets from you."

"You're right there," ■ said with emphasis. "We've done with secrets for ever, and there shan't stand one between you and me." He clasped her hands and drew her unresisting towards him. "I tell you, Honor, ■ thought I should have died, or burst out crying, and shouting aloud my story, with an adder's nest of secrets in my breast stinging night and day. Now ■ will go hard with us, my lass, if we can't be enough for ourselves and have a jolly good time while it lasts. We're young and strong and have a liking for each other. Let your Hughie sleep, he's the best off after all, I'll not rake him up, and you'll not cast Nibbipoor in my teeth, though you have heard all about it. We're quits and we're equals; only, I take it, you are made of kinder and truer stuff than I. A woman that ain't bad, or that ain't akin to the angels—when her very goodness robs her of earthly feelings—has more heart than a man for the most part. I know you've been a trifle wild on moonlight nights and misty mornings with the snuffs, ay, and the guns, among my buds and harts, mme—do you hear, Honor? I could have you up before the justices, before Mr. Holks, who called him self my friend the other night. You'll have to be mortal kind and give me all my own way to keep me from taking the law on you. And what about the wild ducks that flew over from Musty Down? Have you been seeking their eggs lately, or are the nests flown? They are all yours now, every bird and beast, bush and sunow. You and your father will have to keep my preserves, in good faith, when neither him nor you will ever need to pouch on them or any other again."

"It is handsome in you to put it in that way," said Honor frankly. Then she added, after a moment's reflection, with an echo both of humour and sadness in her tone, "But I doubt half the fun will be gone."

Old Abe started in to be dumbfounded by the most astounding tale that ever shook the nerves of keeper or squires. The agonie, Sir William, was going to marry straight away without either compunction, commotion, or concealment, the daughter of his servant, the least reputable of his servants, the under-keeper, suspected of being in league with the poachers—this strapping randy of a daughter, the brute elect, who was all but the widow of a young poacher that had died in gaol, and had been an active sharer in her father's misdeeds.

"It ain't ■ be believed," cried Abe, though the incredible tale was to the marvelous exaltation of himself and his family. "It can't be, who ever heard tell of such a marriage?"

"Why ■ was the very marriage made by my great grandfather, Abe, or I should not have been here," said Sir William, laughing.

"No, no, he weren't the head of the house or like to be, only one of a litter of young puppies. And the keeper as he connected himself with," continued Abe modestly, "was the head keeper on the estate, like Waterpark, a man of substance in his line, sought after and employed by other families, even after his daughter had got him into disgrace with the Thwaites. Old people did say he had got no other daughters, and that her that would be a lady had gone ■ school with the bailiff's daughter, was the beauty of them parts, washed her face in butter milk and saved her complexion like the finest lady of them all. Now my Hon ■ as brown as a gipsy, is no scholar, and knows more of guns and game bags, begging your honour's pardon, than of needles and pins."

"But if I prefer a brown gipsy and a brave woman that could save a man's life at a pinch—not that it was worth the perilling her own for—ain't it my own look out, old crusty boots?" argued Sir William with a rough good humour.

"You'll take your own way," said Abe resignedly, "but as an honest man I'm bound to say I can't see that Hon here, though she be't a bad daughter to me, is fit to be a grand lady. She ain't the cut of one, and all will come of such flying in the face of Providence. It were clean different that the Squire should befriend us because her picked her out of the water—she done it and no mistake—and he were welcome to come over and have a pipe, if not a glass, and a talk any night he pleased. Nobody could say nought again it, that were no more than nat'ral. But t'other ain't nat'ral. A most unlikely, unsuitable marriage is summit serious, and will lead to no end of rows, and bring the whole county-side down on us. I'm getting an old man—too old ■ have both gentile and simple down upon me, or ■ change my ways," sighed Abe, drawing out an old fist snuff box, taking snuff and sneezing a further remonstrance.

"Who's asking you ■ change your ways? and I ain't going to be a grand lady, you stupid, grumpy old father," cried Honor, who had taken and kept the upper hand of her father ever since her two brothers left the country. "It is Will Thwaite as is going ■ be a common man again, and suit husselt to the rest of us. Didn't I say the very first night we set eyes on him, that it were a fine thing—all the finer that it were as new as the first paving of the moor, to have a squeeze as were one of ourselves?"

"But I said he weren't none of ourselves, below the skin, and were never like to be," muttered Abe.

"And, ■ is just because I am head of the house, that I can do ■ I like, and marry whom I will—Honor if she will have me, to-morrow, or as soon as the banns can be put up. There's nought to wait for. We ain't going to have a flare up like—like some I've seen. We needn't call together a crowd of fools and flunkies ■ pity and laugh at us, though we'll do the thing in open day, we ain't ashamed ■ ourselves neither. You don't want ■ wait for fine clothes, do you, Honor, when I like you best as you sit there?"

"That's a pretty compliment," pronounced Honor impartially, "but you might have spared it, or kept ■ for another time. Will I don't care a straw for fine clothes. More than that, father and I ain't able to buy them. More than that again, I wouldn't take a gilt of a gown from you now, not though you went down on your bended knees, or swore never to see me more, if ■ be I refused your gifts. As father says, ■ were different when we were your servants to command, and you might spin down half a crown or a guinea for me, as your purse was full and your temper generous, in exchange for my washing your clothes or blacking your boots. But not a shilling of yours will I touch now—not till it is your right to give, and mine to take, Sir William Thwaite. That's settled between us, you ain't to come swaggering here and emptying your purse into my lap—not that I say you'd care to do it—mind, me and father knows you're a better gentleman than that comes to, a deal more of a gentleman than lots as have been brought up ■ the trade. I say, Will," Honor resumed suddenly after a moment's pause, with a doubtful, searching look in her great grey eyes, "I'm most afraid of that gentleman as is in you—whatever you got it, deep down, part of yourself, till death let it out—that ■ won't mate proper with the wild, rude woman, granting I've kept myself honest for Hughie's sake, that is in me. But ain't it a mercy," changing her tone with equal abruptness, to a crowd of congratulations this time, "that you have neither father nor mother nor nobody ■ make a stir and sunder us? You're your own master, though you are the Squire, as if you were one of our boys, Ted or young Abe, as always went in for pleasing themselves, when they were at home."

"Ay, you'll all please yourselves," said old Abe, throwing off the responsibility, as he was wont ■ do, and becoming naturally more and more reconciled to the honour that had come to him, in proportion as he recovered from his stunned incredulity, "you'll please yourselves and take the consequences, which will be a mighty promotion for Honor. I make bold to hope, likewise, it will ■ the keeping of this here tumble down cottage and my place, whatever stories Waterpark tells agin me, till my death, without my having to quit the old country."

"You'll get your choice, Abe," announced Sir William, with reckless prodigality, "your old quarters here or the best quarters with us at Whitehills."

"Father will stay here," said Honor decisively. "He would not ever be at home out of this hole, but I'll come and see him, and he'll come and see me, whenever we weary for each other's faces, shan't we, daddy?"

"I then, since it's all fixed, I'll go home," said Sir William, getting up and stretching himself again. "I'll be here to-morrow, of course, but to-night I'm dizzy like—dizzy with freedom from care, and content, Honor. I feel as if I had been standing on my head for half a year, but that will come right with a night's sleep everything will come right when I'm back in the part I'm fit for, that I know how to play as well as my neighbours—nobody can cast scorn upon me then."

Honor helped him on with his coat, nay, she convoyed him half the way back to Whitehills in the summer dusk, laughing ■ his questioning her whether she were not tired, scouting at the idea of her not liking to be out alone in the late twilight—not offending against the convenances, where there were none to be set at nought.

CHAPTER XX.—AN INTERVIEW.

SIR WILLIAM had to learn that, practically alone in the world as he was, he could not be suffered to please himself without somebody's interfering ■ prevent his run.

The first sign of the interference was to be detected in Lady Thwaite's driving over to Lambford in hot haste, within three days of the Whitehills hay-making, and begging to see Lady Fernor alone before luncheon, when there was security against other visitors.

Lady Thwaite need not have said "alone" in reference to her, who had not been accustomed to spend her mornings with her grandmother. But the Mildmays had stayed two days longer than had been anticipated—to suit their own convenience, Lady Fernor did not hesitate to remark—and Lady Thwaite was not sure that they were gone yet, when she sent in her card, with a corner turned down and a pencilled request to see Lady Fernor in her dressing-room.

"Show her up," had been the immediate rejoinder. "What's in the wind now?" Then she added, just out of the servant's hearing, "At least, I'll find out what has become of my sulking gentleman these last two days."

Lady Fermor's dressing-room was the cosiest room in Lambford, but it was also the dullest, with a deadly dullness to a stranger. It did not afford the slightest evidence that its mistress had a single taste or interest beyond her personal concerns and what went on in her own mind. There were no little groups of family miniatures or photographs above the chimney-piece, no washed-out, characteristic children's heads, reappearing in sketches in crayons of self-conscious boys and girls, and ending in portraits, in water colours or oils, of mature men and women. There were no books and no work. Lady Fermor read the newspapers, but nothing else, and she never worked. She sat with her shrivelled, bony hands in her lap, and went over her own thoughts, often busying herself with the scenes and people of the past. One might have thought the process in this case would hardly have been pleasant. But, pleasant or unpleasant, Lady Fermor was equal to it. She preferred her own identity to that of any other person, and reviewed the events of her earlier life without shrinking, simply because they had belonged to her life, and so had always possessed keen rebuke of some kind for her.

Summer and winter a brisk fire burned in Lady Fermor's dressing-room, the atmosphere of which was heavily laden with old Jockey Club scent, while there was no replenishment of oxygen from the closed windows. This little fact alone would have made a visit to its mistress in her den, on a sultry August morning, a trial to any person full of modern theories of health, and with fresh-air proclivities. But in addition Lady Fermor indulged in a habit of having every visitor she entertained shown to the warmest corner. It might have been an unconscious impulse of her old hospitality, as that was now the physical good she craved most, or it might have been a plan to shorten and prevent visits, at hours and in a region which she reserved for herself. Yet she had no occupation to be disturbed, and no practices to be hidden, unless that were the worst shawls and doudie that when nobody — not even Fermor or Hollock — could see them.

"What's in the wind, Lady Thwaite?" repeated Lady Fermor, without the smallest scruple, after the two had greeted each other, and the hostess had seen Lady Thwaite established in close proximity to the glowing embers in the grate.

Lady Thwaite did not seem to notice the fire, or the thunderstorm, which had come on at last, though it had only partially discharged its artillery, leaving the air close and oppressive. But it was no wonder that her fair complexion looked heated almost to blueness. She was come on a trying errand. She had debated with herself, over and over again, in driving along, whether she should not throw up the self-imposed commission and turn back.

"It is all the fault of this wicked old woman and that silly child Iris. Why should I put myself about to break the miserable catastrophe to Lady Fermor? She would not let him alone; she would take him away from his natural friends and protectors. If he had been left to my guidance—but, no; honestly I do not think I could have made anything of a man who has ended like this. I wish with all my heart I had gone abroad at once, after poor Sir John died, and remained away till I had some grounds to go on, with regard to the new man."

But wishes were even more unavailing for the past than for the future. Here was Lady Thwaite, sitting in the room that suffocated in Lady Fermor's dressing-room. She had taken upon herself a thankless task. She was indignantly conscious of her own innocence, and yet she dreaded to tell the winner the result of her machinations.

Lady Fermor, on the contrary, was coolly cracking her finger-joints, and asking what was in the wind. The next moment she behaved still more abominably. Having, unfortunately, established a "way" of saying with impunity what nobody else would have said, she proceeded to remark, with a most objectionably sardonic flavour in her objectionable jocularity, as if the explanation suggested were far removed from the list of possible events, "You ain't going to be married again, Lady Thwaite?"

"Good heavens, no!" cried poor Lady Thwaite, provoked out of her usual assured composure and seasoned agreeability. "Have you forgotten that Sir John is not yet a year dead? Everybody is not so——" she stopped in time.

"So fond of a second husband as I am." The terrible old woman took up the sentence without hesitation, and with a chuckle. "But you have only to try, very likely you will find, like me, that your second bargain is a great improvement on the first. If Fermor were ■ slip away now, who knows but I might venture on a third? Only I am too stiff to be troubled seeking another trousseau."

To do Lady Thwaite justice she shuddered. She did not even feel inclined, though she had dared, to retort, for she was a practical woman; and revenge would not relieve the awkward position in which she found herself, with the substantial losses it involved. ■ anything could yet be tried—she did not believe it would be of any avail—still everything ought to be tried to arrest such a calamity. Lady Thwaite was therefore content to say quietly, "The same example would scarcely suit us ■."

"But you are not altogether wrong," began the bringer of bad tidings. "It is a marriage I am come ■ announce, a dreadful marriage which calls for no congratulations."

Lady Fermor sat up in her chair with a little start. It might have been the tremor of age—however, her hands remained perfectly still, and she said nothing.

"Do you remember a woman in the byfield the other day?" proceeded Lady Thwaite falteringly.

"Who was the woman?" demanded Lady Fermor, with as much sharpness as if she had been an adverse counsel cross-examining a shrinking witness.

"A woman, not like the others, rather fine looking, in a coarse, masculine style. I think she wore a black gown and a red handkerchief shading her head."

"Yes!" snapped Lady Fermor, "go on."

"Do you remember Sir William's taking notice of her, and talking to her more than once? I think people observed it, though he did nothing very much out of the way."

"Well?"

"Their banns are given in ■ be published next Sunday," said Lady Thwaite, driven by her companion's manner to make haste and tell her tale in its naked simplicity.

"You are mad, Lady Thwaite, stark, staring mad!" cried Lady Fermor, rising to her feet, grasping the arms of her chair, while a thin pallid red came into her cadaverous face.

"I almost wish I were, for the moment," said Lady Thwaite, with a groan. "But it is too true, too disgracefully, ruinously true."

"And have you done nothing?" Lady Fermor broke out furiously, instinctively seeking the relief which a scapegoat affords. "Have you stood by and seen this scandal, this outrage against common sense and good feeling, and the propriety you are all so fond of talking about, take place before your very eyes?"

"What could I do?" Lady Thwaite remonstrated. "I am only the man's distant cousin by marriage. I never heard what was going ■ happen till, late last night, it came upon me like a thunderbolt—I had been led to expect something so very different. But I was in time to telegraph to Mr Miles, and he was down before breakfast this morning."

"And what does Miles say?"

"Not much," said Lady Thwaite, with an expressive shrug. She was beginning to recover a portion of her equanimity so as to object to being bowdled. She felt bound to treat the subject with more philosophic resignation than she had yet shown, nay, with a shade of the banter for which she was famous. "He owned that he was dreadfully disappointed, and that the ill advised step would make a complete wreck of his client's fortunes. All the same, I think Mr. Miles would have liked to have sworn at me for bungling him down, when the man was of age and his own master—an ignorant, untrained fellow, who could not be expected to stand opposition, even in his own interest, or to follow rational argument, whom contradiction would only make worse. There was nothing to be done, any tyro might have seen that. After the mess was made and so far advanced, where was the use of bringing an unfortunate lawyer or anybody else down from town, to render the business more hopeless, if that were possible? Sir William had not sent for him to draw out the settlements. I never saw Mr. Miles so cross, and nearly rude, though we are too old friends to count plain-speaking rudeness. He did see Sir William, however, but as Mr. Miles left for London by the next train, without coming back to me, I conclude nothing can be done."

"You're all as mad as Sir William," cried Lady Fermor, without softening her opinion. "The fellow ought ■ be taken away, and the woman shut up," speaking as if the primitive customs of centuries ago were still in full force, as if the power which old aristocrats had once wielded, unscrupulously enough on occasions, had never departed from their hands. "But I'll go to him, I'll let him hear a piece of my mind."

The resolution was what Lady Thwaite had half hoped for, as a last resort when it came to the point—while ■ tuned small expectation of the effort ■ ducing even the little delay which might yet be of the greatest moment—she ■ qualms at sending the aged woman, let ■ be ever so much ■ blame, alone into the breach on this breathless summer day.

Lady Thwaite could not accompany Lady Fernor. Indeed, the younger woman would not on any account have attended the elder on the expedition. After all, Sir William Thwaite, though he was Sir John's heir, was happily no relation of hers, but a remote and disowned kinsman of her late husband ■ was only an irregular skirmisher in the campaign of life, an odd alien from social laws, a woman who had never cared anything for public opinion, who could go to Sir William, and either in utter disregard of or in unblushing reference to what had been said, and ■ what had really taken place between him and Iris Compton, seek to stop his degrading, desperate marriage.

"I am afraid it will be too much for you, Lady Fernor," Lady Thwaite managed to say, as Lady Fernor was ringing for her maid, "try and think over it. At least, let Soames go with you. I am sure you do not know what a trying day it is. We shall have another storm immediately, and you may be caught in the rain, with the damp so bad for your rheumatic gout. Sir John had to avoid it carefully, and—oh, dear! I believe you have not taken your luncheon," lamented Lady Thwaite, fanning her hot face.

"Am I to sit here and eat a chop while a poor deluded young devil—excuse me, Lady Thwaite, but you aren't averse to plain speaking—a friend of my own, is on the brink of a precipice?" Lady Fernor asked scornfully. "That ■ not what I call friendship, and I have had a man friend or two in my day. It seems Soames thinks she may sit and guzzle whatever is up, but I'll teach the wot bet ter manners than to keep me waiting," ringing the bell ■ her elbow violently a second time in rapid succession.

Soames answered in haste, and her mistress, with a promise to give it to her woman hot and strong in some moment of leisure, dispatched the maid to collect wraps, and to send another servant to order the carriage.

"It seems all so unreal and shocking," said Lady Thwaite, feeling helpless for once in her life. Yet she was not averse to do more talking in the presence of the fiery zeal which could still blaze up in the shrunken veins of the woman of fourscore—the woman of another, more turbulent generation. "Of course it is in his blood," repeated Lady Thwaite, not without a recollection of her objection to Iris Compton for the taint in her blood, "and I have heard that the woman pulled him out of some ditch and saved his life. What was a great hulking fellow like him doing, dropping after the fashion of a stone into a pool of standing water, and suffering himself to be rescued by a woman—unless he did it on purpose—what was he good for if he could not take care of himself? Certainly, if he is not useful, he cannot be called ornamental. But if it had been some neat, pretty girl—dressmaker's assistant, or sewing maid, or head waitress in a restaurant, whose smartness and mock jewellery a man of low origin on the whole, and no education to speak of, might have mistaken for the real things—I could have understood it better, for such escandales, however deplorable, do happen, now and then, among people one knows. But a masculine creature, such as this woman Smith—as bad, I am told, as a gipsy, who consorts with poachers, indeed, she was to have married a wretched young fellow who died in gaol—only the lowest, most depraved instincts, I am afraid, could have exposed a man to danger from such a quarter. Her father has been suspected of underhand dealings with poachers, and with game-shops in Burket and Cavesham, I know her brothers went all wrong years ago. They say she can not only fix a gun and throw a line, but swallow a glass of spirits undiluted without a cough, and swear an oath like a man. It ■ too horrible to think of her as Lady Thwaite," protested the prospective dowager. In fact she was so overcome between the idea and the heat of the room that she took up a bottle of the old Jockey Club scent, and began to pour it over her handkerchief, though she hated the perfume.

"You might have spared yourself the horror of thinking it all over again, and your breath the pain of telling it to me," said Lady Fernor coolly, "I know all about the woman. My unworldly saint and dutiful innocent of a granddaughter picked up an acquaintance with this Honor Smith which I forbade years ago. But I'll put you right on one point, Lady Thwaite. Men who are men, like Thwaite, aren't always caught by soft skins, dainty tongues, and a few trumpery accomplishments. They sometimes look for bone and sinew, ay, and courage and daring in the women they care for, as well as in the horses they squander their means and their lives on. What pretty nursemaid or sewing girl could have had the pluck and strength to help to drag a drowning man of Thwaite's weight out of a bottomless pit of mud like some of the ponds here? All the same he is raving mad, and will be a low man, if he go on ■ reward me and punish a doll of a young lady, as he proposes to do. Here ■ Soames with my shewls, I must not keep you longer, Lady Thwaite."

When Lady Thwaite was gone, Lady Fernor, as she was slowly descending the stairs to depart on her mission, encountered her granddaughter coming up. Iris had been away in other regions all the morning. She had not been aware of Lady Thwaite's visit, or heard the most distant sough of her news, though the hall and kitchen, which had come into contact with Lady Thwaite's groom, were already ringing with the tidings. Iris had not only her hands but her arms full of ferns, which she had been gathering in the park, and was intending to use according ■ some uncontroversial art formula. She was singing softly ■ herself an old English song —

"Be she surer than the sky,
Or the dewy weeds in May,
If she be not true to me,
What care I how far she be."

"Grandmamma," she exclaimed, "going out just now! Do you not wish me to accompany you? Do you know there is a storm brewing? I came in because the sky looked quite lurid."

"Get out of my way, Iris," said Lady Fernor savagely, "and if I find what I expect—a man worth a dozen of you doomed to be ruined body and soul, made dead to the world henceforth, by your virtuous, godly doing—I warn you, girl, ■ keep out of my sight for some time to come!"

Iris, amazed and aghast, was pushed aside by the weak arm, and stood leaning against the banisters till her grandmother had disappeared. Then the girl began to creep slowly up to her own room, hanging her head, with half of her brittle stemmed ferns broken and crushed in her tightened grasp.

To Iris's fresh astonishment and apprehension, Soames, after she had seen Lady Fernor into the carriage, followed Iris, and sought admission ■ her.

Soames was not a favourite in the house. She was a hard-fibred, cold-natured woman. She had never made a pet of Iris, ■ some of the other elder servants had comforted their consciences and hearts by doing. Soames had rather regarded the young lady as standing somehow in the maid's light.

But now she begged to speak with Iris, and there was smouldering compassion in the woman's dull eyes, and duller voice, when she said, "If I were you, Miss Compton, I would walk over to the Rectory, and stay there for a day or two, as you sometimes do. If Lady Fernor inquires for you, I'll take ■ upon me to explain that you understood what she said, on the stairs, as a wish ■ be left ■ herself for a little while. My lady has her humours like most ladies of her rank and age, I suppose," said Soames, hesitating a little in the caution which was an instinct with her, "and she's in a bad one this morning, and if I were you, Miss Compton, I would not fly in the face of it, but keep out of her way, as she bids you, till the worst pass over. If you will believe me, I am speaking for your good."

"I do believe you. I am much obliged to you, Soames," said Iris humbly in her bewilderment and alarm. "But what can have happened since breakfast? What is the worst that you say will pass over?"

"It is about Sir William Thwaite's marriage, I think, miss," said Soames, perhaps not altogether reluctant, with all her lack of geniality, to retail an astounding piece of gossip to a person deeply concerned in it, and to be the first to note its effect.

"Sir William Thwaite's marriage!" echoed Iris, turning crimson and drawing back, because she was not able to conjure up in her mind any bride for Sir William, save the one who had been set apart for him, whom he had so lately and so aidently sought in vain.

"Yes, Miss Compton," said Soames stolidly, though she did not fail to perceive the reddened cheeks and the erect head. "I do not like to mention such a thing to a lady, least of all to a young lady, but you'll hear it in church on Sunday with the rest of the parish. Sir William is to marry Honor Smith, the daughter of one of his under keepers, her that my lady stopped coming to you with berries and nuts, and such trash, when you were a young miss and she a ship of a girl."

Iris laughed. She seemed fated to show her feelings in this fashion ■ different crises in her history. She laughed again the same nervous, quivering laughter to which she had yielded when Lady Thwaite congratulated her on her approaching marriage with this very Sir William Thwaite.

Soames's touchy feelings were hurt. "You may not credit the story," she said gloomily, "but I am afraid it is gospel truth. My lady has driven over ■ Whitehills ■ be at the bottom of it. And, if you will take my advice, Miss Compton—excuse me for offending it twice—you will go down ■ the Rectory till the disturbance has blown over."

Soames retreated, feeling that she had done her duty, and had been treated as most people who can thus justify themselves in their own eyes may expect to be served.

The perfect confidence with which Soames had spoken, together with Iris's knowledge of the maid's prudent nature, had really robbed the listener of all incredulity from the first. Her earliest sensation was one of overwhelming humiliation, not so much because of Sir William's inconstancy as because of her rival and successor in his regard. Iris Compton had been deeply mortified in her girlish dignity and self-respect, by his having utterly mistaken her friendliness, and addressed her as no man who was not her equal, whom she had not favoured in the light of a lover, ought to have done. How was she to feel when she heard that he had instantly transferred his suit to poor Honor Smith, whom she had known as a ragged little girl, and lamented over to him—of all men—because she was different from the humblest cottager or working woman in the field, in her uncommonly, vagabond habits?

Iris thought neat of the wrath of Lady Fermor, and then she asked herself if she would take Soames's advice. It went against the grain with the girl to flee from, instead of facing, the expression of the resentment she had provoked. On the other hand, she was docile to any leading offered in good faith. She did not question Soames's commiseration, perhaps, also, the maid was concerned for her old mistress. And ought Iris to risk injuring her grandmother by provoking her to further paroxysms of passion, no longer usual with her, and sorely exhausting to the frame, which had held together through all the troubles of over eighty years?

In the meantime Lady Fermor drove the short distance, panting a little from the intolerable airlessness under the low sky, seeing the cattle standing in groups under any shelter they could find, or straying home, in single file, in their distress.

The place did not look the same, though it was only three days ago that she had been presiding in a fiat champfire there, paving the way for Iris's becoming its mistress. The hay had all been carted off the meadow, which lay stripped and bare as in winter. The first half of the thunder-storm had committed havoc among the trees, bushes, and grass of the park, splitting up one oak, scattering leaves, beating down twigs, conveying an impression of how it must have laid low the glory of the summer garden, though the devastation there was unseen. All the merriment and gaiety, the light figures and pretty dresses were gone.

Nobody was visible. Whitehills lay as still as if it had been devastated by an earthquake, or as if a judgment were going to descend on the place.

Lady Fermor was fortunate in finding Sir William at home. He had been over at Hawley Scrub, but he had returned, and was in the library. Lady Fermor did not give him the opportunity of denying himself. She told Cumberbatch to show her up at once to his master. The butler was still in office, though he was labouring under great perturbation of mind, whether he ought not to give in his leave, like Mrs. Gray, because of the stir that had been cast on the family. But he did not contemplate a matrimonial alliance with the housekeeper, and, like men in the mass, as opposed to women in general, the gentleman was less impulsive and more practical than the lady. Knowing the terms his master had been on with Lady Fermor, and having some inkling of the old lady's temper and errand, it was a small satisfaction to Cumberbatch to obey her implicitly. "Save him right for being such a thundering ass, with his jug of water and his book at meals—like a low life'd, radical scamp. If the harlotastic old party were to scratch his eyes out, bless you! I shouldn't mind or interfere, not if I could help it."

CHAPTER XL.—ANOTHER INTERVIEW.

LADY FERMOR began, without the slightest preamble or circumlocution, as soon as the door was closed. "Thwaite, what is this that I hear about your cutting your own throat?"

"I don't know what you mean by my cutting my own throat," he said a little sulkily, "but will you not take a seat, Lady Fermor?"

"I would not, if my old limbs would serve me," she protested, sinking into the chair from which he had risen, and keeping him standing like a culprit before her. "You do know what I mean. It is I who want to be told what you mean by being the maddest, most misguided idiot that ever walked the earth, and by forewearing yourself into the bargain."

"Seems a man like me," he said, thrusting his hands into his pockets, "must take a good deal from a woman. If I choose to cut my throat, mayn't I do it if I like?"

"No, not if you have a friend who cares a straw for your welfare, not if there is a social policeman left."

"Ain't there worse things than having done with one's self once and for all?"

"Not that I know of, and I've lived a good many more years than you have," protested the old lady steadily. "It is like the broken neck in the old song—

*"A lover forsaken a new love may get,
But a neck that is broken can never be set."*

Thwaite, did I not tell you to have patience, and she would come round?"

"You told me false, Lady Fermor!" he cried quickly, walking away, and turning his back upon her for a moment ■ hode the torture she was inflicting on him. "And I have to tell you that if you bring her name into this conversation, I'll leave the room and leave the house, and you may stop till doomsday, and go, as, indeed, you must, without your errand."

"Is this all you have to say to me?" she asked in a lower key. "Is this all the thanks I'm to get?" she urged with pain as well as pleading in her failing voice.

An appeal like this had always gone to his heart. "I know you've been good to me, Lady Fermor," he exclaimed. "I due say you have meant kindly by me. Don't reckon me an ungrateful brute because I say it has all been a monstrous mistake. Don't force me to say you've been my worst enemy."

"You are your own worst enemy, William Thwaite, if you force me to wash my hands of you, and ■ have done with you from this day."

"It cannot be helped," he said desperately. "I believe it is the best thing that can happen now."

"And do you make nothing of me, sir?" she reproached him bitterly. "Do you give me up without so much as heaving a sigh? I believed I had secured a son for my old age. I meant to be like a mother to you, I swear it, Thwaite. I never thought so little of myself or so much of another, in any friendship I ever formed. I sometimes fancied I was going to die soon, it was so like feeling good, as your simpletons and knaves pretend to feel. I was a fool, and you have rewarded me finely for my folly."

"Then, maybe, as a mother forgives a son's folly, you will forgive and forget mine some day, Lady Fermor," he said shyly.

"Never!" she said with all her former rancour. "It ■ not as if you only hurt me cruelly; it is the disgraceful insult you put upon me, after what I have wished to do for you, as you know, and everybody knows, by destroying yourself in the way your propose to do. Look here, Thwaite, I am aware the young woman did you a service—let us say, the greatest service one human being can render another. Let us say she took your eye, too, by way of change—men's eyes will rove out of their circle, and for old association's sake you might have a hankering after her, but she would never look for your marrying her. You might double or treble the settlement, because you have gone so far in a fit of pique and rage as to mention banns and the church, and commit yourself to the world."

"That is, my lady, if I understand you rightly," said Sir William, half choking, his ruddy colour growing purple with fury, "you would have me pay a woman for what you call the greatest service one human being can render another, by behaving like a villain and doing her the deepest injury in my power, and then propose to heal ■ by money? I am not a gentleman, I do not pretend, as you call it, to have been a good man, or anything save a ne'er-do-well, drunken, degraded rascal, if you knew all, but I have not come to that yet—to what a great lady, an old woman on the brink of the grave, has brought her mouth ■ utter, to a low beggar like me, young enough to be her grandson."

She blanched a little before his rage. If there was anything she respected it was the whirlwind of a man's just anger. She had a perception of justice, and she sometimes accorded to the men whose manhood she could appreciate, the right to rule over themselves, over her, and over humanity at large. "I grant it is awkward," she said, "and unpleasant and improper, and if you take to high saluting you may call it all the bad names you choose. But you have got yourself into the scrape, and if you will not break off from it, without another moment's shilly-shallying—availing yourself of your horses and your yacht—if you had one—but there are always the railways and screw steamers—it will be the worse for you. My way of backing out is ■ least better for you and everybody, including the woman, mind, than your putting an end to yourself by marrying a drab like that."

"By George, she's the woman I'll marry as soon as the banns are out!" he said with hard firmness. "I might take out a licence, but we ain't ashamed of what we're going to do, or driven to huddle up the doing of it, as some of you fine folk are fain to try. I needn't tell you we ain't in the fashion neither, having no turn that way. Such being the case, will you have the goodness to mind your manners, Lady Fermor, and keep from calling my future wife names to my face, which I would not suffer for a second from a man, but must stomach from a woman—lady or not—because I cannot use my lips to her? I'll only say this, that whatever you may mean by a drab, I am free to tell you Honor Smith—my Honor now—is an honest woman, which is more than can be said of every fine lady."

She cowered as if ■ had dealt her a blow "Boy," she said hoarsely, "whatever provocation I have given you, it is not you who should have used these words ■ me." She stumbled to her feet, and prepared to totter out of the room, while he stood, arrested in his violence, with an apology checked on his lips. He wished to give her his arm, which she had so often taken in preference to any other support, but she waived him off. He followed her to the door, and heard the first roll of the thunder and splash of the rain "Stay till the storm is over, Lady Linnor," he besought her humbly. "Your horses may be frightened, you will catch your death of cold. If you will return I'll send Mrs. Cray—no, she went this morning, but Comberbatch will fetch one of the maids, I'll not intrude on you."

"I would not stay another minute in your house, not though all the fires of heaven were launched on the earth and the deluge had come again. Do you remember the words of the play—not that you've been much in the way of Shakespeare's plays—about not turning your worst enemy's dog out of doors in a pitiless storm? But if I had been the enemy or the dog I would have scorned the shelter of a false friend's roof, a man who could taunt and revile a woman, a grey-headed woman, old enough, as he has said himself, to be his mother's mother. You are not a gentleman—you are right there—you are not even a man, as I had stupidly thought you. Farewell to you, Sir William Linnor, I have done with you." She went down the wet steps, rejecting all assistance, was put into her carriage by her man, and turned her back on Whitchills.

A FORTNIGHT IN HOLLAND.

By AUGUSTUS J C HARE.

FIRST PART.

AT Roosendaal, about an hour's railway journey from Antwerp, the boundary between Belgium and Holland is crossed, and a branch line diverges to Breda.

Somehow, like most travellers, we could not help expecting to see some marked change on reaching a new country, and on entering Holland we were certainly disappointed at first. Open heaths were succeeded by woods of stunted firs, and then by fields with thick hedges of beech or alder, till the towers of Breda came in sight. Here a common place omnibus took us to the comfortable inn of Zum Kroon, and we were shown into bedrooms reached by an open wooden stair case from the courtyard, and quickly joined the table d'hôte, at which the magnates of the town were seated with napkins well tucked up under their chins, talking, with full mouths, in Dutch, of which to our unaccustomed ears the words seemed all in one string. Most excellent was the dinner—roast meat and pears, quantities of delicious vegetables cooked in different ways, piles of ripe mulberries and cake, and across the little garden, with its statues and bright flower beds, we could see the red sails of the barges going up and down the canals.

As soon as dinner was over, we walked forth to see the town, which impressed us more than any Dutch city did afterwards, perhaps because it was the first we saw.

The winding streets—one of them ending in a high windmill—are lined with houses wonderfully varied in outline, and of every shade of delicate colour, yellow, grey, or brown, though the windows always have white frames and bus. Peering through a low archway under one of the houses, we found ourselves, when we least expected it, in the public garden, a kind of wood where the trees have killed all the grass, surrounded by canals, beyond one of which is a great square château built by William III of England, encircled by the Merk, and enclosing an arcaded court. There was an older château of 1350 at Breda, but we failed to find it.

In stately splendour from the old houses of the market place rises the noble Hervormde Kerk (Protestant Church), with a lofty octagonal tower, and a most characteristic bulbous Dutch spire. Here, as we wanted to see the interior, we first were puzzled by our ignorance of Dutch, finding, as everywhere in the smaller towns, that the natives knew no language but their own. But two old women in high caps and gold earrings observed our puzzledness from a window, and pointed to a man and a key—we nodded, the man pointed ■ himself, a door, and a key—we nodded, and we were soon inside the building. It was our first introduction to Dutch Calvinism and iconoclasm, and piteous indeed was it to see so magnificent a church thickly covered with whitewash, and the quantity of statues which it contains of deceased Dukes and Duchesses of Nassau be left of their legs and petticoats. Only, in a grand side chapel on the left of the choir, the noble tomb of Engelbrecht II of Nassau, general under the Emperor Maximilian (1505), remains intact. The guide lights matches to shine through the transparent alabaster of the figures, that of the Duke represents Death, that of the Duchess Sleep, is they lie beneath a stone slab which bears the armor of Engelbrecht, and is supported by figures of Cæsar, Hannibal, Regulus and Philip of Macedon, that of Casar is sublime. The tomb of St. Vincent Verc in Westminster Abbey is of the same design and is supposed to be copied from this famous monument. Outside the chapel is the tomb of Engelbrecht V of Nassau, with all his family kneeling, in quaint head dresses. The other sights of the church are the brass font in the baptistery, and a noble brass in the choir of William de Gaellen, Dean of the Chapter, 1539. It will be observed that here and almost everywhere else in Holland, the names of saints which used to be attached to the churches have disappeared, the buildings are generally known as the old church, or new church, or great church.

After a delicious breakfast of coffee and thick cream, with rusks, scones, and different kinds of cheese, always an indispensable in Dutch breakfasts, we took to the railway again and crossed Zeeland, which chiefly consists of four islands, Noordt Beveland, Zuid Beveland, Schouwen, and Walcheren, and is less visited by the rest of the Nether-landers than any other part of the country. The land is all cut up into vast polders, as the huge meadows are called, which are recovered from the sea and protected by embankments. Here, if ruin in care was withdrawn for six months, the whole country would be under the sea again. A corps of engineers called "waterstaats" are continually employed to watch the waters, and to keep in constant repair the dykes which are formed of clay ■ the bottom, as that ■ more waterproof than anything else, and thatched with willows, which are here grown extensively for the purpose. If the sea passes a dyke, ruin is imminent, an alarm bell rings, and the whole population rush to the rescue. The moment one dyke is even menaced, the people begin to build another inside it, and then rely upon the double defence, whilst they fortify the old one. But all their care has not preserved the islands of Zeeland three centuries ago, Schouwen was entirely submerged, and every living creature was drowned. Soon after, Noordt Beveland was submerged, and remained for several years entirely under water, only the points of the church spires being visible. Zuid Beveland had been submerged in the fourteenth century. Walcheren was submerged as late as 1808 and Tholen even in 1825. It has been aptly asserted that the sea to the inhabitants of Holland is what Vermin is to Torre del Greco. De Amicis says that the Dutch have three enemies—the sea, the lakes, and the rivers, they repel the sea, they dry the lakes, and they imprison the rivers, but with the sea it is a combat which never ceases.

The story of the famous siege of 1749, made us linger at Bergen ■ Zoom, a clean, dull little town with bright white houses surrounding an irregular market place, and surmounted by the heavy tower ■ the Church of St. Gertrude. In the Stadhuis ■ a fine carved stone chimney-piece, but there is little worth seeing, and we were soon speeding across the rich pastures of Zuid Beveland, and passing its capital of Goes, prettily situated amongst cherry orchards, the beautiful cruciform church with a low central spire rising above the trees on its ramparts. Every now and then the train seems scarcely out of the water, which covers a vast surface of the pink-green flats, and recalls the description in Hudibras of—

'A country that draws fifty feet of water
In which men live as in the hold of a store
And when the sea does in upon them break
And drown a province does but spring a leak

The peasant women at the stations are a perpetual amusement, for there is far more costume here than in most parts of Holland, and peculiar square handsome gold ornaments, something like closed golden books, are universally worn on each side of the face.

So, crossing a broad salt canal into the island of Walcheren, we reached Middelburg, a handsome town which was covered with water to the house tops when the island was submerged. It was the birthplace of Zach Janssen and Hans Lippershey, the inventors of the telescope, c. 1610. In the market place is a most beautiful Gothic town-hall, built by the architect Keldermans, early in the sixteenth century. We asked a well-dressed boy how we could get into it, and he, without further troubling himself, pointed the way with his finger. The building contains a quaint old hall called the Vietschuur, and a so-called museum, but there is little enough to see. As we came out the boy met us. "You must give me something I pointed out the entrance of the Stadhuis to you" In Holland we have always found that no one, rich or poor, does a kindness or even a civility for nothing!

The crowd in the market-place was so great that it was impossible to sketch the Stadhuis as we should have wished, but the people themselves were delightfully picturesque. The women entirely conceal their hair under their white caps, but have golden cork screws sticking out on either side the face, from which the golden slabs we have observed before were pendant. The Nieuwe Kerk is of little interest, though it contains the tomb of William of Holland, who was elected Emperor of Germany in 1259, and we wandered on through the quiet streets, till a Gothic arch in an ancient wall looked tempting. Passing through it we found ourselves in the enclosure of the old abbey, shaded by a grove of trees, and surrounded by ancient buildings, part of which are appropriated as the Hotel Abdy, where we arrived utterly famished, and found a table d'hôte at 30 P.M. unspeakably reviving.

Any one who sees Holland thoroughly ought also to visit Zieriksee, the capital of the island of Schouwen, but the water locomotion thither is so difficult and tedious that we preferred keeping to the railways, which took us back in the dark over the country we had already traversed and a little more, to Dordrecht, where there is a convenient tramway to take travellers from the station into the town. Here, at the Hotel de Fries, we found comfortable bedrooms, with boarded floors and box beds like those in Northumbrian cottages, and we had supper in the public room, separated into two parts by a dais for strangers, whence we looked down into the humbler division, which recalled many homely scenes of Ostade and Teniers in its painted wooden ceiling, its bright, polished furniture, its cat and dog and quantity of birds and flowers, its groups of boozers at round tables drinking out of tankards, and the landlady and her daughter in their gleaming gold ornaments, sitting knitting, with the water standing behind them amusing himself by the general conversation.

Our morning at Dortrecht was very delightful, and it was a thoroughly charming place. Passing under a dark archway in a picturesque building of Charles V. opposite the hotel, we found ourselves at once on the edge of an immense expanse of shimmering river, with long rich polders beyond, between which the wide flood breaks into three different branches. Red and white sails flit down them. Here and there rise a line of pollard willows or clipped elms, and now and then a church spire. On the nearest shore an ancient windmill, coloured in delicate tints of grey and yellow, surmounts a group of white buildings. On the left is a broad esplanade of brick, lined with ancient houses, and a canal with a bridge, the long arms of which are ready to open at a touch and give a passage to the great yellow-masted barges, which are already half intercepting the bright red house fronts ornamented with stone, which belong to some public buildings facing the end of the canal. With what a confusion of merchandise are the boats laden, and how gay is the colouring, between the old weedy posts to which they are moored!

From the busy port, where nevertheless they are dredging, we cross another bridge and find ourselves in a quietude like that of a cathedral close in England. On one side is a wide pool half covered with floating timber, and, in the other half, reflecting like a mirror the houses on the opposite shore, with their bright gardens of lilies and hollyhocks, and trees of mountain ash, which bend their masses of scarlet berries over the still water. Between the houses are glimpses of blue river and of inevitable windmills on the opposite shore. And all this we observe standing in the shadow of a huge church, the Groote Kerk, with a nave of the fourteenth century, and a choir of the fifteenth, and a gigantic brick tower, in which three long Gothic arches, between octagonal tourelles, enclose several tiers of windows. At the top is a great clock, and below the church a grove of elms, through which fitful sunlight falls on the grass and the dead red of the brick pavement (so grateful to feet sore with the sharp stones of other Dutch cities), where groups of fishermen are collecting in their blue shirts and white trousers.

There is little to see inside this or any other church in Holland, travellers will rather seek for the memorials, at the Kloveniers Doelen, of the famous Synod of Dort, which was held 1618-19, in the hope of effecting a compromise between the Gomarists, or disciples of Calvin, and the Arminians who followed Zwingle, and who had recently obtained the name of Remonstrants from the "remonstrance" which they had addressed eight years before in defence of their doctrines. The Calvinists held that the greater part of mankind was excluded from grace, which the Arminians denied, but at the Synod of Dort the Calvinists proclaimed themselves as infallible as the Pope, and their resolutions became the law of the Dutch reformed Church. The Arminians were forthwith outlawed, a hundred ministers who refused to subscribe the dictates of the Synod were banished, Hugo Grotius and Rombout Hoogerbeets were imprisoned for life at Loevestein, the body of the secretary Ledcnberg, who committed suicide in prison, was hung, and Vin Olden Barneveldt, the friend of William the Silent, was beheaded in his seventy-second year.

There is little in the quiet streets of Dortrecht to remind one that it was once one of the most important commercial cities of Holland, taking precedence even of Rotterdam, Delft, Leyden, and Amsterdam. It also possessed a privilege called the Staple of Dort, by which all the carriers on the Maas and Rhine were forced to unload their merchandise here, and pay all duties imposed, only using the boats or porters of the place in their work, and so bringing a great revenue to the town.

More than those in any of the other towns of Holland, do the little water streets of Dortrecht recall Venice, the houses rising abruptly from the canals, only the luminous atmosphere and the shimmering water changing colour like a chameleon, are wanting.

Through the street of wine—Wijnstraat—built over storehouses used for the staple, we go to the Museum to see the pictures. There were two schools of Dortrecht—Jacob Gentse Cuyp (1575), Albert Cuyp (1605), Ferdinand Bol (1611), Nicolas Maas (1632), and Schalken (1643) belonged to the former, Arend de Gelder, Arnold Houbraken, Duk Stoop, and Ary Scheffer are of the latter. Sunshine and glow were the characteristics of the first school, greyness and sobriety of the second. But there are few good pictures at Dort now, and some of the best works of Cuyp are to be found in our National Gallery, executed at his native place and portraying the great brick tower of the church in the golden haze of evening, seen across rich pastures, where the cows are lying deep in the meadow-grass. The works of Ary Scheffer are now the most interesting pictures in the Dordrecht Gallery. Of the subject "Christus Consolator" there are two representations. In the more striking of these the pite Christ is seated amongst the sick, sorrowful, blind, maimed, and enfeebled, who are all stretching out their hands to Him. Beneath is the tomb which the artist executed for his mother, Cornelia Scheffer, whose touching figure is represented lying with outstretched hands, in the utmost abandonment of repose.

An excursion should be made from Dordrecht to the castle of Loevestein on the Rhine, where Grotius, imprisoned in 1619, was concealed by his wife in the chest which brought in his books and linen. It was conveyed safely out of the castle by her courageous maid Elze van Houtenburg, and was taken at first to the house of Jacob Daatslaer, a supposed friend of Grotius, who refused to render any assistance. But his wife consented to open the chest, and the philosopher, disguised as a mason, escaped to Brabant.

It is much best to visit Rotterdam as an excursion from Dordrecht. We thought it quite the most odious place we ever were in —immense, filthy, and not very picturesque. Its handsomest feature is the vast quay called the Boompjes, on the Maas. Here and there a great windmill reminds you unmistakably of where you are, and the land streets are intersected everywhere by water streets, the carriages being constantly stopped to let ships pass through the bridges. In the Groot Markt stands a bronze statue of Desiderius Erasmus—"Vir sæculi sui primarius, et civis omnium præstantissimus," which is the work of Hendrik de Keyser (1662), and in the Wyde Kerkstraat is the house where he was born, inscribed "Hæc est patris domus, magnus qui natus Erasmus, 1467," but it is now a tavern. The great church of St. Lawrence—Groot Kerk—built in 1477-87, contains the tombs of a number of Dutch admirals, and has a grand pavement of monumental slabs, but is otherwise sightful. Part of it is used as a cart house, the largest chapel is a commodious carpenter's shop, and the aisle round the portion used for service, where there has been an attempt at restoration in painting the roof yellow and putting up some hideous yellow seats, are a play-ground for the children of the town, who are freely admitted to their promiscuous, though for strangers there is a separate fee for each part of the edifice they enter.

We went to see the pictures in the Museum bequeathed to the town by Jacob Otto Bozman, but did not admire them much. It takes time to re-adjust one's mind to Dutch art, and the endless representations of family life, with domestic furniture, pots and pans, &c., or of the simple local landscapes—clipped avenues, sandy roads, dykes, and cottages, or even of the cows, and pigs, and poultry, seem wonderfully executed, but where one has too much of the originals, scarcely worth the immense amount of time and labour bestowed upon them. The calm seas of Van de Velde and Vander Capelle only afford a certain amount of relief. The scenes of village life are seldom pleasing, often coarse, and never have anything elevating to offer or ennobling to recall. We thought that the real charm of the Dutch school to outsiders consists in the immense power and variety of its portraits.

Well, we hated Rotterdam, and thankfully felt ourselves speeding over the flat, rich lands to Gouda, where we found an agricultural fête going on, banners half way down the houses, and a triumphal arch at the entrance to the square, formed of spades, rakes, and forks, with a plough at the top, and decorated with corn, potatoes, turnips, and carrots, and cornucopias pouring out flowers at the sides. In the square—a great cheese market, for the Gouda cheese is esteemed the best in Holland—is a Gothic Stadhuys, and, beyond it, the Groote Kerk of 1552, of which the bare interior is enlivened by the stained windows executed by Wouter and Dirk Crabeth in 1555-57. We were the better able to understand the design of these noble windows because the cartoon for each was spread upon the pavement in front of it, but one could not help one's attention being unpleasantly distracted by the number of men of the burgher class, smoking and with their hats on, who were allowed to use the church as a promenade. Gouda also made an unpleasant impression upon us, because, expensive as we found every hotel in Holland, we were nowhere so outrageously cheated as here.

It is a brief journey to the Hague—La Haye, Gravenhaye—most delightful of little capitals, with its comfortable hotels and pleasant surroundings. The town is still so small that it seems ■ merit the name of "the largest village in Europe," which was given to it because the jealousy of other towns prevented its having any vote in the States General till the time of Louis Bonaparte, who gave it the privileges of a city. The Hague has none of the crowd and bustle of Amsterdam and Rotterdam, but is not dead like the smaller towns of Holland, indeed, it even seems to have a quiet gaiety, without dissipation, of its own. All around are parks and gardens, whence wide streets lead speedily through the new town of the rich bourgeoisie to the old central town of the stadholders, where a beautiful lake, the Vijver, or fish pond, comes as a surprise, with the eccentric old palace of the Binnenhof rising straight out of its waters. We had been told ■ was picturesque, but were prepared for nothing so charming as the variety of steep roofs and towers, the clear reflections, the tufted islet, and the beautiful colouring of the whole scene at the Vijver. We skirted the lake, and entered the precincts of the palace through the picturesque Gudevangen Poort, where Cornelius de Witte, Burgomaster of Dort, was imprisoned in 1672, on a false accusation of having suborned the surgeon Willem Jache laur to murder the Prince of Orange. He was dragged out hence and torn to pieces by the people, together with his brother Jean de Witte, Grand Pensioner, whose house remains huddled by in the Kneuterdyk.

The court of the Binnenhof is exceedingly handsome, and contains the ancient Gothic Hall of the Knights, where Johann van Olden Barneveld, Grand Pensioner, or Prime Minister, was condemned ■ death "for having conspired to dismember the States of the Netherlands, and greatly troubled God's Church," and in front of which (May 24, 1619) he was beheaded.

Hall of the Haghe, The Hague

Close to the north-east gate of the Linnenhof is the handsome house called Munichius, containing the memorable Picture Gallery of the Haghe, which will bear many visits. On the ground floor are chiefly portraits, amongst which a simple dignified priest by Philippe de Champaigne, with a far away expression, will certainly arrest attention. Deeply interesting is the portrait by Ravesteyn of William the Silent, in his rust and steel armour embossed with gold—a deeply lined face, with a slight peaked beard. His widow, Marie de Coligny, is also represented. There is a fine portrait by Schalken of our William the Third. Noble like noses of Sir George Sheffield and his wife Anna Wake, by Vandyke, are a pleasing contrast to the many works of Rubens.

On the first floor we must sit down before the great picture which Rembrandt painted in his twenty-sixth year (1632) of the school of Anatomy. Here the shrewd professor, Nicolaus Tulp, with a face brimming with knowledge and intelligence, is expounding the anatomy of a corpse to a number of members of the guild of surgeons, some of whom are full of eager interest and inquiry, whilst others are indifferent. The dead figure is greatly foreshortened and not repulsive. In another room, a fine work of Thomas de Keyser represents the Four Burgomasters of Amsterdam before the arrival of Marie de Medicis. A beautiful work of Adriaen van Ostade is full of light and character—but only represents a stolid boor drinking to the health of a fidelier, while a child plays with a dog in the background.

A group of admirers will always be found round "the Immortal Bull" of Paul Potter, which was considered the fourth picture in importance in the Louvre, when the spoils of Europe were collected at Paris. De Amicis says, "It lives, it breathes, with his bull Paul Potter has written the true Idyl of Holland." It is, however—being really a group of cattle—not a pleasing though a life-like picture. Much more attractive is the exquisite "Presentation" of Rembrandt (1631) in which Joseph and Mary, simple peasants, present the Holy Child to Simeon, a glorious old man in a jewelled robe, who invokes a blessing upon the infant, while other priests look on with interest. And perhaps the most beautiful work in the whole gallery is the Young Housekeeper of Gerard Dou. A lovely young woman sits at work by an open window looking into a street. By her side is the baby asleep in its cradle, over which the maid is leaning. The light falls on the chandelier and all the household belongings of a well-to-do citizen. In all there is the same marvellous finish, it is said that the handle of the broom took three days to paint.

There is not much to discover in the streets of the Haghe. In the great square called the Plein is the statue of William the Silent, with his tin or sword, erected in 1848 "by the grateful people to the father of their fatherland." In the fish market, tame storks are kept, for the same reason that bears are kept at Berne, because storks are the arms of the town. But the chief attraction of the place lies in its lovely walks amid the noble beeches and oaks of the Bosh, beyond which on the left is Huis ten Bosch, the favourite palace of Queen Sophie, who held her literary court and died there. It looks out upon flats, with dykes and a windmill. All travellers seem to visit it,—which must be a curious surprise to the extortionate custode to whom they have to pay a guilder a head, and who will hurry them rapidly through some commonplace rooms in which there is nothing really worth seeing. One room is covered with paintings of the Rubens school, and which, high in the dome, is a portrait of the Princess Amalia of Solms, who built the house in 1647.

A tram takes people for twopenny halfpenny to Scheveningen through the park, a thick wood with charming forest scenery. As the trees become more scattered, the road of the North Sea is heard upon the shore. Above the sands on the dunes or sand-hills, which extend from the Helder to Dun Lirk, is a broad terrace, lined on one side by a row of wooden pavilions with flags and porticoes, and below it are long lines of tents, necessary in the intense glare, while, nearer the waves, each unit is of lattice-like refuge with a single folding seat. In each. The flat monotonous shore would soon pall upon one, yet through the whole summer is an extra-ordinarily lively scene. On Sunday afternoons, especially, the sands seem as crowded with human life as they are represented in the picture of Lingelbach, which we have seen in the Mauritshuis, portraying the vast multitude assembled here to witness the embarkation of Charles II. for England.

An excursion must be made to Delft only twenty minutes distant from the Hague by rail. Pops calls it "a most sweet town with bridges and a river in every street," and that is a tolerably accurate description. All the trees are clipped, for in artificial Holland every work of Nature is artificialised. At certain seasons, numbers of storks may be seen upon the chimney tops, for Delft is supposed to be the stork town par excellence, but we could not discover a single nest.

View of Delft

Near the shady canal Oude Delft is a low building once the Convent of St. Agatha, with an ornamented door surmounted by a relief, leading into a courtyard. It is a common barrier now for Holland which has no local histories but no regard whatever for its historic associations or monuments. Yet this is the quietest shrine of Dutch history, for it is here that William the Silent died.

Philip II. had promised 25,000 crowns of gold to any one who would murder the Prince of Orange. An attempt had already been made but had failed, and William refused to take any measures for self-protection, saying, "It is useless; my years are in the hands of God; if there is a witch who has no fear of death, my life is in his hand, however I may guard it." At length, a young man of seven and twenty appeared at Delft, who gave himself out to be one Guyon, a Protestant son of Pierre Guyon, executed at Besançon for having embraced Calvinism, and declared that he was exiled for his religion. Really he was Balthazar Gerard, a bigoted Catholic, but his conduct in Holland soon procured him the reputation of an evangelised saint. The Prince took him into his service and sent him to accompany a mission from the States of Holland to the Court of France, whence he returned to bring the news of the death of the Duke of Anjou to William. At that time the Prince was living with his court in the convent of St. Agatha, where he received Balthazar alone in his chamber. The moment was opportune, but the would-be assassin had no arms ready. William gave him a small sum of money and bade him hold himself in readiness to be sent back to France. With the money Balthazar bought two pistols from a soldier (who afterwards killed himself when he heard the use which was made of the purchase). On the next day, June 10th, 1584, Balthazar returned to the convent as William was descending the staircase to dinner, with his fourth wife, Louise de Coligny (daughter of the Admiral who fell in the massacre of St. Bartholomew) on his arm. He presented his passport and begged the Prince to sign it, but was told to return later. At dinner the Princess asked William who was the young man who had spoken to him, for his expression was the most terrible she had ever seen. The Prince laughed, said it was Guyon, and was as gay as usual. Dinner being over, the family party were about to remount the staircase. The assassin was waiting in a dark corner at the foot of the stairs, and as William passed, he discharged a pistol with three balls and fled. The Prince staggered, saying, "I am wounded, God have mercy upon me and my poor people." His sister Catherine van Schwartzbourg asked, "Do you trust in Jesus Christ?" He said, "Yes," with a feeble voice, sat down upon the stairs, and died.

Balthazar reached the rampart of the town in safety, hoping to swim to the other side of the moat, where a horse awaited him. But he had dropped his hat and his second pistol in his flight, and so he was traced and seized before he could leap from the wall. Amid horrible tortures, he not only confessed, but continued to triumph in his crime. His judges believed him to be possessed of the devil. The next day he was executed. His right hand was burnt off in a tub of red-hot iron, the flesh of his arms and legs was torn off with red-hot pincers; but he never made a cry. It was not till his breast was cut open, and his heart torn out and flung in his face, that he expired. His head was then fixed on a pike, and his body, cut into four quarters, exposed on the four gates of the town.

Close to the Prinsenhof is the Oude Kerk with a leaning tower. It is arranged like a very ugly theatre inside, but contains, with other tombs of celebrities, the monument of Admiral Van Tromp, 1650—"Martinus Harberti Trompae"—whose effigy lies upon his back, with swollen feet. It was this Van Tromp who defeated the English fleet under Blake, and perished, as represented on the monument, in an engagement off Scheveningen. It was he who, after his victory over the English, caused a broom to be hoisted at his mast head to typify that he had swept the Channel clear of his enemies.

The Nieuwe Kerk in the Groote Markt (1412-76) contains the magnificent monument of William the Silent by Hendrik de Keyser and A. Quellin (1621). Black marble columns support a white canopy over the white sleeping figure of the Prince. In the recesses are statues of Liberty, Justice, Prudence, and Religion. At the feet of William lies his favourite dog, which saved his life from midnight assassins at Mahnes, by awakening him. At the head of the tomb is another figure of William, of bronze, seated. In the same church is a monument to Hugo Grotius—"prodigium Europae"—the greatest lawyer of the seventeenth century, presented to Henri IV. by Buiveveld as "La merveille de la Hollande."

FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE.*

By R. H. HUTTON

THIS book must read like the story of a shadow in a dream to those who think that there is no eternal world at all. Nothing illustrates better the fidelity and skill with which Colonel Maurice has pictured for us his father's life—chiefly, as he himself tells us, in his father's own words—than the force with which from beginning to end it impresses on us the conviction that here was a man living, and living eagerly, in time, for ends which mere creatures of time cannot either measure or apprehend. It is not surprising, therefore, that the life of Maurice is not what any one would think of calling a popular book. And yet it has already awakened a kind of interest which no popular book would awaken, for it is one of the most striking testimonies to the existence of an eternal life, in Maurice's own sense of the word, that was ever yet given. Throughout these twelve hundred closely printed pages one cannot come on the trace of a day of Maurice's life that was not chiefly lived in the light of eternity. I don't, of course, mean that he lived always as he himself would have desired to live for one of the chief notes of this remarkable book is the profound sense, not merely of humility, but of almost extravagant humiliation which marks it. I only mean this, that whether Maurice lived as he would have desired to live or not, every day of his life seems to have been scored and furrowed either with the passionate desire so to live, or an almost unreasonable self-reproach for not having so lived. ■ has been said that his life was one long pursuit of "unattainable ends" by "inappropriate means." If Maurice's ends were really unattainable it does not require much literary acuteness to perceive that any means ■ took to gain them must necessarily have been inappropriate, so that the epigram, like most epigrams, overreaches itself. But I think it would be much truer to say that ■ lived to pursue ends which he actually attained with much more marvellous success than ends of that kind are usually attained, by means which often seemed, and sometimes were, clumsy, and more or less inappropriate for the end ■ had in view. There was nothing of the genius of delicate adjustment about Maurice. The ends which he attained he attained often with a great waste of power, and partly, perhaps, by showing how indifferent he was to the wasting of himself upon them, if only he might somehow gain them even partially at last. What Cardinal Newman once wrote in reference to St Gregory Nazianzen has often seemed to me curiously applicable to Maurice —

* "The Life of Frederick Denison Maurice chiefly told in his own Letters" edited by his Son, Frederick Maurice. With Portraits. In Two Volumes. Macmillan & Co.

' So works the All-wise! our services dividing Not as we ask
For the world's profit, by our gifts deciding Our duty-test.
See, in King's courts (oh Jeremiah plead,
And slow-tongued Moses rule by eloquence of deed
Yes, thou bright Angel of the East shalt rear
The Cross divine, Dawns high upon thy liquid accents where Men mock'd the sign
Till that wild cry burst thy battle cry,
And hearts were stirred and dinned a Pentecost was nigh!'

So ■ was that London heard Maurice's battle cry. And yet a great deal of his work was undoubtedly tentative, awkward, "mappropiate." But the persevering and redundant laboriousness with which, when needful, it was all done over again, produced an effect which could hardly have been produced by the highest genius for adapting means to ends. There was the lavishness of the eternal world in all his efforts, though there was all the humiliation of human inadequacy too. "We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God and not of ourselves," might be the motto of Maurice's career, so little did he feel the brightness of success, and so much nevertheless did he really attain.

And the present life of Maurice only echoes, alike in its evidence of failure and in its evidence of success, the impression produced by the career of the living man. It is about thirty-five years since my most intimate friend, the late Walter Bagehot, who was then a student of Lincoln's Inn, where he was afterwards called to the Bar, took me to hear one of the afternoon sermons of the chaplain of the Inn. I remember Bagehot's telling me, with his usual caution, that ■ would not exactly answer for my being impressed by the sermon, but that at all events he thought I should feel that something different went on there from that which goes on in an ordinary church or chapel service, that there was a sense of "something religious"—the last phrase Maurice himself would have appreciated—in the air, which was not to be found elsewhere I went, and it is hardly too much ■ say that the voice and manner of the preacher—his voice and manner in the reading desk, at least as much as in the pulpit—have lived in my memory ever since, as no other voice and manner have ever lived in it. The half stern, half pathetic emphasis with which he gave the words of the Confession, "And there is no health in us," throwing the weight of the meaning on to the last word, and the rising of his voice into a higher plane of hope as he passed away from the confession of weakness to the invocation of God's help, struck the one note of his life—the passionate trust in eternal help—as it had never been struck in my hearing before, though I never again saw or heard him without again hearing it, much as I find it pervading every page of this striking book. No wonder that, in spite of the singular and voluminous monotony of the book, for every letter it contains is written in just the same key, men so eagerly read it to convince themselves that once at least in our generation a whole life has been lived, not in the effort to escape from eternal realities, but in deep dread of losing sight of them even for a moment. Maurice was a witness, if in our day we have ever had a witness, to eternal life, and to eternal life in that sense in which he had learnt to define it from St John "This is life eternal, to know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." His voice in prayer had that thrill in ■ which betrays the recognition of something deeper than human nature, and ■ eye the fixity of one spell bound by a spiritual power, to its discernment of which the gazer feels himself compelled to bear witness.

Yet a simpler and homelier man there never was in this world, indeed he was one who, though he could hardly speak without showing that his mind was occupied with invisible realities, had a quite pathetic sense of his own inadequacy to do what he desired to do, and the tenderest possible sympathy with the like incapacities of others. Indeed, his own idea of himself was curiously unlike the truth. He felt deeply his own want of sympathy with most human enjoyments, and tells Mr. Kingsley that he is a "hard Puritan, almost incapable of enjoyment; though I try," he adds, "to feel no grudge against those who have that which my conscience tells me it is not a virtue but a sin to want." Evidently the sin of which he chafed against himself was his joylessness, and envy of the joyousness of others, and also the tendency which the sight of evil in others had to provoke anger in himself of a kind which he could not justify, and which he told himself was Pharisaic. On one occasion, when the attacks levelled at his brother in law John Sterling, though then no longer living, had greatly grieved him, he writes — "Love and truth seem to lose all connection with the name of religion, and God to be utterly forgotten by those who use His name every moment. I wish to confess the sins of the time as my own. Ah! how needful do I feel it, for the sins of others produce such sin in me, and stir up my unsanctified nature so terribly." His theory of himself obviously was that he was deficient in human feeling, but that this consciousness of deficiency in human feeling was good for him, because it enabled him to refer to the divine love alone, all the consciousness he had of being able to stir the hearts of others. In a most characteristic letter to myself which Colonel Maurice has published, he says, "The sense of our substantial union as men with Christ, and of His union with the Father, sometimes comes to me with overpowering conviction, not of delight such as a Santa Theresa or Fénelon may have felt, but to its stern, hard, scientific reality, which makes me long that I had the fervour and earnestness in making my belief known, which I admire and ought not to envy in other men. But at other times I can thank God for having granted me a cold, uncordial temperament and constitution, on purpose that I may refer all love, and all power of acting upon the reason and the conscience and the heart to Him. Some day I hope our tongues may be loosed, and that we may as earnestly speak of what we feel to be deep and universal, as we drop what we find to be only transitory and for a few." What he chiefly found fault with in himself was his imaginary hardness, his deficiency in keen human emotions and sympathies, though this deficiency was a mere inference of his own from his want of a vivid perceptive and sensitive life, such as he saw with admiration, for instance, in his close friends Charles Kingsley and Tom Hughes. Whether he really felt, as he so often implies that he did, the temptation of the Pharisee to judge harshly the sins of others, more powerful within him than very inferior men feel it, is of course impossible to say. But if he did, no one ever contended against that temptation more successfully, or warned the world so well of its own Pharisaic bias. But it is true, I think, that Maurice did feel so strongly upon him the spell of the eternal and invisible will, that he had some reason to dread the temptation to identify himself with himself, and to speak as if that which he discerned outside him were really part of him. Certainly he did dread this temptation much more than he dreaded the ordinary weaknesses to which he was liable. He had a warm temper, and accepted himself freely of having indulged it, but he never accused himself of this with half the same bitterness with which he accused himself of Pharisaically judging others. He knew the extent of the one danger, but he never seemed able to measure for himself the extent of the other. Bearing witness, as his whole nature did, to the eternal world, he was always, he thought, in danger of imagining that what he judged to be evil, God must judge to be equally evil, and consequently there was no sin on which he passed such vehement and stern sentences, for he always believed that those vehement and stern sentences were passed virtually upon himself. Colonel Maurice gives us one very curious illustration of this in the interesting chapter on the controversy with Dr. Mansel. Maurice had always accused himself of not having been tender enough with the sceptical leanings of Sterling, and of having shown dogmatic hardness in dealing with Sterling's doubts. He refers to this in his remarks on the agnostic theory of Mansel with the same poignant self-reproach that he had always felt, saying that the remembrance of hard and proud words spoken against those who were crying out for truth will always be the bitterest. He remembers for one who holds that the Bible testifies, from its first page to its last, that God does implant and does satisfy the yearning for truth, and does satisfy it by unveiling

Himself to ■ who really seek Him. Dr Mansel, in his profound ignorance of Maurice's general drift, style, and character, was blind enough to suppose that this was a sneer directed against him, though the whole drift of his own book, against the teaching of which Maurice was protesting, had been to prove that God does not and cannot so unveil Himself to men as Maurice believed, but can only give us "requitative" hints, carefully-adapted rules of action—working hypotheses concerning Himself—on the assumption of which He directs us for all practical purposes to proceed. This blunder of Dr. Mansel's exactly illustrates the frequent inappropriateness of Maurice's language for the purpose of conveying his meaning, even when that meaning was nearest his own heart. In the intensity of his earnestness, he wrote on as if in soliloquy, without clearly representing to himself either the class of people or the individual person for whose immediate benefit he was writing, and expressing himself much as he would have expressed himself to the most intimate friend who perfectly understood the reticence and allusions by which he qualified almost all his teaching. The great waste of energy of which I have spoken was probably never better illustrated than in his answers to Dr. Mansel, full of noble truth and passion as they were. The Dean did not catch his drift at all, and even the theologians of the day hardly caught his drift, it was only those who had got the key to his mind from the study of many previous writings who really understood what he meant. And yet what he meant was intrinsically lucid as well as true, and was marked by large intellectual grasp. There was no economy of spiritual power possible to him.

Perhaps that ■ the reason why Maurice influenced those who once fell under his spell so much, for it is this wealth of energy, which is unable to economize its efforts, that does exert the greatest effect when ■ produces an effect at all. When he was still a young man of twenty-five, Arthur Hallam, the subject of "In Memoriam," wrote to Mr. Gladstone: "I do not myself know Maurice, but I know many whom he has moulded like a second nature, and these, too, men eminent for intellectual powers, to whom the presence of a commanding spirit would, in all other cases, be a signal rather for rivalry than reverential acknowledgment. The effect which he has produced on the minds of many at Cambridge by the single creation of that society of the Apostles (for the spirit though not the form was created by him) is far greater than I can dare to calculate, and will ■ felt both directly and indirectly in the age that is upon us." Archdeacon Hare one of the authors of the "Guesses at Truth," told Mr. Llewelyn Davies that, in his belief, "no such mind as Maurice's had been given ■ the world since Plato's." And though there was no trace in Maurice of that exquisite imaginative grace which makes Plato's philosophy so much more fascinating than the philosophy of every other human thinker, there is no doubt that he had more of Plato's eye for discerning the evidence of a superhuman origin of truth, and of the complete incapacity of our minds to originate the highest truths which it is given them to perceive, than any Englishman of our century, Coleridge himself—to whom he owed so much—not excepted. There has probably never been a thinker who has more perfectly realized himself, and more successfully compelled others to realize, that the truth and our knowledge of the truth are of very different orders of importance, that needful as it often is for us to know the truth, the truth itself produces its most potent effects whether we know it or not, the only consequence of our ignorance of it being, that when ignorant of it we often stumble up against it and hme ourselves, whereas if it could cease ■ be, we should cease to be with it. This being Maurice's profound conviction, he naturally held that Revelation—the truth concerning His own being voluntarily communicated to us by Him who is the truth—must be infinitely the most important part of all truth, though it cannot of course be separated for a moment from the truths concerning our condition which God has enforced upon us by the gradual training of our minds and bodies. This was what made Maurice a theologian. He could not read the history of the Hebrew people without feeling assured that God had trained that particular race for the express purpose of manifesting His own nature through it to men, and thus he regarded as the great complement and key to the lessons which in all other races man had been taught concerning the significance of human nature, and ■ the otherwise inexplicable yearnings and wants by which that nature is penetrated. Miss Wedgwood, in the very striking paper on Maurice which she has contributed ■ the British Quarterly Review, has contested Maurice's reverence for facts, on the ground that there were a good many facts to which he could not even persuade himself to pay attention. She refers to the facts from which scientific men are supposed to deduce almost all their general views of the meaning of the universe, and I have no doubt that, if challenged, she could also illustrate her meaning by the utter indifference which Maurice showed to such criticisms as those of Bishop Colenso on the historical accuracy of the Pentateuch, through his inability to conceive that the kind of inaccuracy in the Bible for which Bishop Colenso contended, had any relevancy at all to his own conviction that the Bible contains the key to human history and destiny. Yet I cannot think that Miss Wedgwood is right in regarding Maurice's indifference to these facts as significant of a want of reverence for fact in general. So far as I can judge, it never occurred to him that either physical science or historical criticism, whatever might come of either, could possibly break down either the truth or the importance of revelation. He did not meddle very much with either, because he did not think himself well fitted to do so with effect, and he had the humblest possible opinion of his own powers whenever he travelled out of the range of truths pressing closely upon his own mind. But though I have often regretted that he did not pay more attention to the methods of physical science and of historical criticism, I cannot say that I think his neglect do so betrayed the smallest want of reverence for fact. What it did betray was a great want of reverence for theories which he regarded as unintelligible and unjustifiable generalisations from facts which he was eager to acknowledge. He had no more belief that the discovery of uniform laws of phenomena could disprove the possibility of the supernatural facts recorded in the Bible, than he had that the discovery of a mass of inaccurate figures in the Pentateuch could disprove the truth that Moses had been led by God when he guided his people through the wilderness to the borders of the promised land. Indeed he had never entered into the minds of the men who began life without any belief except in the uniformity of the outside world, or the minds of the men who supposed that the first guarantee of divine revelation must be the perfect accuracy of the figures and minute incidents with which the memory of that revelation was mixed up. It is a pity, I think, that he did not more earnestly endeavour to master both states of mind, and to say exactly what one who had entered into those states of mind, but who held his own faith, might have said. But his neglect to do so, was, I believe, due much more to an excessive indifference to theory, than to the smallest indifference to fact. I should say that whenever he thought any fact established by history, he was disposed even to overestimate its importance. Consider, for instance, his frank surrender of, his own—to me unintelligible—attachment to the practice of subscription at the Universities, and to the practice of reading the Athanasian creed in churches, so soon as he saw that it was simply impossible to make men in general accept his own view of the meaning of both practices. Consider again his ardent political constitutionalism, which was wholly founded on his reverence for institutions which had proved their strength. Consider further his extreme prudence in directing the co-operative societies which he devoted so much of his time, and the anxiety with which he strove to keep out all innovations for which the theorists or dreamers amongst his companions contended. Again, to me the charm at once of such books as "The Prophets and Kings of the Old Testament," and of such books as his "Metaphysical and Moral Philosophy," depends almost entirely on the love for fact shown in both, the naked realism with which he accepts such histories as Jehu's, and the characteristic fidelity with which he recounts the teaching of Hobbes or Spinoza, and connects it with the facts of their external lives. The admiration Maurice always felt for men who openly confessed themselves in the wrong—as Mr. Gladstone, for instance, did on the Maynooth question—was, I believe, really founded, as he himself said that it was, on his belief that facts are "angels of the Lord," against which it is useless and impious to struggle. No doubt, like most idealists, he made at times a long struggle for opinions of his own, which he had taken for something more than opinions; but I do not think he ever on any subject once realised the relevancy of a fact, without endeavouring to ascertain its full significance and bearing, with a humility all his own. "The vesture of God's own ideas must be facts," he writes to a son, who had told him how he had heard it argued that a Christian legend which appealed to the conscience, might produce the same result as a Christian fact. "If he reveals His ideas to us, the revelation must be through facts. . . I believe the modern process of idealising tends to destroy ideas and facts both, and to leave nothing but a certain deposit of both. The sensation novel is the appropriate sink or cesspool for this deposit. All historical criticism is good, it seems to me, just so far ■ it tests facts, in love and reverence for facts and for what facts contain; all is bad and immoral which introduces the notion that ■ signifies little whether they turn out to be facts or no, or the notion that their reality as facts depends on certain accidents in the narration of them." I think Maurice's reverence for facts was profound, but that the facts which he regarded as "the vesture of God's ideas," and not the facts which he regarded ■ "the accidents of the narration," were those ■ which he accorded this reverence. And often, no doubt, he put by as an unimportant "accident in the narration," what another may have held to be of ■ essential character. Now of course the most sincere believer in the sacredness of facts as "angels of the Lord," must select for himself which facts are cardinal and which are not. To the man who believes that he has to establish the credit of the Bible, before he even thinks of guiding himself by it, the cardinal facts will be the small consistencies or the small inconsistencies of the narrative, and he will postpone all question of learning from it the mind and character of God, till he is quite sure that all the human joints and seams are in perfect order. To Maurice, who never dreamt of thinking about the Bible from this point of view, and who certainly held that the revelation ■ contained was proved ■ once by the strong light it shed on human nature, and by the fresh power which ■ bestowed on human nature, the stress laid on numerical blunders, on petty historical inconsistencies, and on the minutiae of the literature generally, was hardly intelligible. While Colenso thought Maurice hardly candid, Maurice thought Colenso hardly sober and serious, and too much inclined to weigh grains of dust against the testimony of the soul. How different were their standards of fact may be gathered best, perhaps, from the letter in which Maurice declares that ■ him the Book of Isaiah seems lucidity itself compared with Lord Mahon's "Life of Pitt;" the difference, of course, being that in Isaiah the reference of everything to the divine standard ■ plain, and only the implied human events obscure, while in Lord Mahon's "Life of Pitt" the human events are pretty clearly determined, and only the standard ■ which his policy was referred is wholly obscure and ambiguous. After all, were not Maurice's "facts" the more important class of facts of the two? Events, without their moral motives and their spiritual influences, are hardly facts, and are certainly unintelligible facts. The existence of moral motives and the prevalence of great spiritual influences are facts, and facts of the first order, even where the precise events which proceeded from those motives and exerted those influences are more or less ill-defined and left in shadow. ■ one of Sir Edward Strachey's very interesting letters he tells his correspondent that "Maurice said the other day that if we ignore facts, we change substances for suppositions; that which really does stand under an appearance, for that which we put under it by our imaginations." No more weighty or more scientific remark could be made; but, of course, the question remains as to the criterion by which we are to distinguish the trustworthiness of the appearance Colenso thought ■ could distinguish the untrustworthiness of a history sufficiently by bringing to light a great number of minor discrepancies in it. Maurice thought we could distinguish its trustworthiness as regarded its main features, by comparing the moral and spiritual antecedents in one page of the history with the moral and spiritual consequents in another, and showing how truly they corresponded to each other, and how full of human nature, and how fully verified by our own experience, was the connection between the different stages. For my part I believe that both are right up to a certain point, but that Maurice had got hold of immeasurably the more important criterion of the two.

Perhaps those who have written upon Maurice have not given enough prominence ■ the militant side of his nature. He was essentially a spiritual knight-errant and this was the side of his nature which alone led him into extravagance. Such expressions as those which were called forth from him by a narrowly denominational meeting of "the National Society" are not unfrequent in his life, and are quite Quixotic in their vehemence. "The National Society will either become a mere dead log or it will be inspired with a false demoniacal life by a set of Church clubs, which I do believe will, ten years hence have left the Jacobin Club, and every other, at an immeasurable distance behind them in the race of wickedness. I speak what I feel—would that I trembled ten times more than I do at my own prophecy." And again, in reference to a pamphlet of his own on the Sabbath day: "The working men and many of my friends, will suppose that I write ■ please the religious world, which I hope will hate me more and more, and which I hope to hate more and more." Such passages abound, but though they express Maurice's very serious conviction, that men often do worse things under the plea of what they call fidelity to their religious, or for that matter to their unreligious, opinions than they would ever dare to do simply on their own responsibility, yet I cannot but think that the whole of his horror of clubs, leagues, sects, denominations, irresponsible associations of every kind, is expressed much more in the spirit of a knight errant who has had to fight against them, almost unarmed, than in the spirit of sober judgment. He had learnt from the Bible to fight boldly, and the spirit of the soldier ran through his whole life. No man was a more generous enemy when he knew his antagonist. But no man was a more vehement foe when he was charging against what he thought—often hastily—to be a spirit of evil sheltered under the vague authority of unknown and irresponsible organs. He writes to Mr Ludlow that in his opinion the Bible is the history of God's conflict with evil, and that it assumes that evil is not to be crushed out by omnipotence, but to be vanquished in what may be called a fair fight. "The question is whether the unintelligibility of evil and the omnipotence of God is a reason for not regarding Him as carrying on a war against evil, and for not expecting that in that war evil will be vanquished. I know that there are some who think so. For God ■ make war instead of crushing evil, if it can be crushed at all, by a simple fiat, is for them a sinful absurdity. What I say is, that, if ■ be, the Bible is from beginning to end an absurdity, for ■ is the book of the wars of the Lord. It does not define evil, but it assumes evil, it assumes evil to be in a will, it assumes evil not to be vanquishable by an omnipotent fiat, it sets forth a process by which it has been overcome in a number of wills, it teaches us to pray, 'thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven,' where it is done perfectly, it says that if we pray according to God's will, He hears us, and we shall have the petition which we ask of Him.' And it is as a knight errant fighting in the wars of the Lord that Maurice must chiefly be regarded. At the same time a knight errant is not always in a judicial frame of mind, and I cannot help thinking that when Maurice was attacking 'the religious world,' or 'the religious press,' or any other anonymous organ of 'religious' notions which seemed to him profoundly unreligious, he almost forgot that these people, however they might be hoodwinked by ignoring their individual responsibility, had still the consciences and spirits of men. "I have heard," he writes in one very able letter to Sir T. Acland, "of a poor creature in ■ Luke's in a lucid moment snatching a lady by the arm who was visiting the asylum, with the exclamation, 'Have you thanked God for your reason ■ day?' and then relapsing into fury. Surely one of these men [political journalists] might say ■ either of us, 'Have you thanked God to-day for having passed through a debating society with any portion of your souls undestroyed?' and at least to one of us, 'Have you meddled with periodicals, and have you thanked God that you still think, love, go to church, and find any one ■ love you?'" There is all the pent up wrath here of a man who felt how full the press of his day was of real pretension and dishonest judgment, and doubtless both in that day and in this there was enough justification for wrath. But it is poured out as the soldier pours out his wrath on the foe whom he is fighting, not as the judge passes sentence on the offender whose case he has heard. And while the soldier-like element in Maurice was one of the noblest aspects of his nature, it often led him into extravagant expressions, which he would, on calmer consideration, have himself described as overstrained and perhaps uncharitable. For it is possible surely to be uncharitable in associations or sects, as well as in individuals. Indeed, he says in one letter to Archbishop Trenchard, that "the spirit dwells in the body, and in each of its members as such, and not as individuals. The spirit in an individual is a fearful contradiction." ■ that be so, the spirit which unites men together in any association, however temporary, is the true bond of that association, and if that be on the whole good, which no man will decile off hand that it is not, even though it be anonymous and insufficiently weighted with responsibility, there must be uncharitableness in bitterly condemning it. Maurice, however, had seen so much of the evil spirit in religious and political coteries and sects, that he was apt to charge at them whenever he came upon them, almost as if they must be spiritual freebooters and foes of truth and peace. It is for the same reason, I think, that his many self-accusations seem to the reader extravagant. He accuses himself of being sinful in not taking a more vivid enjoyment in the works of nature and the natural life—a matter over which surely a man has about as little control as he has over the fineness or bluntness of his senses, of the "vice" of reserve, of having resisted God's goodness more than any others of his fellow creatures, and so forth, in almost every conceivable way. He had, in fact, none of that patience and toleration for what he found deficient in himself, which Fénélon presses on us as a duty wherever it does not cover a really false self-excuse. But this again is due to the militant spirit which was so strong in Maurice. He could not have tilted so chivalrously against all the moral and spiritual tyrants of the day, if he had not tilted with still more passionate fervour against the weaknesses and sins which he discovered in his own heart. In his indignation against himself he called himself cold blooded. ■ reality Maurice had the hot blood of the genuine reformer, the reformer who begins by assailing himself.

But knight errant ■ he was, there was no caprice or tolerance of caprice in Maurice. His aggressiveness was the aggressiveness of spiritual chivalry against the dogmatists who in his belief had repelled men from Christ, and nothing shocked him more than the prospect of obtaining followers for himself at the cost of the Church and the Church's Master. His whole teaching was a protest against the delusion of redemption through opinion, whether right or wrong, and an assertion of redemption through the life of God incarnate in the nature of man. "The light of the sun is not in you, but out of you, and yet you can see everything by it if you will open your eyes," was the analogy by which he loved to illustrate the difference between the power of opinion and the power of that truth of which even the correctest opinion is but a faint reflection. He held this so strongly that he made light even of the duty of bringing feeling into harmony with faith. "Faith first and feeling afterwards is, I believe, the rule which we are always trying to reverse," he writes, and that is one of the keys of his teaching. "In quietness and confidence is our strength," ■ says again, "but not in thinking of quietness and confidence, or grieving that we have so little of either." In a word, Maurice was one of the greatest of those teachers who have impressed upon us that it is not by virtue of any conscious state of ours that we can be redeemed, but by a power which can dispense, and dispense even for an indefinite time, with our own recognition of its beneficence, just as the body is restored to health by influences of the life giving character of which we are often quite unaware. Once, when a lady asked him his belief as to our recognition of each other hereafter, he replied that that question always made him say to himself, "Ah, how little we have recognised each other here! may not that be the first great step in recognition?" and he would have applied the same remark in an even stronger sense to our recognition of the source of truth. Our recognition of the truth may be necessary to our own happiness, but it is the heat and light which proceeds from it, not our recognition of that heat and light, which heals us. And we may surely say the same of Maurice himself. How little did we recognise him here, and how much, in spite of that want of recognition, did he effect for us! May it not be the first step in our recognition of him hereafter, that we should understand how little in reality we ever recognised him truly here?

"I MEAN TO WAIT FOR JACK."

A Fugue for Fables.

By FREDERICK LAMBRIDGE, M.A., Author of "SONGS IN SORCERY."

SWEET Kate at Wyndham's Dairy, and Jack of Oldham Mill—

Oh, long they woo'd and fond they woo'd, a faithful Jack and Jill
But times were bad for lass and lad, and sadly both confess'd
'Twas not the thing ■ buy the ring before they'd lined the nest.
"Courage, lad!" said Katie. "Yes, we'll have to wait;
But though, my dear, it's twenty year, I'll take no other mate."

But England wanted Jacky, for war was in the air,
And arms more grim were press'd on him than Katie's bonny pair.
So all through Spain, in rough campaign, he chivied bold Mossoo,
And fired his gun and made him run like sun at Waterloo.

When the lads came round her, Katie bade them pack.

There's girls enow * for you to woo; I mean to wait for Jack."

The grey in Katie's ringlets were mingling with the brown,
When, bump-a thump, an eager stump came pegging through the town.
"It's me, you see, come back," says he, "except a leg or so;
And safe and sound here's twenty pound; so let the parson know."

Jingle, jangle, jingle! set the bells a-chime,

And health and bliss to love like this that bravely bides its time.

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE AMERICAN BISON.

By C. F. GORDON CUMMING.

AMONG the many sources of grievance which incite the red men of America to look with hatred and dread on the white men who have despoiled them of their birth-right, none is more valid than the cruelly wanton wholesale destruction of those vast herds of buffalo (or, more properly speaking, American bison*), which, till the Anglo-Saxon appeared on the scene, afforded a never-failing supply of food for all the Indian tribes, who deemed their wild cattle ■ have been specially provided for their sustenance by the Great Spirit, and who rarely slew more than were necessary to supply the tribe with needful food.

How the name of buffalo came to be applied to a creature ■ totally unlike the buffalo of Asia, I am at a loss to imagine; the latter, with ■ slate-coloured hide, low forehead, and large retreating horns, being one of the most docile and humble-looking ■ animals, whereas the American bison, though in truth a timid and inoffensive beast, has an appearance of the utmost ferocity, derived from the huge bulk of his forequarters and head, his shaggy mane and fiery eye. He ■ an unwieldy creature, and will stupidly stand still, apparently never dreaming of danger, while a score ■ his fellows are shot down by his side. Yet at other times ■ will charge madly at some object—a man, or, perhaps, a railway train, rushing onward ■ full gallop, with a lumbering, thundering, heavy tread.

Few creatures are more singularly devoid of the instinct with which most animals are so largely endowed. Once they have decided on a line of march nothing will turn them aside. They will deliberately rush up to the hunter, or approach danger in almost any form that may present itself. In the same way, should they have occasion to cross a stream, they plunge in recklessly, and as likely as not select the very spot where a dangerous quicksand has formed.

A notable instance of this occurred in 1867, when a herd of about four thousand bison endeavoured to cross the South Platte River. The waters were barely two feet in depth, but quicksands had formed in the channel, and the foremost ranks of bison stuck fast and commenced to sink. Those immediately in the rear, goaded on by the horns and pressure of those farther back, pushed onward, trampling over their unlucky leaders, but only to share their fate, being immediately drawn into the quicksands beyond. This terrible struggle continued till the whole bed of the river, half a mile in width, was literally covered with dead or dying bison, and ■ was estimated fully two thousand must have perished in the attempt to cross the stream.

At the time when the tide of white men began to pour westward, the bison ranged in countless myriads over the vast plains which lie between the Rocky Mountains and the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. At different seasons they migrated from one district to another, sometimes in separate herds, at other times so many herds joined company that they formed one vast army, covering many miles of country. Thus Mr. Blackmore has told us¹ how, in the autumn of 1868, while ■ was crossing the plains on the Kansas Pacific Railroad, for a distance of upwards of a hundred and twenty miles, between Ellsworth and Sheridan, the train passed through an almost unbroken herd of bison. The plains were blackened with them, and the train had to stop to allow unusually large herds to pass. A few years later, when travelling over the same line of railroad, it was a rare sight ■ see a few herds of from ten ■ twenty bison.

Very similar was his experience in the southern district between the Arkansas and Cimarron Rivers. He tells us that in 1873 he travelled over a tract of a hundred miles south of Fort Dodge, and was never out of sight of bison, but in the following autumn, on travelling over the same district, ■ found the whole country whitened with bleached and bleaching bones, and did not see bison (buffalo, he calls them, according to American custom) till he was well within the Indians' reserved territory, and then only in scanty bands. For the remorseless hide-hunters had ravaged the country, slaughtering wholesale, old and young, in season and out ■ season. For forty miles along the north bank of the Arkansas River there was a continuous line of putrescent carcasses, rendering the air pestilential and offensive to ■ degree. They lay so thickly strewn that, in one spot of four acres, Mr. Blackmore counted sixty-seven carcasses. The hunters had formed a line of camps along the banks of the river and had shot down the thirsty creatures when, night and morning, they came to the river to drink.

In like manner Colonel Dodge relates how, in May, 1871, he drove along the course of the Arkansas River, and for a distance of twenty-five miles his route lay along a broad valley which was literally alive with countless small herds of from fifty to two hundred bison, forming in fact one immense herd. The whole country appeared one moving mass of these shaggy black creatures, travelling slowly to the northward.

On catching sight of so unusual an object as a horseman, many herds in succession stampeded and started at full speed directly towards him, pouring down from the hills, no longer in separate herds, but in one immense compact mass of plunging animals, mad with fright, and irresistible as an avalanche. It was an awful moment, but the wary hunter waited till the advancing column was within fifty yards of him when he fired, and the startled herd divided and poured onward in two streams, to right and left of him. This occurred again and again in the course of that morning's drive, and though he only fired in self-defence, not being in want of meat, ■ nevertheless had twenty-six buffalo tongues in his wagon ere he reached his destination. Had he been inclined for butchery, there was literally no limit to the numbers he might have slain.

In each of the many minor herds, the cows and calves are always placed in the centre, and the bulls form a protecting ring all round them. When two herds meet and merge the same arrangement is observed, the bulls of both parties simply extending themselves in a larger circle, so as to form a strong wall of protection. Strange to say, in the hour of danger the cow-mother unhesitatingly abandons her calf, and leaves it entirely in charge of the bulls, who fulfil their duty as most devoted guardians.

Colonel Dodge relates an instance of this, which was told to him by an eye-witness, whose attention was attracted by seeing a little knot of six or eight bull-bison standing in a close circle with their heads outwards, while in a concentric circle, at some fifteen paces distance, sat at least a dozen large grey wolves. After a few moments the bulls, still keeping in a compact mass, started on a trot to join the main herd, distant about half a mile. Then it was seen that these faithful fathers were guarding a poor little new-born calf, who was scarcely able to walk. After going about a hundred paces it lay down, and the bulls formed a circle as before; the wolves, who had trotted beside them, again sat down in an outer circle, anxiously watching their opportunity. It was too late in the evening and too far from the camp for the spectator of this strange scene to linger till the end, but he felt no doubt that the little calf had been safely conveyed to his mother.

It is lamentable to think of the rapidly approaching extermination of these valuable creatures. Although the white men have all along killed them far more recklessly than the Indians would ever have done, it is only within the last ten years that the cruel wholesale slaughter has been carried on systematically. In 1878 speculators seem for the first time to have fully realized the market value of the hides, and as buds of prey gather around the cañon, so did countless needy adventurers pour in from all quarters, all bent on the destruction of these great herds of wild cattle. From that time the luckless bison were allowed not a moment of rest or peace. Merchants in every town along the different railway lines (the Union Pacific, Kansas Pacific, and others) furnished ammunition and outfits to countless hunting butchers, and established a great trade in hides. Many of the men thus sent out were such raw hands that they wounded far more than they killed, and turned multitudes of hides from sheer ignorance of how to preserve them. So, although hundreds of thousands of skins were sent to market, they probably did not represent one-fifth of the actual number of slaughtered beasts, all of which were slain solely for their hides, and an incalculable amount of good meat was utterly wasted.

When this had gone on for about a year, an effort was made by the merchants to organize the hunting expeditions on a still larger scale, and to take measures for the better preservation of the hides, and for smoking and curing the meat, but even after this the waste continued to be altogether appalling. The official statistics given by Colonel Dodge present a terrible picture of ruthless, selfish destruction, of what should have been protected as State property, for the fur use of all men. In 1872, he says, there was apparently no limit to the numbers of buffalo in the Arkansas Valley, they seemed to be everywhere, in countless throngs. In the autumn of 1873 he went over the same ground. Where, in the previous year, he had seen such vast herds, there were now myriads of carcasses—the vast plain, which only a twelve month before teemed with animal life, was transformed to a dead, putrid desert, the air foul with sickening stench. He travelled ninety miles ere he found a herd, and even there the boundary line of the State was picketed with hunters, guarding the boundary of the Indian territory, into which they dared not venture. There seemed to be more hunters than buffalo.

All along the banks of the South Platte the enemy were encamped, knowing that in that thirsty land the herds must come to the river to drink. Every attempt to approach the water was the signal for a volley of rifle bullets, and but for the merciful protection of night the luckless bison would have had no chance at all. Even the heaven-sent darkness was of little avail, for the butchers lighted fires all along the river banks, and fired guns at intervals to drive back the herds, so that, though mad with thirst, they were sometimes kept from approaching the water for four days and nights.

Thus day and night the miserable creatures are incessantly harassed. "Every drink of water, every mouthful of grass, is at the expense of life. No sooner do they stop to feed, than the sharp crack of a rifle warns them to change position. They are driven from one water-hole to meet death at another." The shooter hides himself in some favourable spot, and fires at the nearest beast. The others, attracted by the blood, collect round their wounded comrade. Again the rifle does its work, and the poor stupid herd only crowd more wonderingly round the sufferers staring in unbecoming amazement as one after another totters and falls. The game is so near that each shot suffices for one life, and the number killed is only limited by the number of animals in the herd, or the prospect of the hunting party being able to skin them.

In the beginning of this hide trade the slaughter was so reckless that multitudes of bison were left to rot without even an attempt to skin them. Colonel Dodge states that he has himself counted one hundred and twelve carcasses inside of a semicircle of two hundred yards radius, all of which had been killed by one man from the same spot, in less than three-quarters of an hour!

When the first haphazard slaughter was abandoned in favour of an organized system it was found expedient that each hunting party should consist of four men—one to shoot, two to skin, and a fourth to stretch the hides, take care of the camp, and cook. In districts where the game is abundant more skimmers were enlisted. The outfit was as meagre as could well be conceived: a couple of blankets to each man, a common tent, a Dutch oven, a ten-gallon water-keg (very necessary to men who might have to camp far from water), a coffee-pot, frying-pan, and a tin plate and cup for each man constituted the baggage. The skinning knives did duty as table knives, and forks or spoons are superfluous. Nor were the stores supplied by the merchants luxuries. A few pounds of coffee and of sugar, a little salt, a few beans, and a sack of flour, completed the commissariat. Of course the meat supply was unlimited.

Even where preparations were made for preserving the good flesh, only the tongue and hind quarters were saved. "The loin, ribs, hump—all the best and most savoury parts of the animal—were left to rot, or were eaten by wolves. In the very large majority of cases, the whole carcass was left to rot where it fell." Is it not pitiful to hear of such wanton and wasteful slaughter and loss of good meat which, by reasonable care and judgment, might all have been utilised to feed the multitudes in other districts?

The statistics of this massacre, given by Colonel Dodge, would seem incredible, were they not so carefully compiled by one so thoroughly acquainted with his subject. He finds that in the three years, 1872-73-74, no less than three million one hundred thousand bison, at the lowest computation, must have perished at the hands of white men, to supply the quantity of hides delivered by the principal railways, while fully another million must be estimated as having been taken by the Hudson Bay Company, the hunters from Mexico, Colorado, Texas, and certain Indian tribes, or sent in the form of buffalo robes to the Western States. In the same period, various other Indian tribes (seeing their Heaven given herds so ruthlessly destroyed) have striven at least to secure as many hides as possible for the manufacture of robes, so they are credited with the slaughter of one million two hundred thousand. Thus a total of about five and a half million of bison are estimated to have perished in the short space of three years!—a number not very far short of that of all the cattle in Great Britain.

While this selfish destruction of a national food supply was going on, Congress talked a good deal of the necessity of interfering, but took no action. It was suggested that at least these wholesale robbers of public property should be heavily taxed, and that the buffalo pelts might very well be made to pay a tax of £1 on each skin, and that every pelt not having the Government duty stamp should be forfeited. Thus the buffalo hide trade would at least have become a fruitful source of revenue. The subject was, however, allowed to drop—the property of the State was all monopolised by a body of adventurers, and only the railway companies derived large profits from the freight of enormous packets of hides.

Meanwhile, "many of the wild Indians of the plains, deprived of their ordinary sustenance, driven to desperation by starvation (Government rations not being forthcoming), have taken to the war-path." Many of the tribes, hitherto friendly to white men, have joined the hostile Sioux. White men shiver in the general suffering. Many a hardy pioneer and settler, who hitherto has always counted on a winter store of meat, is now deprived of this natural resource, and complains bitterly, and with good cause, of the selfish greed which has destroyed the food supply of the country.

So early as 1873 this depredation was realised, when the harvest in Kansas having been destroyed by the ravages of grasshoppers, troops were sent by Government to kill meat for the starving families of the settlers, but on reaching the hunting grounds the soldiers found that the "buffalo skimmers" had been before them, and had scarcely left a buffalo in the district.

So the vast herds have vanished from the Great Plain—melting away like snow before the summer sun. Already the American bison is well nigh an extinct animal. The fact that he has not yet been wholly exterminated is due only to the nature of the ground where some herds still find refuge, far from their natural haunts, and in districts well guarded by Indians. Here for a few years longer they may continue to exist—a poor handful of refugees, which alone survive to prove to the Indians and Americans of a future generation that the tales of their ancestors were not altogether fiction.

A Summer Morning on Windermere.

[By F. J. J. J. J.]

A STROLL UP THE BRATHAY.

BY HERBERT RIX, B.A.

"I AM half convinced," said Nathaniel Hawthorne, floating in a skiff on the calm surface of one of those broad rivers of the West, "that the reflection is indeed the reality, the real thing which Nature imperfectly images to our grosser sense. At any rate, the disembodied shadow is nearest to the soul." And the words came to my mind with new force as I paddled across the head of Windermere and paused now and then to gaze downward into the ideal beauty of that reflected world.

But if the unreal seemed to be the actual, still more did the actual seem to be unreal. Any very sudden transition produces something of this impression of unreality, and this perfect calm of unruffled lake and of mountains blue with summer haze, coming so swiftly upon the rush and delirium of London life, seemed more like a dream, or some strange adventure in the world of fancy, than that which we call "reality."

A solitary gull, white and silent, was sailing to and fro in stately curves like some brooding spirit of the air, now hovering for a moment to touch the lake with his webbed feet, now stooping his neck to snatch a drop from the surface in mid-flight, and anon floating far, far away down the glimmering stretch of waters. High overhead, too high for any sound to reach the ear, a flock of wild-duck crossed the sky, travelling painfully in Indian file with outstretched necks and heavy plodding flight. A coo of pigeons from a neighbouring wood, a slumberous murmur of distant waters, and ever and again, a breath whispering through a bank of grassy reeds, served rather to reveal the stillness than to break it.

I turned the prow up stream where the Brathay and Rothay come rolling down together into the head of Windermere. Meadows fringed with "ragged robin" were on the right, and on the left a low bank of sedge, decked here and there with tall heads of yellow and purple iris. Kine grazing along the river margin scampered away, startled by the splash of the skulls. Swallows went skimming to and fro, and gnats played in the shadow of the trees, seeming, from their multitude and swiftness, like a mist upon the surface of the stream. Then a sharp bend to westward gave a peep of Ambleside with the old church set prettily upon the hill; another bend gave a peep of the Langdale Pikes; and finally, a long pull and a strong pull took the boat past the Croft with its fine beeches and smoothly shaven lawns, past high banks of fern and foxglove, and almost beneath the ivied arches of Brathay Bridge.

Beyond this point, the Brathay cannot be explored by water, so I left the boat at Waterhead, took the road across the Rothay, and passing through the white cottages and rose-covered porches of Clappergate, regained the bridge, and resumed the stream at the point where I had left it.

And now, before we commence our walk up the Brathay, let us just sit for a little while upon this low wall, so prettily tufted with the pink blossoms and the red-tinted leaves of herb-robert, and let us listen to the gurgle of the beck as it hurries down among the mossy stones. Or stay! let us choose instead this rocky promontory just beyond the entrance of Brathay Hall, where we can listen to the waters in a louder key, as the stream sweeps over this line of boulders. What a seat for a poet! The very stone on which we stand is a thing of surpassing beauty covered as it is with wild-thyme and golden hawkweed, like stars shining from a purple sky. Look down the stream where the white front of old Brathay gleams through the arching branches of this young oak! Look up the stream where the long vista of oak, birch, larch, and willow, ends in a vision of mountain peaks capped with filmy clouds and mantled with a haze of blue! Look across the stream at the entrance of honeysuckle and wild-rose on the further bank! What wonder that Lakeland is a land of poets! And then, when you have drunk your fill of beauty, follow the river along the Lancashire side, past Brathay church nestling among the pines on yonder rock, and along this woodland path hedged with whortleberries, and overshadowed by lofty trees, with glimpses of the brawling little Brathay all the way.

Emerging from this wood, a stiffish bit of hill brought me presently to Skelwith Fold. There are a few cottages here, and in front of one of them an old labourer was clearing the nettles and rank weeds with a reaping-hook. -

XXV.--5

"Why is this called Skelwith Fold?" I asked him.

"Oo! it's an auld ancient name," he answered, as if that were sufficient explanation for anybody.

"Perhaps it takes its name from some sheepfold?" I suggested.

"Ay, something o' that."

The old man evidently thought, and perhaps rightly, that clearing nettles was more important than speculating on the origin of place-names, so I left him at his work, and took my way through a neighbouring byre to the field beyond, where, from a big rock called "Sow Hill," there is a famous view of the Brathay valley. The village of Skelwith Bridge nestles below, at a distance of something less than half a mile, its white-washed cottages gleaming against the dark foliage behind. Near to the village and a little way above the bridge is Skelwith Force—a rush of white foam between wooded banks. On the left is Lingmoor, on the right, the ragged end of Loughrigg; and between the two rise the Langdale Pikes, cloud capped. I sat and watched them—those grand old Pikes—changing their mood every moment that I looked, now angry, now smiling, now distant and sullen, and then, as the light poured from a cloud rift seeming suddenly to come nearer and nearer till that foaming rill which courses perennially like a tear down one weather-beaten cheek, gleamed into distinctness, and one could trace every wrinkle in the furrowed brow. Anon the rift would close again, a grey mist would steal across the scene, and the “twin brethren” would retire in dignity, feeling, perhaps, that beneath the genial sun shine they had too lightly laid aside their grandeur. Glorious old Pikes! how human you seem to us! and what friendship the heart may come to feel for you, perceiving, as it were, beneath your time-worn faces the living Spirit of Eternal Nature!

A sharp turn to the right now brought me down a steep declivity to Skelwith Bridge, between walls thickly covered with moss, polypodies, wood sorrel, and masses of blue bear's ears. On the way down I overtook a labourer, and as we walked together beneath the shelter of one umbrella (for one of those spasms of rain, so frequent here, had just burst upon us) I asked him if he could explain why people dwell in cities instead of coming to live in these beautiful places.

He was sure he hoped they would not come, he said, for things were dear enough as it was, and that would make them dearer, it was hard for labouring people to make ends meet.

“Is rent so high, then?” I inquired.

“No, ar, t'rent of cottages is terrible low, but victuals is high, and a cart o' coals costes you one and threepence: a shilling at the station and threepence for carting. It only costes you eightpence or ninepence in a town. The children, too, can't work now till they've served their time at school, unless they takes their certificate before, and it ain't one in twenty does that—not in these parts.”

From Skelwith Bridge, caring more for beauty than brevity, I decided to take the field-path along the north of Elterwater, and then, rounding the end of that lake, to follow the course of the Little Langdale Beck to Fell Foot. So I turned up the lane past the hobbin-mill, where piles of burch and sycamore were waiting to be turned and bored and punched into all manner of spindles, reels, pegs and other matters, paused awhile at Skelwith Force to watch the plunge of the river between those two bluffs of rock and the frantic tossing and leaping of the foam below, and then passed out into the fields of standing grass. They were gay, were those two fields, with hawkweed and marguerites, which nodded and laughed together in the breeze, while red-winged butterflies flitted in and out among the flowers, and little slim dragon flies of the brightest blue went darting to and fro or hovering on the bending blossoms. The path led through a coppice on the margin of Elterwater, fragrant with meadow sweet and resplendent with the large blossoms of the meadow cranesbill, and then out into the fields again, with a wall or two to climb and the Langdale Pikes always in front, till finally I struck the road and in half a mile or so brought me to Colwith Force.

Now Colwith Force cannot be seen without a guide, not in the least because you really want one, for the path is perfectly plain, but because she keeps the key in her pocket. So I set myself to find this same guide, for it would not do to pass such a well known waterfall without seeing it. She was not in her cottage, nor was she in her garden. She was not on the bridge, nor up the road, nor in the copse. Messengers of all sorts and shapes and sizes were sent in search of the guide, till, by and-by, up she came, panting in an agony of fear lest she should lose the chance of a sixpence.

The guide safely conducted me along a straight and even path to a point where there was a comfortable seat, whereon she straightway plumped down, and left me to my own devices.

In one respect Colwith Force is somewhat disappointing. It is broken into an upper and a lower fall, and there is no accessible point from which you can get the combined effect of the two. Nevertheless, the picture looking up the stream is very fine, with Wetherlam just coming in between the banks.

I descended a slippery ladder to the rocks below, and spent some time there in viewing the lower reach, while the guide placidly waited for me above. When I rejoined her I ventured to ask whether, under her guidance, anybody had ever fallen over the precipice into that swirling pool of foam beneath and she reformed me very calmly that some body had. He was a gentleman, it seems who was gathering some blackberries, over, balanced himself, and fell sheer down into the yawning chasm. A very wonderful part of the story was that he scrambled out quite unhurt, only "very pale." But the most wonderful of all was that, though two young ladies were with him, neither of them fainted! They must have been plucky ones!

The upward course of the stream takes a sharp bend to the right at this point, so I did the same, following the road up the Little Langdale towards Fell Foot. On the way I stayed for shelter and refreshment at a little road side inn, where a number of minerals and petrifications were displayed upon the parlour table.

"What are these?" I asked, drawing the attention of my hostess to this mineralogical medley.

"They're what Professor Ruskin calls 'fawlsies,' sir, or something o' that name."

This was doubtless a slander on Professor Ruskin's orthodoxy. But why "Professor Ruskin" at all? I wondered, till I learnt that the great art critic often came to this little hostelry—brought parties of friends to see the Langdales, and called here for a cup of tea. I could not but wonder what the Professor thought of the scriptural pictures with which this apartment was adorned—"Joseph and his Brethren" in particular, who really were illustrated in the most excruciating conflicts of colour that malevolence itself could have devised.

There was a young quarryman in the kitchen—an intelligent fellow, with whom I presently fell into some talk.

Men have ■ serve seven years in the quarries, he said, before they get full wages. They then become "ivers" or "trimmers," or take to some other department of the work, keeping mostly to one kind, and earn their pound or two pounds a week, according as the times go. The blasting in the quarries makes very curious echoes, but, talking of echoes, the most curious are heard when the men hunt on foot along the fells with a pack of hounds, it often sounds for all the world as though there were another pack hunting on the opposite range.

The mention of this local form of sport led me to ask about "sport" of another kind—cock fighting—was it still carried on in the Langdales? No, the quarryman replied (and the hostess confirmed the statement), there had been none for eight or ten years past. At one time, indeed, the Langdales were notorious for this cruel pastime, and many were the devices used for eluding the vigilance of the police. For instance, the cock fighters would start off in a cart, with the police following some distance behind, then change places with confederates round ■ corner, so that the police followed the wrong men. Or again, the authorities would get some miking of a cock fight to come off, and sure enough, on the appointed day, boys would be seen carrying canvas bags such as cock-fighters use to convey the birds. The police, of course, would be ■ agog and follow the boys mile after mile over moor and fen, only ■ find, after all, that the bags held not cocks but kittens, the cock fighters, bags, birds, and all, having gone, of course, in a totally different direction.

And then the landlady went on to tell how, at six o'clock one morning, a crowd of men came to her inn, their gaming birds in the usual canvas-bags, how they ate three-quarters of a cheese and never paid for it, how, soon after the men had left, the police arrived.

"'Had any cock-fightin' here?' says they."

"'Well,' says I, 'there was some men with bags; but I couldn't swear through a bag, how could I?'"

Resuming my journey, a hie in the road soon brought me within sight of Little Langdale Tarn, embosomed in an amphitheatre of mountains, with becks radiating down their sides and converging upon the little lake. And from this point a road between rough stone walls, draped thickly with parsley-fens, brought me in due time to the farmhouse at Fell Foot. Here the beck divides, the right-hand branch leading up to Blea Tarn and the left hand to Wrynose Pass; so, as I wanted to explore Blea Tarn first, I asked a rheumatic old farmer who sat upon the "urigg" whether he thought the people of the house would take charge of my knapsack.

"Yes, yer," he answered in the broadest Lancashire, "I'll carra it till t' hoose, an' kape it gun ye coom baack."

I found, in fact, that he was himself the master of Fell Foot, so I delivered up my burden to him and started off for Blea Tarn.

Coming within sight of it, the first thing that strikes one ■ the disparity between the scene and the description given in the "Excursion." The valley is too shallow, it ■ more like a saucer than an "urn," the "treeless nook" has some seventy or eighty trees, the "liquid pool" is as black and forbidding as a pool can be, and cannot be persuaded to "glitter" even in the brightest sunlight. ■ must be remembered, however, that the wanderer and the poet did not approach the valley by this road. They are supposed, as Wordsworth himself has explained, to come over Lingmoor out of the Great Langdale, and if the tourist will take the trouble to climb to that position, ■ will find, as the present writer can testify, that the phrase, "deep as an urn," ■ perfectly accurate from that point of view. As ■ the other discrepancies, they are partly to be accounted for by changes due to time and partly by poetic licence, of which, by his own confession, Wordsworth has allowed himself a good deal in the "Excursion."

While I stood taking these mental notes a coach with tourists from Ambleside drove up behind me. The tourists alighted to walk up the hill, and a gentleman of distinguished appearance addressed himself to me, and seemed anxious to enter into conversation. What did I do? Did I fish? did I paint? I explained that I merely "mooned about;" at which he seemed a little puzzled. As we passed Blea Tarn I pointed it out, since ■ did not seem to have noticed it.

"That is Blea Tarn, and yonder ■ the cottage of the Solitary. This is the scene of the 'Excursion,' you know."

"Oh, indeed! picnic from Keswick or Ulleswater, I suppose?"

Bleas Bridge.

"I mean Wordsworth's 'Excursion,'" I explained.

"Oh! ah! Wordsworth," he echoed, in the tone of one who fancied that he had heard the name somewhere. But at this point of the dialogue he was called upon to remount the coach, and the tourists were soon rattling away through the valley, not one of them so much ■ turning his head to look at the cottage.

For my own part I could not ■ content without seeing something more than the outside thereof, and recalling the passage where the poet describes himself as glancing from the window of an upper room—

"On two huge peaks,
That from a
other vale seemed into them."

I begged the occupant (a young married woman with two children) to let me see the room up-stairs which looked towards the Pikes. She assured me that the Pikes could not be seen from any room in the place; I persuaded her, however, to let me test the question for myself, so—

"We climb the cottage-stairs
And reached a small apartment dark and low."

She was quite right. The "lofty brethren" cannot be seen from any window up-stairs or down; ■ fact, the situation of the dwelling forbids the idea that the Langdale Pikes could ever have been seen from any part of it, for another mountain intervenes. I further satisfied myself by dint of a deal of climbing

[1 r f o]

Colnash Falls

[12 F r h]

that the "stranded ship with keel upturned," and the "altar-stone" were equally fictions of the imagination, or were features borrowed from other localities, while as to the—

Black yew tree whose protruded boughs Darken the silver bosom of the crag, the woman at the cottage declared that there was not a yew tree in the whole valley.

I spent some hours clambering about the fells which surround this little vale, obtaining many splendid views of the surrounding country. Of course I came in for several showers, and these with the wet moss and dripping bracken drenched me to the skin. The people at Fell Foot, however, took pity on me and kindly agreed to put me up for the night, so I dried my clothes and was soon regaling myself on native trout, ham and eggs, oatcake and rich cream in plenty, after which I sat in the old fashioned kitchen as the twilight stole on, and listened with a grave face while the farmer bargained with a stranger from Broughton in the broadest dialect about the sale of a white cow. They found some difficulty in coming to terms, and were forced finally to go down the road to the little inn and see if they could get any light upon the subject there. I did not await their return but found my way to my bedroom, and, lulled by the murmur of the beck, was soon fast asleep.

The next morning I was roused at five o'clock or thereabouts by the clatter of clogs over the rough slated floor of the kitchen below me. The murmur of the water and the song of birds came pleasantly through the cottage casement, and, early as it was, the sunshine was already brilliant.

After breakfast I bade my hostess good-day and took the upward path towards Wrynose. There were but a few miles of mountain walk before me, and yet as I turned my back upon the vale with its little tarn and winding rivulet, and faced the barren crags of Blaise Rigg, I felt like some hermit about to renounce the world for ever and betake himself to the wilderness, so strangely does one lose the sense of proportion amid the sharp contrasts and sudden transitions of this varied district. On the left of the path runs the Brathay Beck, and tracing it upward with the eye, we see where it comes rushing, tumbling, leaping down from Wrynose Fell. Half a mile of climbing brings us to a bridge, with waterfalls above it and waterfalls below, and a waterfall beneath the very arch. And as I sat upon the bridge to take breath two rough-looking fellows came clambering down the rocks, fierce, haggard, hungry, unshaven, and dripping with wet. They had been to a haying, they said, in a neighbouring dale, had lost their way in returning, and had spent the whole night wandering upon the mountains.

They took the downward path and I the upward and as I climbed, the silence deepened, till it was broken only by the tinkling rills falling from rock to rock and the reiterated bleating of one solitary little fall lamb which had lost its dam. Still upward by a zigzag path, now passing behind a bold rock and now coming out again into full view of the valley head, while more than once a sharp shower followed by a burst of sunshine seemed to set the mountain all aflame and to turn the little rills to streams of molten lava. Higher still, till a rush of cold wind told me that I was almost at the level of Wrynose Gap, then straight ahead with Black Crag upon the right and Wettside Edge upon the left, and here at last is the "Three Shire Stone," where Cumberland, Lancashire, and Westmoreland clasp hand in hand.

A tiny trickling thread issuing from a peat bog is all that is now left of the Brathay, but from the same bog there issues another little rill which after a few hesitating twists and turns decides to run in the opposite direction and proves to be one of the many streamlets which go to form the far famed Duddon.

 Trudding with unweary leaps the rushes, through Drood without gliding and by heavy breaks—*

goes the streamlet, gathering force and volume every moment, till at length, where the path drops by a steep descent down the other side of Wrynose, the Duddon plunges down beside it, and foams from rock to rock by a series of cascades all the way to Wrynose Bottom.

Before nightfall I hope to follow that little river past Cockley Beck with its "cottage rude and grey," of which Wordsworth sang in one of the sweetest of his sonnets, past Birks Brig with its Faerie Chasm, and Seathwaite with its memories of Wonderful Walker, and Uipha Kirk, and Broughtown Tower, and many another classic spot, but for the present I pause, and, climbing to a point of vantage, turn to look back upon the Brathay valley. There it lies—the whole valley from Langdale Tarn to Windermere—"beautiful as a wreck of Paradise"—(or why not beautiful as Paradise itself? I for one desire no fairer)—with its rich foliage glowing in the morning sun, and the little river winding adown its length, like that "river which went out of Eden to water the Garden." Looking down upon it thus, in its completeness and its beauty, the heart instinctively rises in gratitude and worship to Him who "sendeth the springs into the valleys which run among the hills."

WELL KNOWN TO THE POLICE.

3 Social Signs

BY THE RIVERSIDE VISITOR

SCATTERED about my district are a number of the "well known to the police" class. Of these it may, of course, be said with literal truthfulness, that the better they are known the less they are liked. But the feeling towards them indicated by this saying varies in degree of intensity. With the rich and refined it is strong, among the poorer and rougher grades of society it is comparatively mild—and my district is essentially a poor and rough one.

In its members of the "well known to the police," and of the "poor but honest" classes, are apt to get socially mixed, while even the more pronounced types of the former class, with whom the poor but honest people will not mix, are not regarded with the horror or terror they usually inspire in the minds of classes farther removed from them. Where habitual criminals are concerned distance generally lends fear rather than enchantment to the view. As a body the "habituals" are no doubt rightly labelled dangerous, but individually they are, as a rule, contemptible beings. Scorn rather than fear is the feeling entertained towards them by those whose fate it is to have to live near them, and who, moreover, have the negative, but in this case important advantage, of having little or nothing to lose by them.

A man or woman may be well known to the police without having been "through their hands," without being actually, or, at any rate, technically, a criminal. They may be known simply as "suspects," as having no visible means of support, as being associated with thieves, or labouring under suspicion of "fencing"—that is to say, of "receiving goods, well knowing them to be stolen." Or they may have only been convicted of drunkenness, or crimes of personal violence arising out of drunkenness—offences which, unfortunately, are not held to cast any very deep stain upon the characters of those committing them. It is with such as these latter that the honest, well disposed poor, to whom a low rent is a greater consideration than a choice of neighbourhood, are to be found mingling—the police, however, well knowing "which is which" of the two classes.

These relatively milder-mannered sections of the "well known" the police class are, as we have said, scattered all over the district. But the "habituals," those who are best known to the police, and with whom the "force" have the greatest trouble, are, as a body, congregated together in one particularly warm little street. As a thieves' quarter this street is an admirable instance of natural selection. It runs "endways on" between the broad general high street of the district and the narrower special high street of the "low" quarter, but stands "blind" to both of them, access to it being gained by cross cuts from an adjoining and parallel street, only a few degrees less warm than itself. The houses are let out in rooms by superior landlords, so that each tenant can profess not to know anything of the business or movements of the others. A still greater advantage—from the "habituals' point of view—lies in the fact that a tolerably active person who knows the "runs" can, without resort to the cross-cuts—which in an emergency might be blocked—make his way into either of the high streets, or some other of the network of back streets lying between them. Outsiders do not care to venture into this warm spot, and the dwellers in it are more than content that it should be so. That the street is particularly dirty, dilapidated, and miscreable looking, goes without saying. Your ordinary thief, if he have a slice of luck, may "do the heavy" while the luck lasts. He may, after his own fashion, dress himself "up to the knocker," live "high" in the matter of eating and drinking, and lord it in the public-houses he "uses," but at all times, alike when flush of money as when hard up, his home is a scene of the direst wretchedness.

The adult denizens of our particular street are, to a man and a woman, "well known to the police," and in this case the knowledge is reciprocal. The habituals are not better known to the police than the police are to them. They know every "copper"—including the plain clothes men who come upon the beat—know them not merely by sight, but know their individual characteristics, if they have any. They could probably tell better than the authorities which of the police are the really "active and intelligent officers." Here it may, perhaps, be worth while to mention that it is a common boast among the criminal classes that even where they do not know a plain clothes man as an old acquaintance, they can always "spot him by sight." These officers are promoted from the ranks, and, say the criminals, can never shake off the policeman manner and bearing, or the "cook's-march" tramp, which characterises the force, not only when on but also when off duty. This fact is by many people held to place the English detective at a great disadvantage, as compared with continental detectives. If such is the case, the position has, at any rate, one counterbalancing advantage. "Rounders"—that is, informers—who would not go to a police office and make a formal statement to be "took down," will quietly give "the tip" to a detective who they know from experience will stick to the "from information received" line, and not bring the informer "into it."

In the street of which we are here speaking the plain-clothes men of the division are frequently to be seen engaged in hunting up evidence or witnesses, or in executing search warrants in connection with cases that are coming off at the courts. But they very seldom venture on to the ground, merely "on the prowl." Most of their work is effected through information received from "pals" or paramours of offenders, who, either from motives of revenge or as a means of playing for safety, "round" upon associates. Whatever "game-mongers" may say or think, thieves do not believe that there is honour among thieves, and their disbelief is founded upon experience. The man who, in their profession, can work single handed is esteemed fortunate. That to pull off a good thing, ■ ■ generally necessary there should be a number in it, is regarded as a great evil under the sun, not on account of the dividing of the spoil which it involves, but because of the danger of "rounding" that invariably lies in there being more than one "in the know."

That the police can tell some curious stories of those who are well known to them is certain, and, if the latter class is to be believed, it is no less certain that some of them could strange tales unfold about individual members of the "force." The police and other persons and things connected with the administration of justice are naturally common subjects of discourse among the criminal classes, most of whom are in a position to speak feelingly upon such topics as the idiosyncracies of magistrates, judges, juries, and the more notable barnstois practicing in the criminal courts. Upon the practical details of prison discipline, and the moves by which its rigours may be softened or evaded by the old birds, or those whose friends are willing and able to resort to "palm greasing," they speak with all the authority of experts.

The "school" occupying our street are a fairly all round set. To use a phrase current among them, they are good for anything, from robbing a church to killing a man. As a matter of fact, they have through some of their number been "in" almost every variety of crime, from petty larceny to downright murder. Even to catalogue the whole school would require more space than is here at command, but we may take a glance at a few, who are visible as we make our way through the street on business purpose bent. We can look openly and without fear. We are free of the street. It ■ known that we are there on business, that our business is not "thief-taking," and that we make a point of abstaining from interference in what is not our business. Among those out of doors this morning is one of the chief notables, a fallen Lucifer of the local pandemonium. A few years back he reigned supreme among his fellows. He lectured it over all and sundry in the "snug little pubs" of the neighbourhood, drinking uninvited out of other people's pewters, and none daring to say him nay. He had done twelve months for crippling for life the "chucker out" of one of these pubs, and two years for a nearly successful attempt to "corpoa" a policeman. He was "big dog" to a disorderly house, and when called upon in virtue of his office to turn out of the establishment those who had been robbed in it he did not do his spitting gently. He figured in the police reports as the Terror of —, and a terrific personage he certainly was, and more terrific in word than even in deed. Few who knew him cared to encounter him, and when any with whom he sought a quarrel were keeping out of his way, he would go about announcing in the most horrific phraseology that ■ would "woller in their blood at the earliest opportunity. Apart from his occupation of bully, his line was robbery from the person, generally accompanied with violence. When garotting became the mode with gentlemen of his stamp he adopted it, and thereby began his fall. One of his exploits in this line was brought home to him. He was sentenced ■ a term of penal servitude and a flogging. An account of the administration of the latter punishment appeared in the newspapers, and from this account ■ became known that the Terror of — had made the most abject appeals to be let off, and howled dreadfully under his castigation. From that hour his glory was departed, and in the forcibly expletive style of the locality he was denounced as a cur for having borne himself so lubberly over his "back scratching." In due course he was liberated upon a ticket-of-leave, and made straight for his old haunts. The woman with whom he had been living at the time of his committal, was at the date of his release cohabiting with another and younger bully. Having ascertained this, the "ticket of leave" went to her lodgings, and, finding her standing in the doorway, "floored her like a shot." Hearing her screams, her young man rushed out, asking "what was up," to which the returned convict replied by recommending him to say his prayers if he knew any, as he had not five minutes to live, for he, the speaker, was going to "woller in his blood up to the elbows." The younger man, however, proved himself the better tactician. He answered not in words, but going upon the principle that the first blow is half the battle, instantly felled his man, and in the "rough and tumble" fight that ensued he had the best of it. As a consequence, the Terror came among his old acquaintances, not only as a chicken hearted fellow who had given tongue under a flogging, but also as one who had been "lad-licked." Others whom he had formerly insulted or assaulted now "went for him," and whether it was that flogging and penal servitude had broken his spirit, or that he had always been a coward and was now only being found out, certain it is that he generally sustained defeat in his pugilistic encounters. From being regarded with fear he has come to be looked upon with contempt by the "sloggers" of the quarter. But that is known only in the quarter, and, though there he is without honour, he is still a success in his old occupation of bully. His ferocious appearance and language are quite sufficient to terrify any who may be lured into the den to which he is attached.

A young fellow of about two and twenty stands out rather conspicuously by reason of a general wholesomeness of appearance, which is in decided contrast to the sallow and sordid look of most of those around him. His look of health is attributable to the regular living of prison life. He has just come out from "doing two months hard" for fowl stealing, which is the line of business he more particularly affects. He is accounted a first-class hand at it, but, like the fowls, he occasionally gets caught, having now had three "little lots" in the way of "doing time." Other men are lounging about who might be worth description did space permit. Here are a couple of "finger smiths"—pickpockets—engaged in a rather warm discussion as to the best ways and means of reaching a certain suburban race meeting. A little lower down a "pewterer"—that is to say, a thief whose speciality is the purloining of publicans' and milkmen's cans—is exchanging jolts with a wiry looking customer, whose line is stripping empty houses, or new buildings, of their metal fittings. A number of other special artists, including a reputed burglar, are also on view. Most thieves do profess to be specialists, but as a matter of fact they are generally ready to turn their hands to anything that may crop up in a dishonest way.

Mingling with the men are some of the women inhabitants of the street. It would be hard-hearted not to believe that these poor outcasts have some redeeming traits of true womanliness in their nature, the character of their life and surroundings notwithstanding. Still it must be admitted that, speaking broadly, but little good can be said of them, therefore, perhaps, the least said is the better. Poor things! where they are transgressors, most of them find that even in this life, and in a maternal sense, the way of transgressors is hard.

All these people are well known to the police, and in one way or another they prey upon society. They are but types of a class that is to be numbered by tens of thousands. Society has to support them. How it might best deal with them in its own interest is a problem that we must leave to others to attempt to solve. Our province for the present is to assist others by offering some description, founded upon prolonged opportunities for personal observation, of the character of the people and haunts to be dealt with.

ZEBEDEE.

I THINK the Lord would often come to see thee,

Thou generous father! grudging not thy sons
To strange new service, no call came to free thee

From mending nets or netting stranger ones.

Thou wouldst sit bravely, and bow patiently!

And maybe, thinking of the Lord, wouldst sing
For joy, that every day thy sons would see

His face and hear His voice in journeying

I think thou saw'st too—far in after years—

The sword that pierced thy faithful James's heart;
While e'er thy lake a vision dim appears

Of what thy favoured John saw! Ah! thou wert
What we may be. Or mending nets, or sailing ships—
Brave to endure—swift to obey—calls of Christ's kps!

EGYPT AFTER THE WAR.

By LADY BRASSEY, AUTHOR OF "A VOYAGE IN THE 'SUNBEAM,'" ETC.

PART IV

SATURDAY, February 17th—It was not a very favourable day for our expedition to Karnak. The sky was cloudy, and the horrid khamseen, or wind of the desert, was blowing so strongly that the waters of the Nile were quite rough. Though moored firmly under the shelter of a high mud bank, we rolled and rocked about very unpleasantly, and it was almost impossible for the small boat, in which we were to cross the river, to come alongside. We therefore walked a short distance along the bank, and embarked in the little creek already referred to. The clouds of sand from the desert were terrible, rolling at intervals, like solid walls, across the Nile, and completely hiding from view all traces of Thebes, just opposite. We covered our faces with veils and handkerchiefs as best we could, and turned our donkeys along a narrow path, through rich corn fields, till we got to the pylon, or gateway of the first temple, where the massive walls afforded us some shelter from the hot blast. This gateway, standing up straight and square, and marked with deeply cut hieroglyphics, is grand and imposing in appearance, and it once repaid us for all the disappointment we had felt with the ruins we had previously seen from a distance only, or with those at Luxor amid their wretched surroundings. But this was as nothing compared with the great hall of the temple itself, to which we passed through a mass of ruined columns, colossal, and obelisks, all lying on their sides, more or less broken, some being in quite small pieces. The great hall has lost its roof, but the one hundred and thirty-four columns which once supported it, together with some of the keystones, still remain. All are elaborately ornamented with deep, clearly-cut hieroglyphics, looking as if the mason's chisel had left them but yesterday. They represent the kings offering to their gods, and their battles and victories. One large column has partly fallen, and now leans sideways into the hall. The gigantic key-stone, which it still supports, looks as if it might fall on one's head at any moment, and reminds one in that respect of the key stone in the great arch of the Temple of the Sun, at Baalbec. The Grand Temple of Karnak is said to be the finest of all the old Egyptian monuments, which I can quite believe. I had not imagined anything half so imposing, notwithstanding the descriptions and pictures I have read and seen. The hall is about 330 feet long by 170 feet broad, the columns 62 feet in height, not including the pith and abacus, and 21½ feet in diameter. These dimensions bring them so close together that the effect produced is not so much that of a vast hall supported by pillars, as of a collection of avenues of columns. How grand must it all have looked when filled with the splendid processions and the pomp and pageantry of the proud priesthood of Egypt!

It was with reluctance that we left the great hall, in order to see the rest of the temple. But we were well repaid for our trouble, though the exploration was long and fatiguing. In visiting a grand ruin like this, it always seems a work of drudgery to me to study the more prosaic details, and to endeavour to trace out the faintly-distinguishable remains of what were once walls and chambers, forming part of the main building. I would so much rather sit still or wander about in the most beautiful and perfect parts, trying to fill them in my imagination with the strange scenes of the past. What tales the oldest of these columns would tell if they could only speak, and what light they would throw on the now obscure history of the successive dynasties! As it is, they do their best to offer their dumb testimony, and to awaken and encourage interest and research. First we were shown the geographical tablets, bearing the names of the countries and cities that had been conquered by one king, and an avenue of colossal statues, all broken and partially destroyed. The roof of the sanctuary, a portion of which had fallen, was of a beautiful cerulean blue, ornamented with sunk stars, that had evidently at one time been filled in with gold. They say it is quite impossible to imitate this wonderful blue now. In the court outside are two obelisks, one still upstanding, of red granite, seventy five feet high, and one that has fallen and is broken in pieces. There is a difference of two hundred and fifty years between the dates of the hieroglyphics on either side of these columns, those on one side having been cut in the reign of Thotmes I., of the eighteenth dynasty, and those on the other belonging to the reign of Rameses II., of the nineteenth dynasty. A little farther on there are two still larger obelisks, one erect, and again one that has fallen. The former is the largest in the world, one hundred and eight feet in height, and was erected by Hatasoo, whose name it bears, to the memory of her father, Thotmes I. How dazlingly beautiful must their golden tips have looked against the dark blue sky in the glorious mid-day sunshine of Egypt—or perhaps still more so when illumined by the roseate hues of early dawn, or lighted up, as with flames of fire, by the last gleams of the setting sun, or glittering like silver lighthouses in the cold pale light of the moon! Beyond these obelisks was a terrible mass of ruins, amid which, though several pylons and a good many columns remain standing, the walls of the various temples can be only indistinctly traced. We went round these ruins and the walls of the outer court till we came to the largest pylon, to the top of which we clambered with some difficulty, to get a view of the avenues of sphinxes, some with a woman's head on a lion's body, holding between their fore feet a little statue of Amunoph III. (probably the maker of that particular avenue), others being ordinary sphinxes, and others again cros-sphinxes, or sphinxes with rams' heads. In some cases these avenues were more than a mile long, and were interspersed at intervals with colossal statues. One of them led right away to the great obelisks at Luxor, one to the Nile, one to the desert, and others in different directions. From the summit of the pylon, the terrible destruction that has been wrought by a variety of causes in the mighty piles beneath was plainly visible. The result of building eight feet below the level of the Nile, without making adequate foundations for such an enormous mass, has been to throw the walls and columns out of the perpendicular, and to cause the temple to sink, and its lower portion to be submerged in the nitrous waters of the river, for many weeks in each year. Most of the columns in the great hall, where not surrounded and supported by rubbish, are eaten away, at a height of from seven to eight feet from the ground, to such an extent as to make their condition appear quite dangerous. I suppose it is only a question of time, and that all must, sooner or later, fall with a mighty crash, as others have done before them. The effects of more than one earthquake, an occurrence now unknown in Egypt, are also plainly visible. Then, too, the temple has been on several occasions attacked and taken by victorious kings, who have undone much of the work of their predecessors. And now still the work of destruction goes on, in an even more regular, though not quite so wholesale a manner. Tourists and donkey boys mutilate statues and mummies, cut out the most precious of hieroglyphics (perhaps, as has happened before now, the key to a whole inscription), and light fires in tombs containing the most valuable and interesting pictures of ancient Egyptian life.

After descending from the pylon, we lunched in the great hall, and strolled about and sat in shady spots till about four o'clock, when we went to see the Temple of Rameses III., where Mr. Mispero and his people are hard at work clearing out the rubbish in front of the wall, and disclosing fresh hieroglyphics, both cut and painted. At a short distance from this spot is the Temple of Maut, where a hundred and twenty black granite statues of the bon headed goddess Ptah were found, many of which are still lying about on the ground in a more or less broken state. Two are at this moment on the shore at Luxor, waiting to be shipped to Germany, having been excavated last week only for Prince Charles of Prussia, who was here recently. There are a great many of these black statues at Cairo and Alexandria, and the fact of their all having come from this place induced the late Mr. Mariette to undertake fresh excavations and to make further important discoveries.

Mr. Mispero paid me a visit on board the dahabeeah this evening, and gave me some interesting particulars of his recent discoveries in this neighbourhood, which include a perfect Coptic church, of the fifth century. Last year he found, beneath a tomb, a limestone sarcophagus, on one corner of which was a Coptic inscription. Further research led to the discovery of the church itself, which was approached by a short flight of blackwork steps. The floor was covered with tiles, and the walls with bricks, on which were inscriptions. He also found a tablet, covered with wax on some hard white substance, bearing a long inscription of some three hundred lines, which is supposed to have formed part of a sermon directed against Monophysite heretics.

Sunday, February 18th—We went to church at half-past ten at the hotel. the Bishop of Limerick reading the service, and the doctor of the hotel, Cullen by name, the lessons. Afterwards we went across the river in our small boat, accompanied by Achmet Effendi, who appears to be now quite cured by the doctor's treatment, and who is extremely grateful for the relief afforded him. It was a deliciously hot day, and I felt perfectly well. No one who has not suffered from an affliction of the lungs or throat can know what that expression means, or can appreciate the luxury of breathing without conscious effort and without being painfully reminded of infirmity by each respiration. It is a long way to come to attain such bliss, but the result is worth the effort.

The bird we saw as we landed were even more numerous and beautiful than usual. There were white and black storks, grey herons, red and yellow-legged ibis, brown and white striped egrets, pink flamingoes, many coloured kingfishers, hoopoes, and all sorts of other birds, of the names of which I am ignorant. On landing, of course the usual commotion took place, but, once fairly started, we found we had very good donkeys, and a mule led along comfortably enough through the fields of green corn just coming into ear and affording shelter for the innumerable quail which are now present migrating from the upper parts of the Nile. Now they are here by hundreds, soon they will be here by thousands, and one can easily understand how without any special miracle, the Israelites in the wilderness fed upon them, just as they fed on the produce of the manna tree, which sends out its white gum in drops like hoar frost.

The little Arab water carriers, who follow one on expeditions like that of to-day, bearing porous gourd on their heads, are very taking in their ways, though somewhat persistent in their attentions. One of them, a young girl, with big black soft eyes, who kept saying, 'I, I, Ima, please, good lady take poor little Ima no father, no mother, carry water all day long for one piece bread, was successful in her appeal to me. I must say that having once engaged her she stuck to me faithfully, and did her best to keep the others off.

A ride of a few miles brought us, by way of the artificial lake of Birket Háboo, to the Temple of Medinet Háboo, partly built by Thothmes and partly by Ramesses III, with many additions by later kings. It is a magnificent relic of the governments of ancient Egypt, and its present remains make it just possible to retrace what the city must have been thousands of years ago, when it furnished from its vicinity 20,000 chariots in time of war, before Cambyses conquered and looted it, and the march of time had transferred the seat of government to Tanis and Bubastis.

The Pillar Column in of Ramesses

and subsequently to Saïs and Alexandria. The ruins of the temple are superb, the carvings and hieroglyphics wonderful, having been preserved by the layers of plaster and stucco with which they were covered by successive Copts and Romans. The view from the top of the walls and the pylon, ■ which we climbed with some difficulty, is very extensive, and well repaid us for the scramble. Thebes is so beautifully situated between the ranges of the Libyan and Arabian Mountains, and commands so fine a view of the fertile valley of the Nile, and across the river to Luxor, that Medeenet Háboo is quite different in this respect from the other temples. It is wonderful how distance lends enchantment to the view of Luxor. The mud huts seem ■ disappear and lose themselves as if by magic, while the grand old temple stands out in all ■ ancient magnificence. One's ideas become almost unconsciously revolutionised here, especially coming, ■ we have done, almost direct from Rome, where people learn to admire and revere all that is ancient of Roman art, ruins, and remains. Here one comes to regard the antiquities of Europe as comparatively modern and uninteresting, and, almost without knowing it, to despise them. At Thebes, more than anywhere else, I was struck with the commonplace character, so to speak, of the well-built brick walls of the ancient Romans, alongside the grand masonry of the old Egyptians, and with the puny insignificance of the Ionic and Doric columns in the interior of the great hall, as contrasted with the stern simplicity and size of their older and larger Egyptian brethren. The contrast is more remarkable, I think, from the top of the pylon than from any other point of view; for the columns are then seen in closer juxtaposition, and can therefore be more easily compared.

From Medeenet Háboo we rode across the fertile plain to the colossal statues ■ Amunoph III.; one of which was known as the "Vocal Memnon," from the sound it was supposed ■ emit at the daily rising of the sun. Whether, after ■ was broken, the joints of the stones which had thus become exposed did really emit some sound, owing to the changes of temperature, and the consequent expansion and contraction of the stone, or whether the whole thing was an imposition on the part of the priests, I suppose will never be known for certain. Reluctantly I am compelled to lean rather to the latter opinion, there being still the remains of a metallic sounding stone in the lap of the figure and a hole just behind it quite big enough to conceal a man. Some of the party climbed up to get a closer view of this stone but I was not sufficiently energetic to do so. It was too pleasant to sit below and enjoy the delicious air, and think how delightful it was to have it last reduced one of the dreams of my childhood and to have really gazed upon the obelisk of Luxor and the Colossus of Memnon, as I had longed to do ever since. I first read about them when eight or nine years old. Now I have seen them amid their own beautiful surroundings and I know what they are like, in a way that—so stupid am I—no amount of reading would ever have enabled me to do.

From the colossi we rode to the temple of Ramesses II. significantly though erroneously called the Memnonium. The first thing that strikes one is the gigantic monolithic statue of Ramesses II, in black granite, estimated to weigh over a thousand tons, or three times as much as the grand obelisk at Karnak. How was it transported to where it now stands? How was it damaged and broken so much as it is if dynamite and gunpowder are but recent discoveries? Shall we ever learn anything on these points from hieroglyphics which have yet to be brought to light, or will it all remain secret until the end of the world? The temple itself is vast and interesting, and contains some finely cut hieroglyphics representing the various kings in the act of making offerings to their gods. It was a great advantage that we had Achmet Khenk with us, for he was well acquainted with the subject, and explained everything most ably. Still I must confess that I rather longed for a kindred person to talk to about these wonders of the past, for the children are rather young to appreciate them, and they are not much in the doctor's line.

Monday, January 19th—Mr. Muspero had specially recommended me to go and see a tomb he has only excavated within the last three or four days, and we had arranged to make an expedition for this purpose to day. Achmet Khenk came on board at nine o'clock, soon after which we unmoored the dahabeeth and went down the river a few miles, whence we had a long hot ride on donkeys to the Tombs of the Kings. After the first mile or two over a few fields and then across a desert, our way lay up a narrow limestone valley, without bush, tree, rock, or shelter of any kind. The rays of the burning sun were reflected from the hills on either side, and the atmosphere was altogether so stifling, that we were only too glad to arrive at Bab el Molook, and to rush into the shelter of the tomb. First we descended a long way into the earth and then found ourselves in a series of magnificent rock-hewn chambers profusely decorated with hieroglyphics and with pictures painted in the brightest colours which, I suppose owing to the dryness of the desert air, are as fresh as if they had only been executed yesterday. I was immensely interested in following the different scenes of domestic life depicted on the walls of the various apartments, and was tempted to stay a long time underground, notwithstanding the stifling air, and the strong and very nasty smell of bits. The next tomb we saw was called the Harper's tomb, which though not so large as the others, contained some most interesting hieroglyphics and pictures. There are hundreds, not to say thousands, of these tombs in the limestone rocks in mountains hereabouts. Many have already been discovered and opened, and have been rifled of their contents, but only a few repay the trouble of the non-antiquarian there being a certain superficial similarity between all of them.

The ride downwards was considerably plainer and quicker than the ascent had been, for the donkeys cantered gaily along this burnt-up valley of desolation till we got to the desert again, where we found some camels awaiting us. The children and I each had a ride on one, and found the motion by no means so unpleasant as we had been led to expect. It was many years since I had had any experience of this mode of travelling and I had almost forgotten what the sensation was like. We lunched in the grateful shade of the temple of Koorneh, surrounded by a group of camel men, donkey boys, curiosity dealers, and water carriers, all eager for a morsel. Such a crowd you do not often see here, and Tadros was obliged to go round at intervals with a whip to try and disperse them, but it was of no use, they returned almost immediately, just like flies. A bit of sunset.

The Temple of Koorneh was built by Sethi I, in memory of his father Ramesses I, and was completed by Ramesses II, the Sesostris of the Greeks. It is not so large as some of the other temples. The hieroglyphics are deeply cut, but there is no colour on the walls. From Koorneh we went to Day-el Medeenah, so called from having been inhabited by the early Christians, the sculptures and painting being much blackened and spoilt by the fires they used. The hieroglyphics depict the ideas of the ancients as to the processes through which the human soul must pass before becoming fit to appear before Osiris, the special god and judge of the dead. Mr Mispero met us here, and took us to see Dayr el Bahree, or "the Northern Convent," a fine temple of marble or of limestone, white as alabaster, built on the side of the hill, approached by steps and terraces through an avenue of sphinxes and obelisks, and entered by three magnificent pylons, from which an extensive view is commanded over the once splendid courts of the temple and the valley and river of the Nile, away to the distant mountains of Arabia. It was built by Hatshepout, in memory of her father, Thotmes I. The sculptures and paintings are specially beautiful. One representing soldiers marching or from battle, and some ships and boats sailing and being rowed on transparent water, through which fish of all kinds are seen, is perfectly wonderful. In one picture the waters represented are those of the Nile, and there are none but river fish. In another they are those of the sea, and all the fish are real sea fish.

Not far from the Temple of Dayr-el Bahree we were shown the excavation in which all the royal mummies that have recently been taken to the museum at Boulak were discovered. They had previously been removed from the grand sarcophagi in the vaults of the tombs of the kings, and were hidden here for safety, probably in the time of the Shepherd Kings. A steep descent and an equally abrupt ascent by a well levelled incline, which had evidently been prepared for the passage downwards of a sarcophagus, took us into the recently discovered tomb of which Mr. Mispero had told us, and which he had kindly given us permission to visit. It contained an enormous carved stone sarcophagus, covered with hieroglyphics, that had been with great labour drawn up from the depths of the earth, and was now waiting in the passage to be hauled out quietly, lowered down the incline, and conveyed thence to the river bank, and so by barge to Boulak. The chief interest of the discovery, however, lies, not in the sarcophagus itself, important as it is, but in the fact that the tomb had been used as a Christian church, and that it is the first perfect specimen ever discovered. It is completely plastered with stucco, minutely covered with Coptic characters, beautifully and clearly chiselled, and filled in with some red substance, so that they are now just as legible as they were when first executed. Extracts from the Bible and the tenets of the Coptic religion have already been deciphered, and the stucco-work is at this moment being carefully removed in pieces, in order to be put together again at Cairo, and translated by experts. Who knows what extraordinary histories these tablets may not reveal?

The sun was now just sinking behind the mountains, and we had a long ride before us, back to the boat, across a desert plain completely honeycombed with tombs. It would have been dangerous riding in the dark, but the donkeys managed to pick their way very cleverly, even when going at a considerable pace. Most if not all of the tombs have been opened and rifled of their contents, while many are now occupied by Arabs, who prefer inhabiting the spacious resting places of the dead to building fresh mud hovels for themselves, a great labour and trouble, for here there is nothing but sand, sand, sand everywhere, and everything else has to be transported from a distance. The poor creatures must have many a weary journey before even their funeral wants can be satisfied. Their living, as I should think, chiefly guided by strolling guides to visitors to the tombs, and by the collection and sale of curiosities of all sorts.

To-night it was very pleasant sitting on the upper deck without a shadow of fear of cold, listening to Arab love ditties and odes to the moon, as we glided slowly back to our old anchorage. Rather to a sight as near to it as we could get for Luxor is quite gay and crowded this evening, four steamers having arrived in the course of the day. We met the bi-weekly postal boat, and a steamer with two English officers and some Egyptian troops for the Soudan, whither the authorities seem to be sending extensive reinforcements, and where trouble is anticipated, owing to the increasing popularity and power of the Mahdi. By far the most comfortable way of going up the Nile is to hire a dahabeah, as we have done thus securing all the comfort of a home and avoiding most of the penalties of travel. But if you wished to save time, it would not be a bad plan to take up your own party and hire the postal boat.

I believe that a new passenger service by postal steamers has recently been organized which enables travellers to accomplish the voyage from Cairo to the First Cataract and back in exactly a fortnight, including a four days' stay at Luxor, for a little over £20, everything included. On it is possible to go to Luxor and back in eleven days at a proportionately lower rate. The route is by rail as far as Assiout, whence the steamers start twice a week, accomplishing the voyage to Assiout in four days and a half.

After dinner I mounted a donkey, and went to see Khnuk by moonlight. It was a perfect night, and as I rode along alone so I speak though surrounded by Arab guards, I had plenty of time to appreciate the full beauty of the scene before me, though I think, in fact I am sure, I should much have enjoyed the society of a sympathising companion. The little village half-way between Karnak and Luxor looked specially beautiful and Oriental, with its white houses half visible in the moonlight half hidden by groups of date and dome palms, and by fragrant creepers just outside the temple, where the moonlight shone brightest, six white-robed Arabs were saying their prayers, with many prostrations and genuflections. Mohammedanism has a peculiar influence over the lower class of its votaries far greater in some respects than that of Christianity in any of its forms. The precepts it inculcates are undeniably good and sound and in many cases worthy of imitation even if we are unable to accept them as a whole.

The Temple of Karnak in the cold moonlight is indeed a sight to be seen and a thing to be dreamed of in years to come. If ever I live to be old gray-headed, and rheumatism only able to occupy in arm-chair by the fire side I feel sure that the remembrance of that scene — I beheld it to night will always remain in my mind — is that thing of beauty which is a joy for ever. The tender but bright light exhibits all the exquisite proportions of the building to perfection and seemed to throw a delicate veil over the scars and scratches made by the rude fingers of relentless time or by the hand of the spoiler. Everything seemed more perfect than in the garish light of noonday. Columns appeared to be without crack or flaw, colossal concealed their general dilapidation, obelisks looked even higher and more jointed, the avenue of sphinxes half buried in sand more grand. All had an added charm in the glory of an Egyptian night, which just now is only like a softer, drier, illumined by myriads of stars.

that he knew about his own affairs was that he had always had enough for his own needs and the needs of those about him.

Before leaving London, before deciding to give up his house and sell the larger part of his household goods, he had been compelled to face the fact that his three years of inactivity had told upon his resources. All the time he had been living exactly as he had lived when his productive powers were greatest. There had been a certain shabby unpleasant shock when a man began to retrench and finally a conviction that retrenchment was not possible in the neighbourhood of Kensington. But it will be seen that he had double motive for choosing to retire to Monk-Mishies for a time and for undertaking to settle down there on a system of living that should cause him as little anxiety as possible.

Of all this Genevieve had known nothing certainly, but she had guessed enough to make her mind full of the money which he had to expend her self either on dress or for household needs. In point of fact her idea had cost her nothing, but he left London and he intended that for some time to come her personal expenses should be limited to extreme care. More than once she saw in her little hints of his brooding that had dropped from her in the slaps.

The discovery that her own words had just made would have startled a dreamer more seriously than the falling of half the rocks in the neighbourhood. To put the matter briefly and plainly, he knew that he was brooding over the possibility of his doing the book in his hand that makes the mile some special effort the end of a very short time would find him penniless.

The word entered his mind, bringing with it a sense of alarm by the moment. The pictures that haunted him but his mind would if they were finished bring money enough for the needs of years.

They were not finished, but it seemed to him, as he sat looking at them that a thing could be easier than to finish two of them within two months.

It seemed so easy a matter, and so plain that he turned away with a smile, and stirring his studio fire into a blaze he sat there with his chin extended thinking gratefully of the work he had done since he came to Netherbank. He had been dissatisfied with it, both with its quantity and its quality. But if it had not been done what would have been his outlook now? He hardly cared to think of that, indeed he hardly cared to think of the matter any more at all. Once he had decided what was to be done there was no need to busy himself uselessly.

He did not seem to busy himself. He was not conscious of brooding over his financial difficulties. But what was it that had suddenly come upon his too sensitive brain pressing, there like a hand of iron, and self-lounging, its dead pressure? It was never relieved entirely save when he was out under the blue heavens where the wind from the sea could breathe upon his fevered forehead.

The blow had fallen just when he was most ill-prepared to bear such a blow. For weeks before he had been flagging, needing rest, yet he had worked longer when the mood was upon him, using up the little reserve force he had at the moment instead of letting it accumulate awhile. He was still doing the same thing or trying to do it even though the new pressure on his brain made his own work seem hateful in his sight. It need hardly be said that his suffering under the circumstances was not yet borne patiently, and in strict silence.

Still it was not to be expected that he could pass through such an experience as this without some one suspicion in the mind of one who watched him so closely as his daughter was watching him. She was conscious of some new element in his suffering, and the new element seemed more than ever present on this bright May afternoon when he came up from the studio to the little sitting room where Genevieve was waiting. He had just glanced out the beautiful and highly worn but back-round that he had put to the Sir Galahad and even as the brush had swept over the canvas repentance had touched him. But it was too late, the undertints had only been half dry, and the confusion was hopeless.

In the morning, Genevieve had looked forward to this one hour of the afternoon. George Kurlowald would be there when her father came up from his work, and it would be then that George would speak, that he would say how much more had happened in Luknigg Gill than the fall of a piece of rock. Genevieve had hesitated to speak of all that had passed herself. How could she speak of it? It was should she say the words? She had thought of it, tried to think how she might bring herself to speak, but her thought had ended in passion. It was for the dead, loving mother to whom it would have been so easy to speak and so natural.

But George had not come. Some un-restoration of Usselby, and it was an intention that even Genevieve might not gain say.

So George was thinking as he wandered back to his lonely breakfast. He had an intense dislike to lonely meals, and it had been growing upon him of late. Even the idea that they might soon be no longer lonely was not very comforting for the present hour. He was sorely needing some one to whom he might speak out of his full heart without reserve.

For one second he thought that his need was about to be met, but the next instant disclosed the fact that the man who was entering his grounds by the wicket gate on the north wore the Richmond livery. He came forward, touched his hat respectfully, delivered a note to the master of Usselby, and retired.

Perhaps it would be more correct to say a letter than a note. The envelope was large, and appeared to be well filled. The address was in Miss Richmond's clear, firm, important-looking handwriting.

George Kirkoswald went indoors at once. His breakfast was ready, it was waiting for him in his study, but he hardly saw it. He sat down on a chair near the window and placed the unopened letter on a table before him.

It would perhaps hardly be an exaggeration to say that so far as the appearance of his face was an index, ten minutes had done the work of ten years.

He sat there, looking out beyond the letter to some far away vacancy that his narrow room could not bound. His forehead was drawn into rugged lines, his dark eyes had sunk into deeper recesses, his firm mouth was compressed with something more than firmness.

He did not think as he sat there. For as long a time as was possible to him he positively refrained from thinking.

It never occurred him to say to himself, "I will learn the worst at once, even the worst may not be so bad as I fear."

Nothing occurred to him that had any gleam of hope in it. When he could begin to look about for hope the worst would be over, and it had not burst upon him in all its strength yet. This he knew, but he was not trying to prepare himself.

The first sign of returning vitality was a desire to look fully into the nature of his past mistake, the one great mistake of his life.

He must face the consequence, but before he could decide how best to face it he had a great wish to see clearly the extent of his wrong-doing.

He had seen it before, but now that he was farther away from it he thought he could see it under an altered light. Things would seem different, and differently seen they might be differently judged.

Some who had known of his mistake had made excuse for him by saying that he was little more than a boy when he made it. This was an error. Kirkoswald had been twenty-seven years of age when he had yielded to the strange, wild, intoxicating passion that Diana Richmond had inspired in him.

It had come upon him with a suddenness, an absoluteness that seemed to turn the whole current of his being aside from its true course. He had used no judgment, nor desired to use any.

He had had no acquaintance, whatever with Miss Richmond in his boyish days, though they had been neighbours, so to speak, and of the same age within a year or two, Miss Richmond having the advantage. Kirkoswald had been educated mainly abroad, and even while he was at Oxford he had seldom spent his vacations at Usselby.

Soon after taking his degree he had gone abroad again, and had remained there till the summer of his twenty-seventh year. Three weeks after his return his engagement to Miss Richmond had been proclaimed with a curious haste and publicity. Half the Kingdom wondered over the unlikely match.

Of course it could be understood. Miss Richmond's marvellous beauty, and her still more marvellous powers of fascination, were acknowledged everywhere. But then everywhere also was it acknowledged that Kirkoswald was a man of wide culture, of scholarly ways of thought, of a poetic appreciation of life and nature. Did he expect that Miss Richmond would be a helpmeet for him here? Was he anticipating that refined intellectual intercourse which he had declared in one of his published poems to be the only true basis for any bond of friendship or of love?

Others asked these questions before he began to ask them for himself. When they came he thrust them away, again and again he thrust them away, but again and again they chimed loudly to be heard.

He was enduring all over again as he sat there with the unopened letter before him. The very handwriting seemed to bring back that first dawning dread, that first fear lest he should have mistaken the enthralment of his senses for the strong, fine, spiritual bond that alone can bind two souls so that neither shall stumble in the dark ways of life for the need of that support that such bonds engage to give.

There had been a long period of suffering and dismay that he had not been able to understand at the time. It had succeeded, by somewhat quick gradations, to the first phase of wild and passionate admiration. Even now he hardly comprehended it. Day after day for a whole year had been marked as it went past by pain, by negation, by unsatisfied yearning. In his ignorance, in his infatuation he had imagined that it was a fuller love for which he yearned, not knowing, not perceiving, that Miss Richmond's feeling for him was not love at all, not dreaming that his devotion did but satisfy her vanity, and help a little to dull her craving for excitement. She professed to return his love, but her professions failed to content him. They were hollow and they were lifeless, and there came to be a hollowness and a lifelessness about all their intercourse that half-maddened him for a time.

He had, of course, desired in the beginning that their marriage should take place as soon as it conveniently could, but the sudden and serious illness of Mrs. Richmond had caused delay. This was fatal. Subsequently, in a way that was curious to look back upon, the question of marriage had been allowed to subside. It had subsided by tacit, mutual consent. That was all that could be said. The engagement remained a fact, but the question of its fulfilment was consciously held in abeyance.

When at last he ceased to demand more from Miss Richmond's affection than she had to give, he found in his bitterest that there was little else he might demand. Large as his nature was, and wide his requirement, he failed to interest her unless he sought to do so through her vanity. In no other way could he touch her to any quickness of response, save by compliment, and the use of varied skill in flattery. No literature, no art, no science, no philosophy, could arouse her to desire to share for an hour in the intellectual life that was to him above all other life. He strove aimlessly enough to turn the current of such mental power as she had, believing all the while that the power was there if it could only be awakened, arrested, fixed on any sufficient and worthy ideas. But the sole result was an ever-increasing disappointment, an ever-growing strain and tension, a never-ceasing dread of a life of jarring and fretfulness, such as could not fail to be if he were for ever to go on desiring to live the higher life by the side of a woman whose higher nature seemed dead within her, so dead that even love had failed to evoke one sign of intellectual vitality, of spiritual susceptibility.

Strong as George Kukoswald was, his strength did not enable him to bear this strain with impunity. His health failed, and depression came upon him. He was relieved, though ashamed of his relief, the very core of him, when a medical friend in London all but insisted that he should not spend the winter of that year in England.

He was surprised when the moment of parting came. Diana Richmond was all tenderness, and her manner full of a vague repentance and regret. He would have chinged his plans, even at the last, if his word had not been given to his friend somewhat solemnly.

A still greater surprise was in store for him. He was not prepared for the long and passionately worded letters that came to him so frequently and regularly from the Yorkshire hills. They awoke all the old passion in him. Had he been a fool? he asked himself, had he been blind? or was it simply that he had been careless, and unreasonable in his expectations?

He came back again. The old experience awaited him. There was another brief season of delight, another chance of marriage hindered by events, another long, long period of doubt and pain, and final disillusionment.

This was the end. There had been no other end.

There had been no quarrel. Once, after a long interval of absence and silence, George Kukoswald had written a note to Miss Richmond. He had been for some two or three months in London, and no correspondence had passed, the previous intercourse between them having been of too cold and restricted a nature to make renewed correspondence seem needful or desirable. The engagement had not yet been broken, but it had worn down, it galled by fragment, until in his eyes it no longer existed.

George Kukoswald was about to accompany two friends of his to Rome, his stay might be protracted, and before he went he had a very natural desire to feel himself perfectly free, to know that no further allegiance was expected from him. So it was that he wrote, briefly and courteously, to Miss Richmond, asking only one thing at her hands, that she would return his letters.

But Miss Richmond did not return his letters, nor did she make any reply to that last request.

From that day ■ this—in interval of some four years—nothing further had passed between Drury Richmond and Kirkoswald. It had so happened that they had not even met face to face until they had met in Larkington, George Kirkoswald with Genevieve Latholmows giddy her in his hands.

Was it strange, then, that he should sit looking at this unopened letter with grim and dark dread given on every feature of his face?

It was a noble face even then, though there was written on it the knowledge of sorrow and its aches, the consciousness that in that bygone day he had not been true to the higher light that was in him, how untrue he had been he only saw now that he sat there looking backward over the things that had been, with other eyes than his own the eyes of the purer soul that was blessing with his its very life and light of

CHALICE ANDY - 6 UTON A HAVARD
(MAYBE NOT)

[illegible]

Not till the moon shy smile shone in upon his tired face that the next Kirkoswald beard the seal of the letter M. S. Richmond had written to him in the middle of the previous night.

It was a long letter, and he read it through to the end, his lips moving white as he read his face turning to a more benign expression.

[There is no doubt that it should be given in its entirety here. Every page was characteristic of the writer, of her hallow and incharitable judgment, of her self-centred life and aim, of the strange selfishness of her analysis.]

"You are still my kindest husband to-day as you were on that day," wrote Mrs. Richmond. "As much as you were when you were moved to write those numerous and passionate letters which induced me to consent to a study in Italy." "Still ringing you in Luzzara, Gili tells me I have read every letter that you ever wrote me. Have you forgotten them? If you have forgotten, I will send you copies of a few of them. A few of those you wrote when we were first engaged Romeo himself did not need more passionate warmth of expression, nor had he professed an intense adoration or sworn more than I did."

ficklity. Can it be that you have forgotten? If it should be so, be sure that you shall be reminded by every sure that you shall not long plead for—thus. If you drive me to desperation, believe that I can be desperate. You will learn what a faithful woman is capable of doing. She will also shall learn it also. Will this suffice? Do I need to threaten more plainly? I write for the purpose of threatening of the name, you with the word with the most public exposure of your letter and confess that I can obtain. You know how the world will receive it, the world that believes in you so much, that has such faith in your integrity and sense of honour. I heard a gentleman say only the other day that if a woman could be said to 'wear the white flower of a blameless life' that man was George Killo. Well, to this gentleman I shall turn for the fidelity that I shall need if you drive me to seek it in 'fidelity'.

There was more than this much more, but it was all to the same glorious purpose. Reproaches the latter was mingled with distorted fact while others were utterly untrue.

The difficulty was to find a motive for all the evil with the most evident desire to work oneself up and cry:

Not for one man did George know would desert him or grieve himself by fearing that any form of unrequited love had remained in that man's soul to spring up and be a belated hurt to him.

If there was no love, then neither could there be jealousy so he would, forgetting that there is another jealousy - forgetting, so that a nature like Diana Richmond's full of all contradictions is possible, and the rights and wrongs are not a nature ■ be judged by any other means of judgment.

He could not help noticing that seemed to him strong enough but he came near to fainting, one when he met her at the conflict that had very excited him by reason of her unexpected life and the intensity of her attack, he demanded that she should not only be interested, but that it should be dramatically interesting, and it did not included instantly that the interest should center in herself.

Once—it was when he had first discovered for himself the existence of the conflict—he had asked her why it was that she should choose to remain always or nearly always, on a bleak Yorkshire upland, when she might now and then, at least, find interest and occupation in foreign travel. Her reply had amazed him.

"I have no wish to travel. Miss Richmond had said, I never had any wish to see any foreign country or any foreign person. The mere idea is distasteful to me. I have no interest whatever in anything out of England. You say I can choose. I cannot. If I could I would live in London. I would never leave London except to go to some crowded watering-place for a few weeks in the summer."

He could remember distinctly how she had looked when she said this. The expression on her beautiful face had disclosed an intense longing for fuller life, human life that should act and react all about her in concentric circles that turned always upon her self. Life at Yarrill Crest must have been something like martyrdom to such a woman. No wonder that when opportunity came she should instinctively seek to make the most of it—the most, though that also meant the worst.

Opportunity had come now, a wide and vast opportunity that doubtless promised to Diana Richmond an almost endless series of reliefs from the tedium and monotony of her existence at Yarrill Crest.

The first thing that she would expect would be a visit from George Kirkoswald himself—a visit that would be made to resolve itself into a passionate scene. All the old dead, hateful pictures of his existence would be torn up again brought to a ghastly and galvanised life, divested of the glamour and the circumstance that had enabled him to live them out without detecting all their hateful-ness. Diana herself would play a more picturesque part and one more entirely suited to her nature. Doubtless even now she was rehearsing it, studying the most effective attitudes the situation would afford.

And the end—what would the end be?

Here George Kirkoswald had not deceived himself—he knew he left him no room for self-deception.

The end would be inexorable, ruthless, impassibility, triumphant defiance.

As far as he might he would spare himself here. He could sacrifice in this instance would be of no avail.

If by going to Yarrill Crest if by throwing himself at the feet of Diana Richmond in a very passion of self-abnegation he could have induced her to spare not his peace of mind, not his happiness but the happiness of another, then the end had not set upon his despair as it was setting.

For the time being it was despair—the kind of despair that comes so sharply upon a man who has held by a high code of honour and finds himself enmeshed in circumstances that gives colour to accusations of dishonour.

As Diana Richmond knew only too well the possession of a stainless name was to George Kirkoswald above all other possessions. His over-scrupulousness had served her for an amuse-ment. His antiquated views had been burdensome when they had been comprehensible. It was this knowledge that had enabled her to strike with so sure an aim this insight that made her feel so secure in the position she had taken.

Let him do what he would he could not act, as doubtless he would have done if that letter of hers had never been written.

It is possible that even Miss Richmond might have been satisfied if she could have sounded the full length of the anguish he had wrought—satisfied but not touched. No sight of another's sorrow could rouse her to sympathy with that sorrow. If it had found long ago. Anything like persistent clamour upon her sympathy seemed to her then her nature utterly against the person who preferred the clamour and as a rule the hardness resolved itself into anger and annoyance.

It was this knowledge that each had of the other that lent so keen an emphasis to that written page.

More than once during the day George Kirkoswald had risen to his feet and paced the room in a very passion of rebellion against the torture he was undergoing. No note of resignation had been struck with him yet. The first effect of the sudden and strong disappointment had been bewilderment. To this succeeded anger, resentment, a wild desire to meet defiance with defiance.

Why should he not tear that letter into a thousand shreds and burn it? Nether-blink on the next morning and act and speak there as he would most certainly have acted and spoken had he not received it?

This was the one strong inclination that he had. Later there came a day when he wished with all his might that he had acted upon his inclination.

If he had known less of Diana Richmond, had he been less strongly persuaded of her infinite cruelty, he had doubtless done this thing that he desired to do. As it was he was overcome of the persuasion.

It was not that he dreaded her cruelty for himself, but he did dread to feel it falling through him upon another—another whose face in all its pure, spiritual loveliness came before him now as the face of an accusing angel. What had he done?

What had he done? And what could now be done? In his perplexity he got up and left his house hardly knowing that he left it. It was a moonless night, a dark clear blue night with silver stars shining in thin places as if they reigned only over a world of utter calmness, utter peace. There was no sound to break the solemn stillness. The fir trees stood still, the birds were still, the far-off sea was murmuring at the foot of the cliffs as if it desired to subdue itself to the wide harmony of the night.

It was a long time before any sense of this harmony wrought itself a way into George Kirkoswald's soul. He walked about his ill kept grounds and out on to the moor with the cool night air upon his forehead but his brain throbbed on under the ceaseless questioning which it could find no answer.

What had he done? And what might now be done? Could he do this thing that seemed as if it were the only thing left for him to do? Could he go down when the morning sunshine came to the peaceful little cottage in the corn field and say—say to Genevieve Bartholomew—

"You have promised to be mine, and I desire passionately that you will keep your promise. But another woman counts me her affianced husband, and has a thousand proofs that she does not do so without due reason."

Could he add to this, that, knowing that other woman's nature, he had had inevitable doubts, inevitable fears, and that he had silenced them?

Could he also say, without a sense of wrong doing, that he had intended to disclose the fact of his previous engagement before entering into this newer and truer engagement, but that he had failed of his intention?

If it came to this he would not say why he had failed, he would not say that he had been for want of a fitting opportunity or that he had been humbled by his own great love which had made him sensitive to the smallest risk, or that in the presence of Genevieve there had been something that had rendered the confession of a previous engagement to Diana Richmond all but impossible. He would use none of these ways of extenuation. His tale should be told with all severity of speech as if an enemy told it.

If it were possible to him to tell it at all he could tell it best in this manner; but was it possible? Could he compel himself to go down and confess these things to Genevieve, and to her father, with the open candour that circumstance required? Would not such candour seem almost brutal in its ruthlessness?

The ruthlessness of it would be in the fact that he could see no alleviation to the strange sorrow that he had brought upon one so entirely innocent, so guileless, so unsuspecting of evil. He might be able to bear the worst himself, but could he ask her to bear it with him?

That she would consent to brave anything, he did not doubt, supposing that she had first decided to accept the offer of a man dishonoured to all seeming by a broken promise, but he knew that her consent would be given in ignorance. How could she know what the worst might mean? How could she have prevision of the agony of slander, and shame, and humiliation, that would come into her fair beautiful life, and so mar it that it would never be the same life again? It must be his prevision that must spare her, it indeed she might be spared. It seemed to him that he had but this to consider,—how he could spare Genevieve Bartholomew's name from the breath of slander and detraction.

The future that had lain before him in the morning, the landscape below him had lain with its green pastures and its still waters smiling in the spring sunshine, had changed even as the scene had changed. Where all had been light, and pleasantness, and songs of birds, and myriads of flowers, there was darkness, and obscurity, with no visible pathway through the overshadowed land. It had been morning, now it was night, night with him, even in his very soul.

Was the stony silence entering into that inner night? He was conscious of change at first, conscious of the fact that he was becoming trouble, and bearing it not well.

There was stillness all about him, and there came a stillness upon his spirit, making it possible for him to uplift his downcast face, to stand there on the edge of the mound with his hands clasped together, as it in strong entirety.

So he stood a long time, not knowing that it was long, not knowing that the great dark expanse of cloud that lay athwart the eastern horizon was beginning to lit a little from the sea. When he looked, there was a rose-red glow upon the distant waters.

■ was but a faint glow, yet it flashed a light into the soul of the man who stood watching it.

"So it will be!" he said, speaking aloud ■ his sudden sense of relief. "So it will be! If I stand through the night, if I stand firm, and still, and silent as I have stood through this night, I shall see the morning."

THOUGH several days had come and gone in the slow torture of suspense, they had left no bitterness, there was yet a smile on the uplifted face of Genevieve Bartholomew when Kirkoswald entered the studio at Netherbank. It was an eloquent smile, and it said plainly, "Through it all I have known that you would come."

No history of these days was written in her eyes, or upon her forehead, but Genevieve, looking into George's face, saw certainly that new records were graven there. She might not comprehend what she perceived, but her heart sank swiftly, even at his greeting, comprehending with unerring sureness the touch of change.

He was not aware of the change. He did not realise to how great an extent his solitary strife had darkened his countenance and wrought its influence upon his manner.

At the first glance at the artist's face, Kirkoswald had seen for himself that Noel Bartholomew was yet unaware of the words that had been spoken ■ Bukking Gill. He hardly knew whether he were, or were not, disappointed. Had Bartholomew asked but one question, that question had elicited all that was weighing so heavily on George Kirkoswald's heart and brain. He had prepared himself to speak if this opportunity were given. If it were not given he would not force it, not at least until he could see the next step beyond.

He knew, only too sadly, that silence would inevitably lead to misconstruction, misjudgment, but till the truth could be made plain he must endure to be misjudged.

Even yet, he saw nothing definite before him. There had been no change without or within since the night when he had stood under the stars, and had waited, simply waited, till the shadows of the night had risen slowly from the horizon, leaving the rose-red glow upon the morning sea.

The influence of that hour was still upon him, subduing his impatience, controlling his too eager desires, modifying the too strong spirit of rebellion that still stirred within him at times. The feeling that his duty was to wait, his task to possess his soul in patience, was deepening to a conviction.

The one thing above all others that would tax and strain his patience was the knowledge that it could not be understood, and if ■ were not understood suffering would be inevitable, not for himself—he was not thinking of himself now, but of Genevieve. Any sign that the suffering had begun to fall upon her would have tasked his resolution severely, but no such sign was given for him ■ read. There was a little natural confusion, a change of colour, a swift flash of recollection in her glance, but nothing more than this. Both father and daughter had received him with the simple courteous warmth that had marked his reception at the cottage from the beginning.

"You will be expected ■ give an account of yourself," said Noel Bartholomew, taking up his brushes again and turning to his easel. "I should have been prepared to hear something serious if it had not been for Genevieve. I wanted to come ■ look after you, but she wouldn't let me."

"Perhaps Miss Bartholomew may consider me ■ be sufficiently successful in looking after myself," said George, with a touch of bitterness in his tone which certainly seemed ■ be uncalled for, and which perhaps surprised himself as much as it surprised any body else. He was feeling very bitter as he sat there in the straight-backed chair of antique oak, where he had placed himself away from the window, away from Genevieve, who sat in the light with her golden head bent over her needle, and her pale, sweet face bereft of all expression save one of patient wonder. He had not prepared himself for this sudden appreciation of the pain and loss that would arise out of his position. The moment was one of trial. Forgive him if he bore it ill.

Noel Bartholomew's feeling of wonder was quite equal to that of Genevieve, and his first thought was, very naturally, the thought that matters were not going so smoothly between his daughter and his friend as he had brought himself to hope they might. The same idea had occurred to him before during the past few days. It seemed to be confirmed now.

A little silence followed upon George Knkowsald's unexpected reply, but Bartholomew soon ended it.

"I do not know how that may be," he said, "but we are both of us aware that you have proved yourself ■ be very successful in taking care of others. . . . But I forget, I was not to thank you."

"No, don't thank me and don't remind me."

"Very good, we do not need to remind ourselves."

Genevieve looked up from her work with a smile, as if in ratification of her father's remark. She seemed to have a word ready to use with the smile, but it remained unspoken, dying into silence, as the smile died into the look of patience that had been there before.

"You will begin to wonder why I have come now," George said at last, speaking in a tone that might almost be termed abrupt for him. "I have come with an invitation, as much from Canon Gabriel as from myself. The foundation-stone, or memorial-stone, or whatever it may be, ■ be laid at Soulsgate in a fortnight or so. The Canon will let you know the exact day."

"The foundation-stone? Do you mean for the music-room?" Genevieve exclaimed, forgetting all in unconcealed delight. "Are things so far advanced as that?"

"Light is dawning upon me," said Bartholomew. "I do not wonder that we should have seen so little of you. Who is your architect?"

"A man at York—a Mr. Bush."

"You have been there?"

"Yes, I was there three days; the last three days of the past week."

"And the ground has been bought, the builder chosen, the plans drawn and accepted, and a ceremony arranged for laying the foundation-stone? Canon Gabriel did well to compliment you on your energy."

"I am glad to have something on which to expend my energy," said Knkowsald.

"You find yourself possessed of a superfluous?"

"It will seem like boasting if I say 'yes,' nevertheless it is the truth at present. I have heard of people who could, by means of physical exhaustion, arrive at a most desirable and blessed state of mental hebetude. It is not easy."

"You have been making the experiment?"

"I am still making it. That is one of my reasons for consenting ■ the Canon's plea that these should be a kind of ceremony, so that he might make a semi-public day of it. It seems that he has been wishing for such a day for a long time. He wants to see the people of the neighbourhood about him once again, he has reasons, so ■ says. There is to be luncheon at the Rectory."

"And who is to lay the stone?" Genevieve asked, looking up from the piece of pale green satin that she was embroidering. The light above her seemed to throw the child-like curves of her mouth and chin into exquisite relief, and her face was full of the simple, beautiful, tender regret that was overcoming her perplexity—regret for the passing shadow that would so surely pass.

There was no sign that it was passing now on the face of George Kirkoswald. Genevieve's very natural question had developed another phase of the incomprehensible change in him and in his manner. Something that was almost a frown had suddenly darkened his forehead and the lines about his mouth were compressed as if with bitterness. He sat silent for awhile, not knowing how to keep the silence, nor how to break it by speech that cost so much.

His lips parted presently.

"Canon Gabriel will lay the stone," he said, with most evident effort.

If he might only have explained—if he might only have told them that a month before everything had been arranged in his own mind on quite other lines—if he might have said that there had never been for him the slightest question about the laying of the stone, that he had decided that Genevieve herself should lay it, and that he had intended that her doing so should be taken for an open declaration of the engagement that existed between them—if he might have relieved himself of all this, and then have gone on to the rest, the sudden shock of pain and disappointment that had come upon him, leaving him in perplexity, in dread, in an endless seeming suspense, then it might have been that he would have had less need to crave the dull oblivion that comes of utter weariness. He might have borne the strain after that, and have borne it not so heavily, having sympathy.

But it might not be, so he had decided, thinking and hoping that he did well, and at least knowing surely that he had not come to his decision through weakness or self-seeking, or dread of any pain that might come upon himself.

Presently he rose to go, but he lingered about the studio awhile, not seeing the questioning eyes that were now and then lifted to him, not wishing to see them, but knowing that they were lifted, and understanding the unspoken words only too plainly. He would not forget. Some day he would answer them all, and in answering he would make amends for the present silence. He was not conscious that there was something in himself that was worse than any silence. Every moment he betrayed it in his manner. Now, as always, it was a courteous manner, but something was missing from it. The fine openness of its cordiality was gone, in place of it there was restraint, carefulness, and an apparently studious dread of relapsing into the old natural ways that had been so dangerously full of living charm.

Quite suddenly Kirkoswald stopped beside the easel. It was a kind of pause that the others felt, and they felt also the effort that was in his question.

"Is that Yarell Croft that you are painting?" he asked, as if unable to believe the thing he saw.

Bartholomew smiled. "You are not complimentary to-day," he replied. "Certainly it is meant for Yarell Croft. Shall I need to label it?"

"That will depend upon its destination, I should say. Pardon me, but what made you choose to put such a place? Is it considered to be picturesque?"

Again the quiet smile quivered under Bartholomew's moustache. He felt a sense of success in that he had aroused his visitor's interest at last.

"Yarell Croft is not picturesque, not at least in my estimation," he said, "and I did not choose to paint it. I was asked to do so."

"It is a commission?"

"Yes it is a commission."

There was a certain emphasis in the deliberateness with which Kirkoswald turned from the easel and walked to the window that looked out over the Marshes. He stood there some time. Matters had been complicated before. Had he unwittingly stumbled across a new complication?

Bartholomew also had his thoughts.

"I hardly know why I need trouble myself to mention the fact," he said, as Kirkoswald came back again, "but it was not Miss Richmond who asked me to paint the picture, it was her brother. He asked me to paint two views of the place, this and a view of the old gateway in the garden."

"In obedience to the commands of his sister, doubtless?"

"I believe not indeed I may say that I have reasons for knowing that ■ was not so. Miss Richmond was in London at the time, and besides, there was an unmistakable air of unpremeditatedness about the request."

"It is a commission?"

"I am glad ■ hear it," said Kirkoswald, with as little gladness in his tone as a man might have.

More than ever Genevieve was puzzled. ■ was quite within the range of things that George Kirkoswald should take an interest in her father's work. He had always taken an interest in it, but it had not seemed to her that he was in the mood ■ day to care whether a commission had been given by one person or another.

Some idea connected with this matter had moved him, this was evident, but it was also evident that ■ had not moved him to forget the strange coldness and restriction of his new attitude. It was in his manner to her father as well as in his manner to herself. This was not comforting, nor did it tend toward a better comprehension of one whose every word and thought had always seemed so nobly and simply easy of comprehension. The change had been irksome, had it been nothing worse.

"You did not give me any answer about coming down to Soulsgrif," George said after another pause, and speaking as if he did not care much to receive any answer just then. "I shall see you again, perhaps," he added. "If I do not, you will see the Canon, he will have a better acquaintance with his programme than I have. It is his — the whole of it — not mine."

"You do not speak as if you were anticipating a pleasant affair," said Bartholomew, with quiet surprise.

"So much the better, since I am not misleading you. But it would be a wiser way not to speak of ■ at all, not ■ present. I hardly know what I can say truthfully that I ought to say."

He was shaking hands with Genevieve as he spoke. Their eyes met for one long instant, long enough for the revelation of all that might be revealed at that moment. For the life of him George Kirkoswald could not have kept back the truth from the glance he gave, even had he wished to keep it back, which could hardly be said of him, utterly at fault with himself and the world as he was. Genevieve was half contented when he turned away. "Whatever the change may be it is not that change," she said to herself with a sigh of relief that was half a sob. Then other thoughts, other emotions, came crowding quickly one after the other, but that first thought remained through them all. "It is not that change," she went on saying to soothe herself. "■ is not that."

He loves me still Let no one dream but that he loves me still.

CHAPTER XXVI.—THE BELLS RING LOUD WITH GLAD SOME POWER

*I could not choose but for it. I was born to poet eyes
To love all things that show me all that's in the world
Lily, the daisy, the poppy—MRS. BROWNING*

THE church at Thurkeld Abbey being dedicated to St. Peter, and St. Peter's Day being in June, it was very natural that Canon Gabriel should choose that day for the small unregal festival that he had desired to have, and the Canon's lightest wish was law to George Kirkoswald. There was to be a service to begin the morning with, that was why the bells were ringing so gaily up in the tower.

The little town was all alive by ten o'clock, flags were streaming across the street in the hot summer sunshine, children in gay holiday giments with faces fresh as apple-blossom were running all about the place. Carnages were coming in from the country, disappearing under the wide archway at the Richmond Arms. Some of the gags went down to the Brown Cow. The gay people looked quite as happy as the carnage people, and they were much merrier, if that meant anything.

When the service was over the people all went down together into Soulsgrif light. It was only a short distance, it seemed too short to some who hardly knew what it was to be out of doors on the morning of such a glad, glorious day as this. All the way by the roadside the pale wild roses were clustering in the green hedgerows, the woodbine swayed with the rose-sprays against the sunny blue beyond. The tall grasses in the cliff-top meadows surged to the light breeze, the lark sang overhead, away out of sight,

 Like a poet hidden
In the light of thought,
Singing truths unsought
Till the world is brought To sympathy with him and hears it brooded not **

Naturally the broad stream of people that came out from the church had separated into little groups. The Canon was passing in and out among them, dropping a gentle word here, an encouraging word there, thinking all the while that to that man, or to that little child he might speak no other word. But the thought in nowise saddened him. Nobody there seemed sad. "The weariness, the fever, and the fret" of life had been left behind for a little while.

Mr. Severne also was doing his best, he always did his best, though there were people at Thurkeld Abbey who snubbed him a little, because ■ held himself so cheaply at their service. He was very much at Mrs. Caton's service this morning, but Mrs. Caton was suffering some disappointment. She did not care to put up with the Curate while the Canon had walked for at least five minutes by the side of that dear, uncertain little Miss Damer, who had such inconvenient attacks of plain speaking. The Curate was made to feel the Canon's indiscretion. Miss Stanlake was going down with the Pencifolds, and enjoying her walk very much. A little way behind them was Mr Ishmael Crudas, in a shining new black coat, aggressive white linen and a pair of very large black kid gloves. It may be supposed that his individuality suffered, but it did not. There was sufficient in the man to enable him to carry off more than this, and even Miss Craven was obliged to acknowledge as he walked by her side. She was angry with him for having dared to join her on this public occasion, but all the same she had expected it, and now that he was there she was very proud of him, though not perhaps quite so proud as he was of her. And, indeed, she looked all but handsome in the black silk mantle, and pink trimmed bonnet that was still so pretty and becoming. Since the dead weight of anxiety had been lifted a little she had recovered to a wonderful degree the freshness of her youth and something of the temper of her youth also. It was many a long day since she had smiled so gleefully and freely as she smiled when George Kukoswald passed by, running his hat and wishing her a courteous "good day."

Genevieve and her father were a little in advance. A tiny girl was crossing the road, offering a posy of half-blown white wild rose mingled with scented sprays of blossoming thyme. The little ones were quick to perceive which were the flowers that pleased best. Genevieve was stopping to listen the posy in her dainty white dress when George came up, and at the first glance he saw that though there was still a stiffness in his face it was not the same stiffness that it had been there before. There was no bitterness in it, it could not be that bitterness, which is almost always bitterness, should stay long, in a nature like his. He shook hands, holding Genevieve's hand in his lingeringly, and he uttered his greeting in the warm, quiet, emphatic way that she had loved in him from the beginning. It made the mere fact of meeting him something to be remembered. The girl's heart bounded as he spoke, and she departed swiftly. It was going to be a good day then after all! It was only now that she knew how little she had hoped.

"You will have seen Canon Gabriel,"

George was saying, speaking more especially to Mr Bartholomew, "and I dare say you know more than I know. No? Well, I suppose there is to be a brief service of some kind down in the Bight, merely a sort of dedication of the place to good uses. Then we are to come back again and have luncheon at the Rectory. After that there is to be tea in the school room at Thirkeld Abbas for the children and their friends. I should advise you not to stay for the tea," he added in a lower tone, and turning to Genevieve. "It will make the day too long, too fatiguing for you."

Genevieve only answered by a quick change of colour, and drooping eyelids. She was not quite sure that there was not some danger of tears. It was all so unexpected, the joking, teasing, authoritative tone that was associated with the first words of his that she had ever heard the glance that was so full of unspeakable meanings, the manner that was all defiance, all tender regard for her, for her happiness, her comfort. Had she then doubted after all? No, it was not that it was not doubt, but all the same this new certainty was sweet, and being unlooked for at that moment, it was doubly precious.

For Genevieve, as for some others, the top of Southgill Bank was reached all too quickly. The people were stirring down in the Bight, and flags were flying there also—bunting in its gayest colours, along the coast. Two or three fishing vessels in the bay, lying at anchor, were decorated from stern to stem. When the Canon came in sight at the top of the bank, with his surplice flying in the breezy summer sunshine, a band of music sent its patriotic strains floating up the cliff side. "That is 'Rule Britannia,'" said Canon Gabriel, who had just joined Kukoswald and the Bartholomews. "I mention it that hereafter I may not be classed with Dean Hook, who claimed to be acquainted with two tunes, one was 'God Save the Queen' and the other wasn't, but I believe no one ever heard him venture the name of the other."

Quite suddenly there burst upon the throng of people who were coming down the bank, a full view of the site of the new music room, very much more than the site. The wall was some twelve or fourteen feet high on the seaward side. The ground had been well chosen, though it was only just out of the reach of the wild waves that dashed so often and so madly into the little Bight. It was a kind of plateau just above the houses on the north side. The people would only have to step from their own door to the door of this new place of entertainment that was already the chief topic of conversation among the fisher-folk. They did not understand much about it yet; they were waiting, but not suspiciously, not disdainfully, as Yorkshire folk are apt to wait for the development of any new thing. Since the brave master of Usselby had to do with it, it could only be right and good.

The people were still going downward, the strains of the music still stealing upward, mingled a little with the splash of the waves, and the shouts of children at play by the water side. Presently another sound came grudging into the harmony, the sound of carriage wheels coming downward with the crowd. Canon Gabriel turned, wondering a little that any one should willingly drive down such a road as that. He ceased all at once to wonder.

"Did you invite Mrs. Richmond?" he asked, tuning with some surprise to George Kirkowald.

There was a sudden silence, a sudden pain, on George's face there was a sudden and strange pallor.

"Is it Mrs. Richmond?" he said, speaking in a voice that seemed like a husk to him of his own.

CHAPTER XXXVII.—(CONCERNING CHARITY.)

"I was well as well as more as a man and put I think we'll be better than the rest of the world. Only in knowing that we have not lost it."

The V. Canon's Epistle

PERHAPS every one of that little foremost group, except Genevieve, had noticed the change on George Kirkowald's face. Genevieve had turned aside to speak to Ailsie Drewie, who had a message to give from Davy. There was a tear on the woman's cheek. She grieved for the absence of her little lad on such a day as this.

Looking up Genevieve saw the carriage, and recognised its occupants. It had stopped in the shade of the tall cliff. Mrs. Richmond was leaning back, holding her parasol demurely. Cecil was looking round.

"Ought I to go and speak to Mrs. Richmond, father?" Genevieve asked. George had turned with the Canon and Mr. Severne to ask some question of Mr. Smartt, the builder. Bartholomew looked perplexed for a moment. "No," he said, "no, there is no necessity for that. Miss Richmond will not remain long in the carriage. You will have opportunities of speaking to her."

The people were all streaming toward the heaps of building material that were lying about on the rocky plateau under the cliffs. Mr. Smartt was making explanations. The room was to be a long L-shaped room. The main portion was to be a music-room, that could also be used as a school-room, lecture-room, or reading-room, as occasion demanded. The transept, if it might be so termed, was to be shut off by an oak screen. And if the Archbishop permitted, it was to be used as a mission-room. The Canon had written to His Grace of York, but this matter was not yet settled. On the southern side there was to be a tiny cottage, to be occupied by someone likely to be of use in the place. This was nearly all that could be definitely pointed out to the admiring and wondering people. They were told that the stone-mullioned window to the north was to be filled with stained glass; and that the glass was to have an inscription on it, but Mr. Smartt did not know what the inscription was to be. He believed that it would pertain to some event that had happened in Mr. Kirkowald's family. That was all that he had to tell.

The memorial stone was to be placed over this particular seaward looking window. It was a large round topped tablet—

"I was well as well as more as a man and put I think we'll be better than the rest of the world. Only in knowing that we have not lost it."

It had been intended to place an inscription on the stone also, but this intention was held in abeyance. There was only the date, Mr. Kirkowald's initials, and an awkward, empty space underneath.

A little wooden platform had been raised outside so that the Canon might stand there when the stone was lowered into its place. As soon as his surplice was seen floating above the crowd there was an instant silence, every voice, a pause before the singing of the hymn that the choir sang in simple, sweet, child-like voices.

Some prayers were read, another hymn sung, then the great carved tablet was lowered and set carefully in its place upon the mortar that the Canon had spread with a new towel. After that the stone was declared to be duly laid; and the little service of commendation was ended.

At the end of it the Canon stepped forward again to the edge of the platform. He had a few words to say—a few words of explanation, of entreaty, of desire that the building should be a means of helping them all to fulfil the two great commandments. He dwelt most upon the second of the two—the command that there should be brotherhood among men, and all that brotherhood implies.

He was growing very earnest ■ he urged the simple philosophy of his religion. "Be good, be loving," he said. "There is much sorrow in life, much contradiction, but nothing can contradict the truth or the beauty that comes of simple goodness, simple lovingness. St Paul himself knew of nothing bitter. He counted the great grand gift of prophecy itself less than this gift of human loving kindness. The gift of prophecy!—think how glad—glad to the verge of awe, any one among us standing here to day would be, if he were to find himself suddenly admitted to the goodly fellowship of the prophets, the seers, endowed with the gift of foretelling future events in the splendidly poetic language of an Isaiah—language that might rouse the world from its indolence and luxury, its worship of wealth, its forgetfulness of God. A man so dowered would hardly know how to express his gratitude. And yet St. Paul counts this power an inferior power to the gift of loving. He says ■ quite plainly. Nay, he says much more—he declares that even faith, faith strong enough to remove mountains, would count for nothing if he had not love. 'If I have not love, I am nothing.' That is his own expression."

There was a little rustling now on the edge of the crowd, and it grew louder, so the Canon waited. He could not but see the cause of it all. Kirkoswald saw it too, though he had stood with bowed head, and eyes downcast under his dark brooding forehead. It was as if he felt Miss Richmond coming sweeping towards the place where they stood, her brother by her side, her cream coloured dress with all its fringes and ribbons of dark gold silk quivering and fluttering as she moved. She was exquisitely dressed. Her bonnet was of the same colour, ivory-white and dark shining gold. Her gloves, her parasol, her fan, had all been chosen to match. Perhaps she had never looked more beautiful, more touchingly fascinating than she did as she stood there among the fisher-folk of Soulsgnif Bight, listening with downcast eyes and serious face ■ the words that were falling from the lips of the fragile looking old man who was speaking so directly from his heart.

He went on again as soon as he perceived that the people were waiting. "I have not much more ■ say," he began. "We were speaking of love, the love that envieth not, that vaunteth not itself, that ■ not puffed up, that doth not behave itself unseemly, that seeketh not its own. Ah, if we would think of that awhile!—the beauty of a human life that was not seeking anything for itself, that was seeking always to add something to some other life—some peace, some happiness, some freedom from care and pain, some consolation in time of trial, some sympathy when all the outer world was dark and full of gloom. What a crown the angels would see always on the face of the man or woman who lived so! It could hardly be necessary to say that such a one would be not easily provoked, would be able ■ bear ■ things, endure all things, would believe all things, hope all things, would rejoice only in the right, the pure, the for ever true.

"I have purposely left ■ the last, one of the most magnificent clauses of ■ Paul's description of charity,—he declares that ■ 'thinketh no evil'. I prefer the newer reading, 'taketh not account of evil'. To what a height a man must have risen before this could be said of him—that he could not ■ provoked, and that he took no account of any evil! Does it seem as if such a one would be far away from us? It would not be so. He would be here among us, living your life, or living my life. There alone would be the test of his power of human lovingness—if he lived among the unloving, among those who were blind to his love, deaf to his sympathy, who were unable to understand his life, his motives, his aim, who would repay his best efforts with coldness, neglect, contumely, humiliation.

"Into the life of each one of us there comes some measure of human evil, human hardness, human cruelty. Perhaps, unhappily, some of us must go back ■ the endurance of such things to day. . . Let us think of it in the hour of our need, of this fine ideal of St Paul, the love that taketh not account of evil."

This was almost the last word. The little descendant had only occupied a few minutes. The Canon came down from the platform, Mr. Severn carefully helping him, the band began playing the Old Hundredth, the people began to assort themselves into groups again, and Genevieve, turning, found herself face ■ face with Diana Richmond and her brother.

Miss Richmond put out a pretty cream-and-gold coloured hand.

"How are you to day, Miss Bartholomew?" she asked with quiet emphasis, and looking intently into Genevieve's face as she spoke, as if watching for some sign. Genevieve was blushing, looking round with confusion. "She is looking for protection," said Miss Richmond to herself. But this was not true. The girl was only looking about to see if by any chance this might be a fitting opportunity for that explanation that she still longed to make. But the Canon was coming toward them with Mr Severne, and Miss Richmond was speaking of the little address.

"It was so perfect in its way, was it not?" she was saying in a tone that had something almost like humility in it. "You would know better how to express it than I do, the charm of it, I mean. ■ it his style? There is some thing—what shall I call it—distinction?—that makes the most commonplace things seem new when they have been repeated by him."

The Canon came up, looking a little as if he had not been able to help hearing what Miss Richmond was saying. Mr Severne blushed ■ if she had spoken of him.

"What am I ■ say for myself?" Miss Richmond asked in her prettiest way of Canon Gabriel.

"What am I to say for myself?" the old man said, having a desire ■ be courteous as well as truthful.

"Say that you forgot me."

"But that would not be true. I did not forget you. I thought of you more than once."

"Ah, that sounds terrible! But go on, please, let me know the worst."

"The worst is that I invite you—and of course Mr Richmond, to go back with us now to luncheon, if you will be so kind."

If his invitation was accepted, a little perhaps to the Canon's surprise, and certainly to his regret. Kirkoswald hearing of it felt that an end had been put to any prospect of enjoyment the day might have had for him. There would be nothing but dread now, and a momentary expectation of some coup de theatre, such as Miss Richmond would so well know how to accomplish on such an occasion as this. It seemed to him that she must have come for the purpose, and it was impossible but that he should watch her every movement, ponder the lightest word when any word of hers reached him. Still he was trying not to think of her, trying with all his might to think how it might be with a man who had arrived at that point of taking no account of any evil. He was not lightly impressed, but any impression that he once received was not easily erased. He had no wish that this impression should be erased. It might help him if it remained, and he knew well that he had never needed any spiritual help in his temporal life more than he needed it just now.

Genevieve had declined Miss Richmond's invitation to accept a seat in the carriage, and Cecil was told to signal ■ the coachman to drive back up the cliff before them, Miss

Richmond declaring that she should enjoy the walk. Mr Severne, who was growing puzzled over things, came to Genevieve's side as they moved to go. He had been watching for this opportunity all day. Miss Richmond deliberately turned, and waited for George Kirkoswald.

"Who exactly is the master of the feast?" she asked in her usual low, deliberate tone, and holding out her hand with the finely gracious gesture that she knew so well how to use. "Canon Gabriel! Ah, I have been asking him to tell me why I was not invited, but he was too polite to tell me the truth. Now, I command that you tell me."

"I do not know. I have had little ■ do with the affair. I never saw the list of people who were to be invited."

"No? That is somewhat strange, is it not? Well, I bear no malice."

She said this with such a simple air, there was such a look of truth—of almost touching good-will upon her face, that Kirkoswald was altogether perplexed. He paused a moment, thinking of the night under the stars, when he had only waited, waited silently. . . . Was it well to test the efficacy of speech?

"This is neither the time nor the place to discuss grave matters," he said at length, speaking with effort. "Forgive me if I seem to have little tact in introducing anything grave. I will only say a word. It concerns the letter I received from you. You would get my reply?"

"Pardon me, it was no reply."

"No, you are right there," said George, and in truth Miss Richmond was right. The answer he had sent was little more than an acknowledgment of the receipt of her letter, and it had been sent simply because he had not been able ■ bring himself to a thing so discourteous and cowardly as refusal to reply to a letter written by a woman, though that woman were his greatest enemy. "You are right," he said, "I wrote too briefly, but I thought it better to do that than to say anything I might afterward repent having said."

"You are growing cautious," she said with a smile.

"If only it be not too late," replied George with meaning. "But I did not allude to the matter for the pleasure of talking it over. ■ occurred to me when you spoke just now that, perhaps, your coming down here to-day might imply some change—some modification of your intention. I thought if it were so I would make it easy for you to express the change—that was all. ■ was a hope. ■ it were a mistaken one you have only ■ say so."

Miss Richmond raised her eyes slowly in their dusky depths, her crimson lips curved slightly towards disdain.

"If I understand your hope rightly, it was most decidedly a mistaken one," she said, speaking in low yet firm—at might almost be said bitter tones.

Kirkoswald said no more, there was no thing more to be said just then. The crowd was going up the hill with them, busy with its own enjoyment, the band was playing a sentimental air with variations. Some one said it was "Love Not." Mrs. Canon had secured the Canon's attention at last, or rather her little daughter, Janthe, had secured it, which was the same thing. Mr Bartholomew was giving eminent satisfaction to Miss Craven by walking on the other side of Mr. Crudas. A little behind them was Genevieve, and the puzzled, but quite happy, Mr. Severne. Things were just as they should be from his point of view.

"Miss Richmond ■ very handsome, don't you think so?" he was saying to Genevieve, reserving in his own mind an opinion that it was a style of handsomeness he did not like. He did not care for the dusky beauty of olive tints, and purple black hair. For him the one beautiful woman was a woman who looked like embodied sunshine, and that, it seemed to him, was just how Miss Bartholomew looked ■ day.

Genevieve was a little excited—excited by surprise and wonder, and a strange, nameless stirring of nameless fears. She was grateful to Mr. Severne for remaining so faithfully by her side, and trying to amuse her, as he was doing. There was no unhappiness on her face, and her colour was not coming and going as it did sometimes. It stayed on her cheek, and on her lips, her large, violet-grey eyes were full of a beautiful tender light, and the sunshine caught the golden ripples of her hair, and the wind played with it under her wide brimmed Gainsborough hat, over which the large white feathers were drooping. All her dress was white, she liked to have it so herself, her father liked it too, and there was another who had asked her what she would do if some day she found her self prohibited from wearing any but white dresses? She remembered the day and the question. They seemed far away now. Everything simple, and straight, and comprehensible, seemed far away.

They had reached the Rectory by this time. The luncheon was waiting, some thirty or forty people sat down, Miss Richmond taking her place at the Canon's right hand with a charmingly natural gracefulness. Mr. Severne sat at the other end of the table, happy because Miss Bartholomew was there with her father, not too far away for conversation.

It was not particularly interesting conversation. Mr. Bartholomew was preoccupied, Genevieve was watching for some one who never came—the Canon explained his absence. Mr. Kirkoswald had had ■ go down into the Bight again ■ consult about some urgent matter with the builder, Miss Richmond expressed her regret openly. She repeated the expression of ■ before she went away, and repeated it with so much meaning and emphasis that the people who were left behind wondered over it. Was it not all dead and forgotten, that old affair between the master of Usselby and the mistress of Yarrall Croft? Had there not been new whispers on the wind of late, whispers of another and ■ likelier attachment? The people who approved of Genevieve were beginning to think a little hardly of George Kirkoswald. They had imagined him to be a man who would at least know his own mind about a thing so important ■ this, and they had not imagined him to be one who would trifle for an hour in any matter in which trifling could lead to danger or to pain.

A few hours later, when the school room tea was over, and the people had all gone quietly home, George Kirkoswald dragged himself somewhat wearily up through Murk-Mushes to the cottage at Netherbank. Mr. Bartholomew had gone across the fields with Ishmael Crudas. Genevieve was alone in the little sitting room, she had opened the casement window that looked out upon the orchard, the low sun was streaming through the leaves of the climbing rose tree that went up over the thatch, the pink petals came floating slowly in over the flower-pots. A pair of white and pearl-tinted doves had perched on the window sill, the one was cooing softly, the other was listening with her head bent downward, listening steadfastly as if with a quite human power of attention.

Kirkoswald had intended to go down to the studio, not knowing that Bartholomew was not there. His footstep made no sound on the rank grass. Presently ■ stopped by the cottage wall. Had the cooing of the doves arrested him? Was there any one there out of sight among the rose leaves, speaking softly in the low red light?

■ was only a few words that he heard, words spoken gently to gentle living things, as people will speak sometimes who live much alone, and are much acquainted with sorrow.

"Do you love each other so?" the voice was saying in a musical undertone. "Do you like to sit there and say loving, comforting things? Do you understand each other? Do you always understand each other, even when you are apart and cannot speak? Have you faith in one another always, or is there no need of faith in that world of yours? I wish I knew, I wish I might know if you perplex each other, give each other pain?"

A minute later Kirkoswald was standing in the room by Genevieve's side. She did not know that he had heard any word of hers. She only saw on his face a great sorrow, a great resoluteness, a great silence. Blended with these there was a strong passionate yearning that she could not but comprehend. He would not sit down, though she asked him to do so.

"I must not stay here," he said in a quiet, steady way. "I ought not to have come, it sounds like weakness to say that I could not help it. But I may say it, since it is the truth."

Genevieve stood quite calmly opposite to him. She still wore her white dress, a great loop of her shining yellow hair had fallen over it, she was looking at him with an infinite wistfulness in her dark beautiful eyes.

"You know that you are perplexing me?" she asked gently and with an evident effort after self command.

"Perplexing you? Do I know it? I hardly know anything else, I hardly think of anything else. Night and day now I am wondering what you are thinking of me, how you are feeling towards me, and if when all this torture is over you can ever have the same feeling you have had toward me? It is all the consolation I have now, that you have had it. Nothing can take that from me, the knowledge that you have cared for me."

"And you are thinking that I have changed?"

"Changed! I am looking at you now with an almost boundless wonder because of your changelessness, because of the beauty of your faith in one who must seem so utterly futile, so utterly worthless. And the intolerable part of it is that I cannot rightly ask you to have faith in me. If I could even ask you ■ try to keep up your faith I think the worst would be over. ■ could want then, I could endure then."

"And if I say unasked that I will have faith, will that help you ■ endure?" the girl said, standing there tall and still, and seeming as if a new nobleness had come into her nobility.

"If you say that, it will almost do away with any need for endurance," George replied with a quick light in his eyes, a quick expression of relief, of gladness.

"Then I will say it, I say it of my own accord, that I will have faith in you so long as you shall need my faith."

And if circumstance seems strong against me?

"I will try to be as strong as circumstance."

So she spoke in a vain confidence, not knowing that it was vain. How should she know until circumstance had borne her down before it as a reed in the marsh borne down before the wind?

Le 1^{er} Psalm 30 and Matt. 5: 20 to end.

THE greatest joy is often akin to sadness. When we reach the end of a work that has cost us long and anxious labour, we are moved more to tears than to laughter. But in the clove of the life of Christ there is neither sadness nor joy. There is the holiest calm. As on a night of storm, when the clouds break and reveal untroubled depths of sky and the eternal stars, so at the closing words from the Cross, "It is finished, Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit," the thick canopy of suffering rolls apart, and we gaze into a heaven of peace, where all is still.

Such is the general impression we receive, but a closer consideration shows us some deeper lessons. For the last word from the Cross as associated with the act of dying throws much light upon the character of our Lord's death.

We must bear in mind the remarkable language in which the New Testament describes the death of Christ as a voluntary act. We die because we must, but He died as One who had "power to lay down His own life and power to take ■ again." And so it is said that "He poured out His soul unto death"—as conveying an idea of active rather than passive submission ■ death. Death was the crowning act of His obedience and self-surrender. All the evangelists employ words which imply an act of volition. St. Matthew says, "He yielded up the ghost," or rather, "He sent forth" or "discharged His spirit," St. Mark and St. Luke, "He breathed out His spirit," and St. John, "He surrendered the spirit." Again, while death ■ thus regarded as, in a sense, the voluntary act of Christ the resurrection is, on the other hand, described as the act of the Father. The constant usage of the Apostles is to the effect that God raised Him from the dead.

Keeping these thoughts in mind, let us consider the force of the word, "Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit," as connected with the resurrection from the dead.

On the night before the crucifixion Jesus had offered the sublime prayer, "Father, the hour is come, glorify Thy Son, that Thy Son also may glorify Thee. I have finished the work Thou gavest me to do, and now, O Father, glorify Thou me with that glory which I had with Thee before the world was." Two chief thoughts are here—(1) The glory of the Father, and (2) The glory of the Son. Both were ■ be illustrated in the work of Christ. The Son was to glorify the Father by acting in the spirit of Sonship, and the Father was to glorify the Son by raising Him to that "glory which He had with Him before the world was."

The Sonship of Christ ■ the broad characteristic of His work in humanity as our Second Adam, and the root of our new life as children of God. The contrast between the fall and the redemption of man rests on this point. It is eternally the life of man to know God and to be towards Him as a son. It ■ eternally death for man to be self-centred, and so outcast. In unbelief and self-assertion man fell, in obedience and self-surrender man was restored. The trials of Christ, whether in the temptation or on the Cross, concentrate upon the dependence of the Son on the will of the Father, and take the form of His yielding confident obedience even to death. He did this as in our humanity, and accepting its conditions. We must therefore realise the weakness as well as the strength of Jesus. His strength was faith, otherwise He became weak, yielding up all other resources but trust in God the Father. In this sense He was "crucified through weakness." He verily "emptied Himself" of every prerogative when He became a man, and lived simply in the strength of a Child under the hand of the Father, and knowing no refuge but the confidence ■ a Son. The grandeur of the Cross must accordingly be regarded as being in a great measure the manifestation of Sonship, and thereby the glorifying of the Father, by showing how worthy that Father is to be obeyed and trusted.

If these things are true, this last word then reaches the utmost point in the offering of the Cross. The highest act of Sonship was surely that one, when with full consciousness He gave Himself unto death, and with a distinct exercise of volition submitted to the assertion of its power over Him. He then allowed the cloud to roll between Him and the eternal light. He opened the flood gates of His being and let in the rush of the great darkness. He breathed out the spirit and fell back into the helplessness of death. But ere He plunged into the unconscious depths He uttered with a loud voice this appeal of Sonship, "Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit," and having said this, He "bowed His head and gave up the ghost." The utmost act of faith and obedience was accomplished in humanity, and was rendered in confidence in God, through the eternal Spirit offered Himself complete and living sacrifice unto God. He did so with the confession of perfect ■ ship. Was it all to end here? Or was there to be any reply from the Father to that confidence of the Son? If Jesus glorified the name "Father," how was the answer to be given which was to be the responsive glorifying of the Son? The reply to this question we shall consider next Lord's Day evening. In the meantime our minds are fixed simply on this final act of Sonship in which Christ yielded Himself wholly ■ God.

JUNE STAY.

Read Acts ii 22-36 Philippians ii 1-11

After He had said, "Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit, He bowed His head and gave up the ghost." The act of faith and obedience is complete, and Christ hangs on the Cross dead. The crowd scatters, leaving the two thieves lingering on ■ suffering. The disciples who had been watching afar off turn away, half in terror and in doubt. They are overwhelmed by the spectacle of that death which confounded all their hopes. They had thought that this was He who was to have redeemed Israel, but He is dead, and there has been no Elias to take Him down from the Cross, and no deliverance. The centurion, and the guard of soldiers continue watching by the dead body. And then the evening comes and Joseph receives the helpless corpse, and buries it in his own sepulchre, and Pilate takes care that the great stone is rolled to the mouth of the rock-hewn tomb, and that it is sealed with the official seal, and that soldiers are placed to guard it. The Sabbath comes, and the service goes on as if nothing had happened. The great day of the Feast is observed as of old. The crowd of pilgrims throngs the courts, and the ancient Psalms are chanted, and the ritual of the Day of Atonement is fulfilled, and it seems as if the priests had been right after all, and that Israel had yet to look for its Messiah.

Was then, that confidence of Him who called Himself the Son of God, all a dream? ■ there any such Father as He of whom He spoke? Did the voice of that dying prayer reach no farther than the air stirred by its accents? Surely our very life depends on the answer we give ■ such questions. What if there had been no response? What if the mockery could have been heaped on Him which fell on those who once cried to Baal, when from the blue passionless sky, there was "neither voice, nor any to answer, nor any that regarded"? The Son has glorified the Father, is there any Father at all to glorify the Son?

Thank God for the answer! "Thou didst not leave His soul in hell, neither didst Thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." Jesus died resting in God, and the response was the resurrection, when He was "declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead." The joyful cry passing from lip to lip, and uttered in wonder and in gladness, "Christ is risen!" is the answer to the prayer, "Glorify Thy Son, Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit." He who had yielded Himself into the hands of God is glorified of the Father, being exalted by Him into heavenly places, and brought to share the glory which He had with Him before the world was. And yet not altogether the same glory. For as raised in our humanity He is no more the Son of God only. He rises Son of man and Son of God. This is indeed the mystery of His glorification. Because He, the eternal Son, who thought it not robbery ■ be equal with God, "made Himself of no reputation, and being found in fashion as a man, had humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the Cross, Wherefore God also highly exalted Him, and gave Him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus"—the human name associated with His incarnation—"every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." And because He thus rises in our humanity, He rises not alone, but as the First fruits of the redeemed.

And thus the final word from the Cross lifts us into the conception of the complete offering in which Jesus accepted death, but accepted ■ with such a voluntary surrender of His spirit unto God as prepares us for His triumph over death, and His exaltation to the right hand of God. This is therefore no mere peaceful death-bed utterance, nor is it analogous to the prayer of ■ Stephen, when crushed beneath the shower of stones, he said, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." The cry of Christ was the loud, decisive, crowning utterance of the Son, in which before yielding himself ■ death, He committed all to the Father, resting in perfect sonship on Him who "would deliver Him, seeing that He had trusted in Him." "Thus trusting God, He was not confounded," and the joy of the resurrection morning was the answer of God to that confidence.

JUNE 15TH.

Read Psalm 132 1-4, 1 Peter 11 29-34

Humanity, so far as it has been reached by the gospel at all, has been touched in the highest measure by the tale of Christ's sufferings. The sorrows of Jesus have laid hold ■ this world of sorrow as no other moral or spiritual power has ever done. However transcendent the divine wisdom of the gospel may be, or however marvellous the vision it presents of an absolutely sinless and perfect life, yet it has not been so much by the ideal of truth or purity found in Christ that the spirit of Christian enthusiasm has been awakened as by "the agony and bloody sweat, the Cross and passion" of the great Sufferer. The Cross is indeed an epitome of all spiritual truth. The evil of sin, the love of God, the grandeur of duty are all there visibly set forth. It is God's appeal to heart and conscience. Yet the Cross was but the final expression of what was always characteristic ■ the life of Christ. He was not "wounded by our transgressions" at Calvary alone. He had continually come under the burden of human woe and been pierced by human iniquity. The various rays of truth became compressed into one burning focus when Christ died, but they had been present from the very commencement of His ministry, or rather from His very cradle in Bethlehem. So that if the Cross throws light on the life of Christ, no less does His life throw light on the Cross.

A proof of this is found in the remarkable application made by St. Matthew of the solemn words of Isaiah, usually referred to Christ's death alone, but regarded by him as receiving fulfilment in Christ's daily ministry. "When the even was come they brought unto him many that were possessed with devils, and he cast out the spirits with his word, and healed all that were sick: that might be fulfilled which was spoken by Isaiah the prophet, saying, Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses."

There are three spheres in the life of Christ in which His taking our infirmities and bearing our sins or sicknesses hold true—each one leading into a deeper range of suffering.

(1) He did so in the simplest sense as sharing the woes incidental to our humanity. Labour, weariness, hunger, cold, the privations of poverty and the discipline which falls on man first as a child, then as a member of society, may seem slight matters to us, because we are born into them as our lot. But when the eternal Son assumed our nature, He in love submitted to these conditions that He might redeem us. This may not at first appear to us in its full significance, and yet there some member of the noblest family in our land to be moved by such a chivalrous desire to help the wretched as to leave the luxuries of home and to live as the poor live, lodging for years in the stifling atmosphere of their squalid dwellings, to wear their rags, and not shrink from the lowest depths of their sufferings, and were all this done for the avowed purpose of bringing help, sympathy, and deliverance to them, we would at once recognise such an act as an heroic instance of self-sacrifice. And do we fail to see the glory of Him "Who for our sakes became poor," and who put Himself completely under the burthen of our trials? Even then in this barest sense of the words we can see how "He bore our infirmities," for as He "humbled Himself," that He might reach the very lowest and deliver them, He had necessarily to endure what they endured.

(2.) Again, St. Matthew records how the spectacle of human suffering appeared as a burthen of suffering to Christ Himself. The evangelist could not have meant that Christ literally bore our sicknesses, for He did not become leprous, or palsied, or blind. But yet such was the visible effect upon Him human woe that it seemed as if He Himself were the sufferer. This was no mere sentimental pity. It was the sorrow of holy love; and that belongs to a higher range of feeling than pity. The crowd of strangers gathered round some street accident feels pity, and strong men will turn away in very sickness from the scene. Yet such pity is weak beside the agony of love, when the wife or mother receives the patient home. Love then lays the burden so completely on the heart that each thrill of pain or interval of relief conveys its own pang or sense of peace. The love of Christ was in like manner too quick and close for mere pity. He suffered with the sufferers, and was so visibly affected by what He saw that they who beheld Him said, "Himself taketh their sickness and beareth their infirmities."

(3.) Still further, these words receive their highest significance when we transfer the ground of suffering from physical to spiritual causes, and understand how it was in a similar sense that "He bore our sins," and that the iniquities of us all "met on Him." For if bodily misery touched Him with acute pain, how much more must the moral sorrows of humanity have affected Him! His pure eye pierced to the very depths of evil, and saw it in its true nature. Sinful as we are we can somewhat comprehend this sorrow, for there is no honourable or good man to whom the disgrace of a dear child would not appear infinitely worse than any bodily sickness, or death itself. In proportion to the depth of his love and his hatred of wickedness would the tie which bound him to a scoundrel lay the burden of the child's evil upon his own spirit. In this sense, but in an infinitely higher degree, was Christ affected by the sin of man. He was verily pierced by our iniquity "It met on Him." Holy love laid it upon Him. It was sin that He thus bore, and we can best understand what was meant by His bearing it, when we apply to human evil the same interpretation of the words of the prophet as was employed by the evangelist to Christ as carrying our sicknesses and infirmities.

And these sufferings of Christ under sin become the profoundest confession of its greatness and its evil. We learn through "that agony and bloody sweat, that cross and passion" what sin is to God, for we there see how it affected Him who could in truth say to the world, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father."

JUNE 28TH.

Read Psalms xxvi. and Lxxv. 1-45

There are many lessons to be gathered from what we learned last Sunday regarding the sense in which our Lord came under the burden of human suffering and sin.

(1) One obvious lesson is the interest which the Christian Church, as expressing the mind of its Master, ought to take in the alleviation of the bodily diseases, and of the social miseries which affect humanity. The office fulfilled by the physician and surgeon, and the work accomplished by hospitals and asylums, as well as every enterprise which deals with social distress, ought to be recognised as essential parts of the work of the Redeemer's Church on earth. For that Church is wider than any ecclesiasticism, and they who are labourers together with God, are not to be limited to those who are ecclesiastically appointed. The religion which seeks a selfish salvation and the assurance of personal security alone, is not the religion which Christ came to establish. To be made like Jesus Christ is true salvation, and when we share His love, we must also be brought somewhat into fellowship with the sorrows of Him who in love came under the burden of the sicknesses and infirmities of the world.

(2) We learn from the spectacle of Christ's spiritual suffering under sin, how loathsome sin is to God. Not the thunders of Sinai nor the threatened penalty of eternal death can convey such a vivid conception of the nature of evil, as when we behold the disgust and sorrow with which it affected the Divine Son. Anger may terrify, but the sorrows of Jesus convince. Fear of punishment may deter, but the sufferings of the Lord under sin lead us to understand what that sin is, as in the light of God. We also learn how truly it must be the will of God to deliver us from it.

There are two classes of persons to whom it may be especially beneficial to regard their sinfulness as interpreted by the suffering of Jesus. It is good for those who are disposed to think lightly of ungodliness. They accept, perhaps, certain dogmas about the fall of man and the corruption of human nature, and the necessity for an atonement, because there are texts which can be quoted in proof of these. But in their secret hearts they disbelieve their reality, and entertain such favourable views of what they term "frail human nature" as to excuse any religious defects. The cross of Christ is regarded by them chiefly in its relation to theological rather than personal requirements. It is well, therefore, to lead such persons to recognise the sorrows of Christ as essentially sorrows over what they themselves are in their denial of God. When they for a moment pause and catch a glimpse of that divine countenance gazing down upon them with a grief which seems—like an eye in a picture—to follow their every movement, and to sadden with their every resistance of Him who would bring them back to their Father, they can measure the sinfulness of that resistance. It is the holy sorrow of Jesus which can best interpret the wickedness of religious indifference.

And these sufferings of Jesus under sin convey an equally important lesson to persons of an opposite character, who feel their unworthiness so intensely as to make them afraid of God. It appears presumption for them to confess Christ, with their bitter memories and their consciousness of so much that is shallow and earthly. But these sorrows of Jesus meet all such thoughts with redeeming power, for they speak of a deeper insight into these very evils than the sinful can ever attain. He understands our wickedness as we never can understand it, and He knows it to be infinitely worse than we ever imagined. There is not a pang of remorse experienced nor a sentence of self-condemnation pronounced by us which is not but the faintest shadow of the penetrating holiness with which He has searched sin to its lowest depths. And yet that very grief of His over the evil assures us that, in spite of all we have been and are, He does not despise us, but so loves us that He sorrows over us and seeks our return. What He was on earth Christ is now, and the greatness of His agony under human sin is the measure of His desire for human deliverance. The love of Christ, which made our sin His burden, must also make it His joy to help and bless us.

JUNE 29TH.

Read Mark vi. Philippians ii. 1-24

We are familiar with the manner in which St. Paul represents the death of Christ as producing a certain death and life in every believer. "We are buried with Christ." "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live." "We thus judge that if one died for all, then all died, and that He died for all that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him which died for them and rose again." The sacrifice of Christ is not therefore an isolated fact, but is a spiritual and influential power. There is a sense in which Christ died ■ deliver us from death, and there ■ another sense in which He died that we might die also. For certain moral effects must result from the vital apprehension of what that death of Christ really conveys. Viewed in one aspect we can assert that ■ ■ solitary, because ■ is the only refuge of the sinner. It rendered for us what we cannot render, and from the sense of our failure and helplessness we must ever look up to Him who ■ our representative Head, and Priest and King. But viewed in another aspect, it is not solitary, for it operates dynamically, as it were, in heart and conscience, and recitates in us an image and reflection of itself. It is not a mystery wholly apart from us, and ■ be used as a kind of charm against the anger of God. It establishes a vital relationship with all whom it saves. As the effect of light is to banish darkness, or ■ knowledge destroys ignorance, so the true apprehension of Jesus Christ and Him crucified must revolutionise our old thoughts and ways, until what we once were ceases to be. Or, again, as it ■ of the nature of love to remove suspicion and indifference, and as the perception of the goodness of another wins confidence, so when we calculate all that blessed message of divine forgiveness and love, and truth and hope which is embodied in the death and resurrection of Christ, we can see how, of necessity, if vitally received, it must cause the old sinful nature, with its unbelief, indifference, and rebellion, to perish, while it inspires the new life of trust and self-surrender to God. We thus at once "die" and "live."

Recall for a moment the illustration of these truths which we find in the life of St. Paul himself. The contrast between Saul the pupil of Gamaliel, and St. Paul the servant of the Lord Jesus Christ, is as great as between two totally different persons. When we remember the various elements which formed the character of Saul the persecutor, we can understand how literally St. Paul could look back on what he had been and say, "in Christ I died," "I have been crucified with Christ," "I have been buried in the very grave of Christ." When he apprehended the significance of Christ's death, he threw aside as a huge mistake all that old righteousness which he had been labouring for years to make perfect by the accurate performance of sacred observances. He had been trying to win God, but all was reversed, for in Christ God had won him. All his past life, its aims, confidences, hopes, utterly broke down and was regarded by him as mere refuse, mere rubbish, which he cast away for ever. His old pride of race with its caste separations vanished in the light of God's love to all mankind. His old zeal for forms and rites and conventional distinctions appeared a blasphemy against the freedom of divine grace manifested in the Redeemer. Saul of Tarsus had ceased to be. Nevertheless ■ lived, and his new life was one recreated in the image of Christ's own life. Through self-surrender to Jesus Christ, he was daily "putting on the Lord Jesus." For "the life he lived in the flesh was by the faith of the Son of God."

If Christ's grace has any saving influence over us, we may be assured that it will produce similar results in our own experience. The Cross of Christ is not an ingenious "plan," whereby an escape is provided from the consequences of sin, while the sin remains untouched. It is a mighty fact, which, gathering into one vivid expression the very mind of God towards a sinful world, makes such an appeal to the spirit that is in man, that in proportion as it is received it must reach down to the sources from which the sin of man has proceeded. That is surely a serious misuse of the grace of God, which would represent the Cross of Christ as superseding the necessity for our own obedience. And yet there is a manner of speaking about our having "no righteousness of our own," which is apt to lead to this mistake. It is true that we must have no "righteousness of our own," as opposed to, or separate from, that "righteousness which is in Christ," yet the "righteousness which is in Christ" is made thoroughly "our own," in proportion as we are vitally saved by Him. It is a grave error, when the blood of Christ is spoken of as if it somehow made an exception in our favour from the eternal necessity of self-surrender to God, instead of being the very power which leads us to yield self up unto Him. For, as God becomes revealed to our spirits, through Jesus Christ, our old views and manner of life must pass away for ever under the influence of that glory, even as the mist ■ scattered by the rising sun, or as the cold ice melts at the breath of summer. And if the life and death of Christ exercise no such influence, we ought to be suspicious of the reality of our faith. They who have caught any inspiration of the life of love as it is in Jesus Christ must, in proportion ■ then apprehension of its power, "live henceforth not unto themselves, but unto Him Who died for them and rose again."

BETWEEN THE HEATHER AND THE NORTHERN SEA.

By M. LINSKILL, AUTHOR OF "HAGAR," "ROBERT HOLY'S ILLUSION," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.—"NOT YET THY SUN HATH DRIED HIS THOUGHTFUL TEARS."

'I strive I do observe you now of life
I live not from your eyes that gently move
And show of life as I was wont to have You bear to it, stillborn and too strange a life
Once your brand that loved you.'

SHAKESPEARE, Julius Cæsar.

"LIFE is interesting if not happy," said a great thinker the other day, and we all of us admitted the truth and felicity of the phrase on the instant. We had known it all the while, but we had been waiting for some one to say it.

Life is always interesting, because it is always hopeful.

From the man of highest and most eager culture, the last and dullest and most self-contented Philistine, you will nowhere find a soul living out its days without hope of some good it has not yet attained.

We are seldom strong enough to turn round upon ourselves in times of really great and desperate trial, and look dispassionately upon the interest underlying the hour and the event. It is there. In some cases, doubtless, it affords a certain support, but it does so unconsciously. We should look upon ourselves as traitors to ourselves, and rightly, if we had the hardihood to look up from under the Cross, and say, "This is interesting."

There is something amazing in the alacrity with which we most of us find an element of interest in the worst calamities of others. The daily newspaper sells a double edition when there is a Tay-Bridge disaster, when a Princess Alice comes into collision in the Thames, when a Eurydice with several hundred souls on board disappears in a snow squall. These things are topics of conversation for the social hour. They have no true silencing awe for us. We speak of them between remarks on the latest political blunder and the fineness of the weather. In a word, we find them interesting.

It is a platitude to say that there are people who do the affairs—the most untoward affairs—of their friends and neighbours interesting. It is also a platitude to say that there are people who have no other interest outside themselves than this of watching the course of events in the little world about them, not watching to sympathy, to help, but to a dull, mindless curiosity. Yet even these find life interesting.

Coming back to our own life, if we have any vision at all, any sense of the picturesque, the pathetic, the dramatic, we must certainly find the past years interesting to look back upon. No outsider can see the fine and subtle interweaving of the threads of experience as we can see them for ourselves. No stranger can intermeddle with that dead joy that can be made to live again for you at your highest desire, no other heart knows the bitterness that was in your heart as you walked through the fire in which your youth perished—as you fought your way alone through the floods that overwhelmed the years. No written record could ever have half the interest that that unwritten record has for you, and will for ever have while memory keeps its greenness.

The past has its interest, the future is more keen, and intense, and mystic interest still. If there is an insipid day it is this one. But we live it patiently, since it leads on to the next.

So, in patience, in a serene and untroubled patience, Genevieve Bartholomew lived through that summer at Netherbank, the first summer she spent there, and—the last.

Unhappily it was a wet summer—unhappily for her and for her father, perhaps even more unhappily still for poor Miss Craven.

The sadness was upon all the land. Morning after morning broke in grey gloom, in heaviness, in silence. There was no sound save the plash of rain upon the sodden moss-hilled pastures, upon the black rotting hay that was lying in the fields when August came, upon the green, backward, unpromising corn. The harvest was doomed, and it was the seventh doomed harvest in unbroken succession.

Was it the weather that was affecting Noel Bartholomew to so great an extent? Did he feel the pressure of the heavy grey, rain-laden clouds upon his brain? Genevieve knew that he missed the constant exercise that he had been accustomed to take, she missed it herself, and they agreed that the appetite for out-door life was capable of causing as keen suffering as the appetite for daily food when it came to be denied its legitimate satisfaction.

So far as his work was concerned, he had done the best he might do—the best and the most, but the best was not good, and the most was far below what he had hoped. Those summer months, upon which he had counted so much, were gone by—gone in suffering, in comparative unproductiveness. Want would have stared him in the face if he had looked that way. But he had not looked, he had hoped on bravely, persistently, silently.

His strange trial would pass as others had passed, if he only stood firm. Had he not that word of Thackeray's for his consolation, declaring the possession of genius itself to be of hardly superior value ■ the power of holding on?

He knew that holding on was not an easy thing, nor so simple as it might seem, nevertheless, since it had to be done it were well to do it quietly.

When he came to think of it, he found a word of higher authority than Thackeray's, and older. The thirteenth chapter of the third book of the "Imitation of Christ" seemed to have been written for his present need.

"Where is thy faith?" asked the dead voice that seems to be speaking so near to us at times. "Stand firmly and with perseverance, take courage and be patient, comfort will come to thee in due time."

In this temper he had waited, in this temper he had worked when work was possible. Of late he had put aside all other work, and had wrought at the view of Yarell Croft whenever it was possible so to do. Having his sketches, it was comparatively mechanical work, and it could be done without much reference to the light. Besides, he had another motive, a motive that seemed so pitiful to himself that he kept it out of his own consciousness as much as he could.

The picture, being a communion, would be paid for as soon as completed, more and more as the days went on he became aware that this was influencing him, and so strange was his mental constitution that the influence was paralyzing rather than stimulating. There were days when he sat, with his palette set and his brushes before him, from the morning till the evening unable to raise his hand to the canvas with any impetus from his brain. At such times the dropping of the dull rain upon the skylight seemed to him like Nature's tears of sympathy, but it was a sympathy that had no help in it, no comfort.

As the picture drew slowly toward its completion he was amused to find that it was already acquiring a kind of local notoriety. His strong effort toward an absolute and artistic literalness had won for him an appreciation that his idealised "Anon," his fine "Judas," his spiritual "Sir Galahad" would never win for him in the neighbourhood of Murr-Marshes.

Miss Craven had begun to admit to herself that after all, since it was never too late to mend, there might be some chance that Noel Bartholomew would yet become a great artist, and Mr. Crudas had asked permission to bring more than one of his friends to see the admirable accuracy and fidelity with which every window and door of Yarell Croft had been portrayed, every tree painted just how and where ■ stood, every fold of the distant hills and dales given, and all on a few feet of canvas.

Here, it anywhere, was a triumph of art, and Murr Marshes at last began to be proud of the grey unimpressive man who was so very far from coming up to anybody's idea of a man of genius.

When the picture was at last finished, when the last touch of yellow sunny light had been put upon the hills, the last sweep of purple mystery upon the dales, a handsome frame came down from London, and the picture was placed upon a huge easel where ■ could catch a fuller light.

"I shall not send it home," Mr. Bartholomew said to Genevieve, who stood beside him looking into the picture with rather wondering eyes. "I shall write and tell Mr. Richmond that it is completed, and that I should like him to see it before it is sent to Yarell Croft."

"You think he might require some alteration?"

"It is possible, it is possible too that he may not approve of it. I should hardly like to have it coming back again to be altered to suit his taste."

"His taste is for colour, I think you have considered it."

"Don't be ironical, dear."

"Mr. Kirkoswald says that I have a gift of irony if I were to allow myself to develop it."

"Is he afraid of ■ that he comes so seldom?" Then seeing the quick change of colour on his daughter's face, the unmistakable pain, Bartholomew began to speak of some other subject, but he did not forget this one. More than ever he was perplexed by the change in George Kirkoswald.

Something had happened, something that had turned the man aside from being himself. He came and went in fitful ways, his mood was capricious when he did come. To-day he would be sad and silent, and betray a touching and wistful humility, as if conscious that the impaired and imperfect friendship had been impaired solely by himself. Another day, and all that would be changed, there would be nothing visible save a kind of inner strenuousness with hardness of manner and unrest of soul.

That ■ was not ■ one with himself was but too evident; and Bartholomew knew enough of the world of men to know that ■ was useless to expect him to be whole-tempered in his ways toward others.

"Poor Brutus with him! What was, Forgets the shame of love to other men."

George Kirkoswald was not greater than Brutus here, and it may be admitted that at this time he was seeming less self-sustained than his friends at Netherbank had counted him to be. But they knew nothing of his trouble, nothing of the great dread that hung over him, growing as the days went on, and Bartholomew at least did not dream of the dark disappointment that had come upon him.

There were days—sad days enough—when the artist wondered within himself that a man whose worldly well-being was so unmistakable as was that of George Kirkoswald should find himself so far out of parallel with the trend of circumstance. It was barely conceivable to Noel Bartholomew just then. But nevertheless, none of these things touched his loyalty, or his faith. All would be made plain when the moment came.

The music room was finished by the end of August—that is to say the roof was on, and the floor was laid. Kirkoswald's interest in that had never abated, and other people's interest seemed to be growing about his own. Sir Galahad was working with a will with a view ■ his position as conductor of the entertainments to be given, and it was very natural that he should need a good deal of advice and help from Miss Bartholomew, seeing that his own musical knowledge was hardly equal to the demands likely to be made upon it. It was fortunate that Netherbank was within an hour's walk of the Rectory at Thirkeld Abbas.

"I—I don't know what I should have done if you'd never come ■ Mink Marshes!" he exclaimed one day. It was characteristic of him that he was continuously being impressed afresh by the favourableness of his advantages. But there was danger just now that he might be led into mistake concerning the nature of them.

Genevieve, of course, did not say that it was probable that if she had never come to Mark-Marshes, it was also probable that Mr. Severne's services, as conductor of concerts at Soulgrif Bight, might never have been required. She never mentioned George Kirkoswald; and ■ seemed to Mr. Severne that the mention of his name by others did not awaken any very pleasant emotions within her. He was becoming keenly, alive to this and similar facts.

He was becoming alive to everything that concerned Genevieve Bartholomew.

She could not help being amused sometimes, but more often she was glad of the brotherly-seeming interest that descended even to note the progress of her embroidery. It appeared as if he cared for nothing better than to sit and watch her deft white fingers almost as white as the lilies that grew to their silken perfection under them. Mr. Severne did not wonder that she liked ■ embroider lilies better than anything else, she was so like a lily herself; and sometimes when she was a little sad he could not help wondering if any gentle silver rain of sorrow ever came near her. He was thinking of some lines of Wordsworth's that he had in a little book which he always carried in his pocket. He took it out one day—Genevieve was looking very sad that afternoon—and he turned at once to the lines he knew so well.

"That always makes me think of you," he said, indicating the words as he spoke.

"You have been wretched yet
The silver shower which fell on buds and twigs
Is surely up in the lily's bud
Or he only a strong mountain at its root."

Genevieve smiled. "What makes you think I have been wretched?" she asked.

"Oh, well, I didn't mean that particularly. Perhaps I don't exactly know what I do mean. But the verse makes a sort of picture in my mind—a picture of a tall, beautiful lily drooping a little, and all weighed down with shining drops of rain."

"You are growing poetical!"

"Am I? That is because I come so much to Netherbank."

"Or else because you read this book so much."

"Is it a nice book, do you think? Do you like it? because if you do, keep it—please keep it. I should so like to know that you had something of mine."

CHAPTER XXIV—"I SAW THIS YOUTH AS HE DESPAIRING STOOD."

"Fortune has not been kind to me good friends,
But let not that deprive me of your loves,
Or of your good report."

Philip Van Ikenwilde

ONCE, when George Kirkoswald had not been at Netherbank for a fortnight or more, Genevieve had a fancy that he was down in Soulgrif Bight, hoping to see her there. She hardly comprehended the feeling, it was so strong, so sure, so full of yearning.

■ was an August day, dull, grey, windy, yet too full of life and movement to be depressing There was still no sunshine; the haymakers were turning the bay in the sodden fields, the corn was pale and unripe, some of it was lying on the ground as if an army had passed over it.

All day Noel Bartholomew had remained in his studio, working at the second picture that Cecil Richmond had commissioned him to paint. The first was still on the large easel, still standing in the full light. It was covered with a curtain of old embroidery, which was lifted from time to time when neighbours came, asking to see the view of Yarnell Croft.

It was over a fortnight now since the note had been written, saying simply that the picture was finished, and that it awaited Mr. Richmond's approval.

No answer to that note had been received.

"I suppose he intends to call," Mr. Bartholomew said when Genevieve expressed some surprise.

"All the same he should have sent a reply. Simple courtesy required that he should do so much as that."

But the simple courtesy had not been forthcoming and, so far, Mr. Richmond had not called. It was beginning to be felt as a slight strain on Bartholomew's already over-tense nerves. He declined to accompany Genevieve when she went for her daily walk. He would rather not be out when Cecil Richmond did come, he said. If he went out at all it was after the sun had set, when the bats were wheeling in the air, and the night moths quivering over the meadow lands.

"You will let me persuade you to-day, father," Genevieve said, when the yearning to go down to the light had grown too strong to be resisted. "I will write a note for you, and we will leave it to be given to Mr. Richmond if he should call while we are out."

Bartholomew's hand was weary, his brain and his eye were weary. He had upon him that strong desire to be out under the air of heaven which grows to such a passionate intensity when the man who desires it is over-tasked by the fearful double strain of labour and anxiety. Yet not even now would he leave the studio.

"It will not be for long, dear," he said. "It is imprisonment, but it is not imprisonment for life."

"No! but I wish it had been for a set term; then one would have known what to expect. I feel a sense of oppression every time Mr. Richmond enters my thoughts. It is cruelty to you—to both of us."

"If so, it is the cruelty of thoughtlessness."

"Which is as bad as any other cruelty, and as inexcusable."

There was quite a frown on Genevieve's pale and usually serene face as she crossed the barley-field to go down to the light alone. She was going to see Ailne Drewe, and she had a strong desire that she might meet Cecil Richmond as she went.

All the way down the upland the wind was stirring in the trees, the swift grey clouds were driving overhead, there was a purple depth on the moorland hills. The blue harebells quivered among the bracken in the waste places by the roadside, here and there little tufts of crimson heather nestled among whin and briar. The bramble blossom was white upon the brakes. The whin chat was knocking away at his song as if he wished to get as much of it done as was possible before the night came.

There were a few stray cottages at the entrance to the village. The little gardens were gay with scarlet turn cap lilies, sweet peas were drooping over the hedges, nasturtiums were climbing among the jessamine sprays. In the orchards the fruit was maturing on the trees, the gooseberry-bushes were bending low under ripe, red loads. The blackbirds were busy among the currant-trees. Bees were murmuring and hovering everywhere.

There was a turn in the road. One of the tiny thatched cottages, with its front garden and its back orchard, was down in a green, leafy hollow to the left. There were children standing by the wicket gate, listening, looking, wondering.

Under the willow-tree by the road-side a young man, with a pale face and long, fair hair, was playing a violin. As Genevieve came up one of the children ran out with a penny, and the young man moved forward to take it with difficulty. He was very lame, there was something pathetic in his lameness, there was something more pathetic still in the sudden glow of shame and confusion that spread over his face as he turned and met the sympathetic eyes that were fixed on him. The bow dropped from the strings, and the violinist moved painfully, yet with some dignity, away out of sight, disappearing along a narrow path between two deep hedges of hawthorn.

Genevieve was curiously impressed. She had caught the air he was playing, it was from Mendelssohn's St. Paul, "But the Lord is mindful of His own." It was strange to hear an air like that played by a street musician, and played as that was played.

There were other strange things that came floating out of the brief scene. The boy's face—he seemed little more than a boy—was one that would not soon be forgotten.

■ was not only a sad face, there was something of surprise in its sadness, something of disdain, as if he scorned himself for the thing ■ did, while wondering that he could do no other.

Besides, there was a look of rice about the setting of the hazel eyes, about the curving of the upper lip, about the turn of the head on the shoulders—a look that shabby clothing could not touch in any way. No, Genevieve would not forget him, nor would she forget his plying. All the way down into Soulgrif Bight she heard the strain. It was as if some one sang the words—

"But the Lord is mindful of His own. He remembereth His children."

Yet it was difficult to ignore a certain inconsistency between the plaintiveness of the music and the touch of wildness, of irreconcilableness in the manner and appearance of the musician.

Ailsie Drewe lived on the side of the bay opposite to the music room. Genevieve could see as she went down that the workmen were still about the place. Some were putting windows into the new cottage, some were making a rustic wooden paling to enclose the garden. There was to be a playground beyond, and some terraces were to be cut with paths winding away across the cliffs to where the barren alum shale merged into the green luxuriance of Birknig Giff.

"There'll be no knowin' the place when all's done," Ailsie Drewe said to Genevieve. "Mr. Kirkoswald's just been here, you'd meet him, mebbe? He hasn't been gone more nor half an hour, an' I told him 'it Soulgrif Bight 'ud never again be such a world's end of a place as it allus has been. He laughed a lit, but he didn't laugh nowt like what he used to. He isn't out to say 'good spirits, miss?'"

This was said interrogatively, but Genevieve did not answer, and it seemed to Ailsie Drewe that Miss Bartholomew was not in particularly good spirits either. ■ was strange that people who had no need to care for the harvest, or for the coming of the herring, and who had nobody at sea to be anxious for when the storms came on, should yet have tuncs of silence and depression. If Miss Bartholomew had happened to be Davy's mother there would have been reason enough for pensiveness and heaviness.

Genevieve did not forget to ask after the little lad.

"He's in America, miss, at a port they call New Orleans—so he said in the letter. You should ha' seen it, but Ah've lent it to Margat. Ah couldn't read it myself. Ah got it last Tuesday, an' Ah sat lookin' ■ it all 't daay, an' cryin' 'acause Ah couldn't tell one woul' 'at my bairn said. An' one doesn't like takin' a letter like that inta onybody's hoose to get it read. But Mr. Kirkoswald com doon toward nightfall, an' Ah took it across to him, an' he read it off as pat as if he'd been a lawyer. L's, but it is something to be clever like that, miss, an' my little Davy 'ud ha' been as clever as onybody's bairn if Ah could nobbut ha' kept him fra the sea. But 'twarn't no use. He had ■ goal."

"I wonder what it is that makes him so strangely bent upon a sea going life?" Genevieve said, remembering the day when he had gone up to Netherbank ■ say "good-bye," and also remembering how she had divined the child's unspoken feeling of finality about the act and the word. "He doesn't seem to care so much for the sea itself," she added.

Ailsie's brown eyes filled with slow tears. She sat looking steadily away out of the window, so that the tears might not be seen to fall, and a change came into her voice all at once.

"It's a kind o' fate, miss, it's no more nor that, nor no less. It's years ago now—he was nobbut a bairn o' six or seven when he used to wike out of his sleep night after night cryin' out 'at his father wintal him—his father 'at he'd never seen. An' nothing would pacify the buin, he'd go on cryin', 'Take me to my father, he's callin' o' me, he's waitin' o' me, he wants me to go wiv him, mother.' An' Ah know it, miss, Ah know it, the little lad 'll ha' to go."

Ailsie stopped, crying bitterly, and Genevieve cried too, till Ailsie got up and showed her the little drawer where she kept the boy's small possessions, the tools that he had used when he made the model of the Viking, a picture book full of ships that Canon Gabriel had given to him, his Sunday school reward books, a pair of his baby shoes, and a thick, bright curl of his yellow hair.

"Ah look inta that drawer every night, miss, afore Ah go ■ bed, an' it's allus like partin' w' the bairn afresh, an' Ah wonder where he is, an' if his father's waitin' for him yet, an' how long he's set to wait. That daay when the Viking went doon i' the Bight Ah knew 'at my husband weren't far away fra me then. Ah thought mebbe he might hear me when Ah said, 'It's me 'at 'll ha' te wait noo, Jamie, Ah'll ha' te wait all aloan as lang as Ah live, an' then Ah'll ha' te come an', try te find ya both' I allas think 'at Ah sall find 'em. Ah've more hope o' that nor I hev o' seen' Davy agun here."

Genevieve went away shortly afterwards; but the tears still kept coming unbidden to her eyes as she went up Soulgrif Bank in the grey afternoon light. Mr. Severne, who was going in and out of some cottages at the lower end of Thirkeld Abbas, saw the traces of sorrow, and the picture of Wordsworth's lily came into his mind again more vividly than ever. He did not say so, he did not say much on any subject. He was about his work now, and he might not leave it even to see Miss Bartholomew wisely as far as Neithbank. Was he a little hurt that she did not take his regrets more seriously?

There was no pale, far-handled violinet under the willow by the cottage in the lane now, but Genevieve, half stopping to look for him, saw another and a taller figure coming by the narrow pathway under the Hawthorn hedge. It was George Kirkoswald, as she perceived at a glance, and a very brief space of time brought him to her side. Just as he came up some shots were fired in the fussy hill-side pasture close at hand. Genevieve was startled, and the fact that she was startled helped to account for the sudden glow of crimson on her face.

"Are you not yet used to that sound?" George asked, glancing over the hedge with some annoyance as he spoke. "It is Mr. Richmond," he continued. "I believe there is a shooting-party at Yarrill Croft, so that you will probably have a chance of getting accustomed to the guns. But—"

Kirkoswald stopped there. He had been intending to object to the idea of her walking about the roads and field-ways alone just now. The thought struck him with bitterness that the privilege of objection was hardly his.

"You were going to say something," Genevieve asked, timidly lifting her eyes to George's, and then he saw, as Mr. Severne had seen, that there were traces of tears on her face. It was as if the sight took something of strength from him.

He did not reply to her question immediately. When he spoke he asked another question.

"Do you remember that sunny December day in Soulgrif Bight?" he said. "It was the first time you went down after the storm.

We were talking of trouble, and I asked you if you thought that when trouble came you could speak of it to me?"

"And I said that I could. I remember well."

"Then what is it that is troubling you now?"

Genevieve smiled, it was so easy to tell him that Ailsie Diawe had unsealed the fountain of her tears. She did not tell him what she had suspected herself, that they had waited an excuse for flowing freely. It is very true that we "blush one way, feel another way, and weep, perhaps, another."

It takes many kinds of darkness to make a life of sorrow, but the sorrow may seem one, and the emotions run into each other in ways unknown as yet to scientific analysis.

When Ailsie Diawe's pain and fear had been touched upon with sympathetic insight, Genevieve had yet another tale to tell, the brief story of the boy violinist who had so quickly made such a strong impression. She was grieved that between her shyness and his sudden shame he should have passed beyond her ken unsolaced, unspoken with, unhelped, for that he needed help was but too evident.

"And what am I to do if I come across him?" asked George with a little amusement in his interest.

"What would you do if you saw me singing in the street for bread?"

A great tenderness came into the man's dark, overshadowed eyes, a great lovingness.

"I should take you home," he said, "and I should try to make your life so fair that you would forget that it had ever been other than fair."

"I then think of me if you find my lame boy wounded by the wayside. I am sure he is wounded, I am sure he has fallen among thieves, I am sure the Priest and the Levite have passed by on the other side, leaving him half dead."

They were passing through the village of Murk Marshes now. The sun had set, the children were going home, the blacksmith's anvil ceased ringing as they passed the forge at the upper end of the village street. Just then a great red harvest moon began to rise over the eastern ridge of the moor. Slowly the glow of it spread behind the dark, rugged outline, crimsoning the whole heaven above, the trunk of a leafless oak-tree was slanting athwart its disc, throwing out gaunt, supplicating arms. There was a quietness in the evening, but somehow it was a quietness that was not peace, and was far from any gladness.

No word had passed between these two since that word that had been said on the evening after the small fete in Soulegrf Bight. ■ seemed far away now, and somewhat overlaid by the various meanings of subsequent experience. There had been no change, none that could be indicated, or alluded to, but the subtleties of feeling escape definition, and the result of contradictory emotions is apt to disappoint even one's own calculation. Genevieve would probably have found some difficulty in answering a sudden question as to her love, or her faith, with absolute truthfulness at the present moment.

It was not that her love was dead, or dying, on the contrary, it seemed as if the roots that were being thrown down into the pain and uncertainty that surrounded it were stronger than the lighter fibres that had sufficed for its earlier existence.

Still there was loss, though the loss was vague and nameless. The clear blue light was clouded over, and the gloom was a restriction, freedom was lost in perplexity, and trust quivered in the sweeping currents of uncertain days. The girl was clinging strongly to that faith of which she had declared herself to be possessed, but it needed every effort she was capable of making to enable her to hold by it steadily.

To the last she would hold by it, not till it was torn from her grasp would she let it go.

She did not fear that it was likely to be so torn, all her belief turned toward a sudden passing away of gloom and pain. It was for this that she watched, for this that she waited.

At any moment she might meet George Kirkoswald on the moor, by the sea, in the village street, and meeting him she might see at a glance that the cloud was off his soul, that he was free, that he was the man he had been on that day, and always before that day, when ■ had asked of her a word of assurance in Birkrigg Gill.

The gloom was there now, on every feature of his face, in every gesture, in his very gait as ■ walked up the lane to the field where the bearded barley was nodding under the red moon.

All the way he was silent, and Genevieve saw that it was a silence that it would bewell to leave unbroken.

Would she have been astonished if she had known that he was thinking of another?—if she had known further that that other was Miss Richmond?

All the way he had been thinking of her, wondering what would be the last result of defiance.

Supposing that at this moment he were to take Genevieve's hand in his as they stood there under the ash tree by the stile, and if he were to tell her all that had passed in those years of blindness and mistake, and all that had happened to bring him into his present perplexity—how would ■ be with him then?

He seemed to see quite plainly how it would be. It would be easier for him to make his confession now than it would have been at one time. He knew Genevieve better, and he had a clearer insight into the largeness of her nature. Besides he had suffered much, and suffering makes many hard things easy. Then, too, mere change in his suffering promised some relief, and he was sure of sympathy.

Yes, he was sure of sympathy. There would be a shock, a silence, a great surprise. His dishonour would be felt to be as a stain upon her life. Then there would be a great forgiveness, with an aftermath of absolute peace so far as Genevieve was concerned.

The temptation was strong, very strong. He imagined his yielding, he could see the fair face beside him growing fairer in the sudden light of revelation and reconciliation. The wistful look that had lain in the violet eyes so long would be there no longer, the deeply curved mouth would smile its own smile again. Life would be taken up where it had been broken off, compensation would flow into the hours, and in the days to be no account should be taken of this temporary suspension of felicity.

For all this there would be a price to be paid, and he told himself that he would have been prepared to pay it if he might have known the utmost to which it was likely ■ amount, if he might have known further that payment would be demanded from himself alone.

But again ■ told himself that, unfortunately, none knew better than he knew of what Miss Richmond was capable. Her threats had been open in part, and dark in part, but he knew well that she was equal to persistent fulfilment of them. ■ the last letter.

There was hardly a house of any note in the Riding into which she might not creep with her glibious stealthiness, her softly uttered venom, her smothering accusations, and the mildest of her threats amounted to this.

Still, at that moment but a light wind of thought would have swayed him toward the risk and the certainty of full disclosure. He lifted his eyes to Genevieve's face, there was a smile there—on her lips there was a small yet disconcerting civility.

"Will you not come in for a little while?" she said. "My father will be glad to see you in his solitary confinement."

"Is ■ ill?" George asked with concern.

"No, he is not ill, but ■ is very likely to become ill," said Genevieve, proceeding to explanations.

"I think that very likely the delay is to be accounted for by the fact you mentioned just now," she added, "the fact that there is a shooting party ■ Yarrell Croft. I say accounted for, but not excused, though I agree with my father that there is nothing but thoughtlessness behind it."

George Kukoswald did not reply. An instant conviction had struck him that there was more than thoughtlessness underlying the affair.

He seemed to have been prepared for the thing he heard, to be prepared for more, though certainly he could not have told why he had anticipated all results from such an exceedingly natural and common circumstance as the giving of a commission for a picture.

Long afterwards he knew that he had anticipated ill from the beginning. Now he was not sure that he foresaw only ill. There might be a clashing of elements that would leave the air clearer. It might even be that already he saw a faint gleam upon the distant sea of darkness over which he had looked so long, and so patiently, always waiting for the gleam, always feeling that it had been promised to him if he would wait.

Certainly now he would wait a little longer, long enough to assure himself that the dawn of better things was at hand, or that it was not, and not likely to arise out of the quarter toward which he was now looking. His firm impression was that he had seen a promise of light.

The current of his thought was changed altogether, and the man himself seemed changed.

"I'll Mr Bartholomew that I will be down in a day or two," ■ said, raising his hat, and turning absently, coldly away. Genevieve went through the clinging barley with a pallid, stony face, and an unutterable sinking about that poor loving, longing heart of hers.

CHAPTER XL—"STRIKE AUDIBLY THE NOBLEST OF YOUR LYRES!"

O did he ever live that lonely man
Who loved—and music knew not—
KEATS Lullay

For a week before the giving of the concert in Soulsgrif Bight there was an excitement in the air, a very pleasant and innocent excitement it seemed to be, productive of courtesies, animations, small vanities, overtures, musical and other. Songs were practised at cottage doors, choruses came swelling out through the closed shutters of the black smith's shop.

Mrs. Caton had kindly insisted upon providing the little Sunday school girls who sang in the Church choir with white muslin dresses and blue sashes. Mrs. Damer sent a dozen posies of pink flowers when the evening came. Others sent smiles, evergreens, good wishes, harmonious little compositions of words set to no music but their own.

If underneath all this there was a special ground-tone of sorrow anywhere, it was at Netherbunk, which some people counted to be the very centre and source from whence all the gladness and goodness were flowing. An impression had got about that Mr. Kukoswald had certainly been inspired by the words and ways of another, and down in the Bight the fisher folk said openly that their gratitude was due as much to Miss Bartholomew as to the master of Usselby Hall.

That they were grateful, and had all manner of pleasant anticipations, was one of Genevieve's strongest motives for keeping up a brave bright face before her little world. Another motive was her father's need of her bravery. Only once before in his life had he needed it so much.

All day he had remained in his studio, the finished picture of Yarrell Croft on one easel before him, the view of the Priory Garden unfinished on another. He had not touched the latter. Genevieve had set his palette, and prepared his mediums, but he had never moved his hand to touch them.

After a whole long, silent, unexplained month had passed, Mr. Bartholomew had written a second note to Cecil Richmond. He had used much the same terms as on the first occasion. No word of doubt, of impatience had escaped his pen. He merely begged to remind Mr. Richmond that the picture was finished and awaiting his approval.

Had he not been so unwise as to have written that first note, had he sent the picture home as he would have done but for his own considerateness, he had avoided all this strange and inexplicable pain. But how could he have foreseen such a turn of affairs as this?

A second month had all but gone by now. The sound of guns had ceased in the neighbourhood, the heather had bloomed and was fading, and Bartholomew had not seen it. Somehow it seemed to this sensitive, nature-loving man, that all his life he would miss that one year's heather.

What if he should have no other chance of seeing the heather in bloom upon the purple hills?

Beyond doubt in these two months he had grown more apprehensive, more tremulous, more shrinkingly alive to dread, and pain, and evil of every kind. The hours that he should have spent on the moor when the sun was setting, or down by the soothing murmurous sea, where always he had found relief and uplifting, had been spent in his studio. He had sat there surrounded by his work, and the suggestions and associations of work, and he had sat, brooding, fearing, looking into the darkness that was upon his life until brooding had paralyzed him.

So strangely had his power gone from him that he hesitated to compel himself to touch the Ænone, the Sir Galahad, or the Judith. The latter was a long way from being finished, the two former were so nearly done that the work required upon them was of a most delicate kind, and needed judicious and well-considered handling. Another hindrance lay in the fact that a great desire had come upon him to make some radical alterations in the dress and background of the Ænone. Only at Genevieve's entreaties he had deferred his project. She was trusting that the desire would pass away.

She knew now plainly that it was need of money that had compelled him to work at the commissions given by Mr. Richmond. For awhile she had been rather glad that he had had these to fall back upon, but long since all gladness had faded out, long since she had begun to share her father's unspoken sense of wrong and oppression.

But for his poverty the pictures had gone into the fire long ago. He had come to hate them, to hold himself in contempt for having consented to paint them.

The humiliation of his present position was intense—complete in its intensity.

Even had there been no question of any previous acquaintanceship between Miss Richmond and himself, there was a peculiar and searching sting in this disdainful silence, this discourteous refusal to reply by so much as one word to the two courteous letters that Bartholomew had written. Both Miss Richmond and her brother would be aware of the fact that Noel Bartholomew could not walk over to Yarell Croft to ask what was the cause of this contemptuous attitude.

No other subject of thought was possible. This one thing had wrought itself into every act and every phase of his life. It was turned to every possible light, judged by every possible standard, it was blamed, it was excused, it was denounced, it was forgiven.

Anything would have been better to bear than this. Had the young man come to Netherbank and said openly, "I do not like the pictures," the matter would have been at an end. Had he even written straightforwardly and said, "I do not now care to have them," then also there had been no further suspense or pain. Bartholomew could have turned himself to some other work with what strength was left to him. As it was, every day, every hour was adding to the ill that had been wrought in the artist's unstrung and overstrained soul.

Even on this day of the concert he had been unable to rouse himself. Genevieve had sat beside him, she had drawn him to speak out of the overfulness of his heart. Then she had read to him for awhile, and all day she had hoped to win him to consent to go down to Soulegrif Bight with her in the evening.

She was still trying to persuade him when George Kirkoswald came, he was on his way down to the Bight. It was six o'clock, and nearly dark, but no lamp had been lighted in the studio. "I am not earning anything to pay for light or fire, or even for the food I eat," Bartholomew had said just before he had heard George's footstep on the orchard pathway. Then he changed his tone, saying hurriedly, "Not one word of this to Kirkoswald, and put on the gayest dress you have, if you wish to please me."

It was hardly possible to put on a very gay dress when nearly three miles of rugged road had to be passed in the late twilight. Yet Genevieve looked very lovely in her pale blue clinging cashmere gown with its velvet trimmings of the same colour. She went down to the studio when she was dressed, and it could hardly be said that she was disappointed to find that George had not succeeded where she had failed.

"I shall be glad to be alone," Bartholomew had declared to George Kirkoswald. "If any note or message should come I shall be here ■ receive it. There will be no delay. If I were down at the music room I should be sure that my presence was required here.'

It need hardly be said that Kukoswald was perplexed, perplexed to the uttermost by him the conduct of Cecil Richmond seemed simply a cause for annoyance, for irritation at the worst, if at you were disposed to be irritated by the action of an individual so unimportant. His perplexity did not leave him. All the way down into the light he was wondering whether he could do anything to bring matters to a crisis of some kind. He was prepared to do anything that might be done.

He did not speak of it to Genevieve Bartholomew who was there in the background, and Miss Cecily. Mr. Crudas was waiting by a street corner at Hurkeld Abbas.

Mr. Severne being powerfully under the influence of that general nervousness which is so afflictive to the amateur mind when it divides the pains and pleasures of professional responsibility, had gone down to the Light exactly an hour before. His nervousness did not show itself in any distressing form. He was waiting at the door of the music-room to welcome Miss Bartholomew, his crimson blush was flamed in a drooping archway of evergreens, and lighted by a hundred little lamps of pink pearly glass. Good wishes were inscribed in holly leaves upon the walls, great pots of flowers, chrysanthemums, dahlias, curving ferns, Chinua asters, and a few late roses stood all along the front of the platform. Behind there was a woven screen of small leaved ivy and amaranth.

A few old people had taken their seats already, they sat there with solemnly wondering faces, and a new gravity in their grave eyes. When Mr. Kukoswald came they stood up, and the old women made curseys in the ancient fashion. It was all very impressive so far. Just then the children began to file out two by two from the door to the right of the platform. There was no gravity there. So much white muslin, so many blue sashes, such a unanimity of pink and green posies could only be displayed with smiles and bright glances.

The door by the platform led through into the cottage. All was surprise here, even for Genevieve. The amateurs had not yet arrived, but there was an elderly woman sitting by the fire expecting their arrival, a pale, sad woman, with a neat cap, almost like a widow's cap, half-concealing her soft red hair. She had a black dress on, quite new, and she spoke in a refined and very quiet manner when Mr. Kukoswald turned to her.

"Where is Wilfrid, Mrs. Gordon?" he asked. "I want to see him for a moment before the entertainment begins."

"He is in the reading room, sir," replied the woman, with an almost anxious deference. "I believe he is arranging the new books that came to-day. He was wishing to see you about some magazines."

George Kukoswald went away, and Genevieve was left for a few moments alone with Mrs. Gordon. She had a curious sensation of recognition, though she knew that she had not seen the woman nor heard of her before. She was rather puzzled between her refined manners and her helpful ways. She arranged Genevieve's dress, fastened up a stray wave of her yellow hair with wonderful deftness and lightness of touch. A little later she rendered similar services to Mrs. Cecily and Miss Pincefold, and also to the two Miss Dunams. No touch was required to give finish to the appearance of Edith and Lantine Caton. The tiny creatures stood in their pink silk frocks as if they had just stepped out with their expensive little feet from the latest fashion book. All the same, they were pretty children and sweet tempered.

The terrible moment came at last. Genevieve Bartholomew had not prepared herself for its turbleness. She had never stood on a platform before, never found herself uplifted above a sea of human heads and eyes. ■ was only a very small sea after all, and there was hardly a face there that she did not know more or less, nevertheless the sense of exposure, of the vainness of all efforts to shrink from it, was very trying. Mr. Severne might be nervous, too, but Genevieve could not help envying him, he seemed so much at home on the platform. He was giving directions here, whispering irrelevant remarks there. The little blue and white choir was ranged at the back against the ivy screen. The ladies sat on the right of the platform behind the chrysanthemums. The piano was at the other end, there was a music stand or two, and a couple of chairs in the middle. Altogether the soft pink light fell upon a very pretty tableau.

The entertainment opened with a four part song of Mendelssohn's, "The May-bells and the Linens." It was sung as a glee, and Genevieve played the accompaniment. George Kukoswald was at some distance from the platform, standing just where ■ could see the pale blue figure, the white moving hands, the crown of yellow hair. He watched her for awhile, then he sat—

*'Holding his forked to keep off the hair
Of snatching locks.'*

He could not forget the grey, lonely man whom he had left sitting by the fire at Nether bank, and he knew that Genevieve did not forget. Even from where he sat he could see the drooping curves about the beautiful mouth, the shadow of sadness under the white eyelids, and within the deep dark eyes.

When the glee had been sung, Mrs. Caton swept forward in a black velvet dress to the piano. She played a piece of Schumann's, an Arabesque, and she played it with considerable skill. The people seemed to be wondering over it, caring as much to watch as to listen. They had not yet arrived at the point of applauding freely. They were not sure that it was quite correct to clap their hands and stomp with their feet on the floor in such good society as this. There was a touching tendency on the part of the older people to repress such manifestations until they saw that Mr. Kirkoswald was doing his best to encourage them. Appreciation gathered slowly to its high tide after that, and by the time the first half of the entertainment was over an expression of some thing very like enthusiasm had been elicited.

There was a pause, a little interchange of civilities, approbations, small pleasantries. Then Mr. Severne made an announcement. He begged to have the pleasure of introducing a stranger to the people of Soulsgrif Bight, a stranger who had come to live among them, to try to help them, to teach any grown-up people who might care to come to him in the evenings for instruction, to give them books out from the library when they wanted them, further than this he was capable of amusing them, delighting them, as they would have the immediate pleasure of finding.

Then Mr. Severne turned, and made a little gesture of invitation; and the stranger, coming slowly and painfully forward, was introduced to the audience as Mr. Stuart.

He stood in the middle of the platform, a youth of nineteen or so, with long fair hair, a wan, worn face that had no smile on it, and hazel eyes that seemed at once wild and wistful. They were the eyes of the pale woman in the cottage, and the somewhat angular oval of the face was the same. It was a face that Genevieve recognised at a glance.

The first note of his violin, a long-drawn note of thrilling sweetness, awoke her from her trance of surprise. She looked down the room, George Kirkoswald was waiting for the look, for the smile, for the expression of wondering gratitude. He smiled back again. He was very happy for this one hour, happier in that he had tried to make others happier; and had, in a measure at least, succeeded.

What is there in the music of the violin that makes it strike so much more readily and surely straight to the human heart than any other music? It would seem as if its strings had a humanity of their own, a suffering, pleading, haunting humanity. Its cries linger on your ear, its appeals melt you, its soft singing and sighing tranquillises you in moments when the aggressive tones of a piano would drive you to distraction.

All this Wilfrid Stuart understood, and seemed too as if he understood his audience. The most ignorant of the people sat entranced, and tears were seen dropping slowly over furrowed cheeks. A minute or two later and broad smiles broke under the tears, while big sea-boots leapt time to the tune of "Weel may the keel row," and "There's nae luck about the house." This at any rate was comprehensible, and to be understood by the meanest. The house had been brought down at last.

The next item on the programme was Genevieve's song. She had never thought of it since she came on to the platform, and she was as much overcome by her surprise as if she had never had the smallest intention of singing it. She went forward quite mechanically. Mr. Severne put the music into her hand, Mrs. Caton sat down to the piano, and struck the opening notes boldly.

It was Mrs. Browning's song, The Ash, that Genevieve had undertaken to sing. The prelude is brief. Genevieve was hardly ready. She had to make a great effort to begin the opening lines—

*"I have a smiling face she said
I have a just for all I said."*

But in singing as in other things, it is the first step that costs, and Genevieve was hardly aware of any further cost. She could not help perceiving that from sheer nervousness she was singing better than usual, that her voice was stronger and freer, and had a fuller range. She did not look toward the place where George sat, if she had done so she could hardly have seen on his face any indication of the intensity of his emotion. Not the smallest vibration of the penetrating voice escaped him, its very unevenness a tone was, in a certain sense, a pleasure to him, though he felt certainly that the unevenness arose out of imperfect control over a too-perfect sympathy with the touching words of the song.

'Behind no prison grate the soul
It bars the sunshine half to-morrow,
Art captive so un comforted
As a bird behind a window
God a pity, let us pray, let us pray,
God a pity, let us pray

"We weep for those who weep the soul,
Ah, fools! I but you pay the price by
I weep for those whose hearts have been
What time their eyes were dry
When a soldier was in the day
Whom a soldier was in the day

All the rest of the concert went by like a dream for Kirkoswald. The Miss Dames and Mr. Severne sang a duo, Wilfrid Stuart came forward again with his violin, and was received tumultuously, then everybody sang God save the Queen. Congratulations, thanks, transports, all went by like sounds that pass when sleep is upon the brain, leaving only a sense of weariness and confusion. George was glad to get out from the room, away from the green wreaths, the compliments, the pink lamps, the elaborate "good nights." Under the quiet stars life might come to its own again.

CHAIR XII—"I SHOULD HAVE FELT MORE STRANGE, I MUST CONFESS"

"I don't hope my faith thy strong desire to part,
And I'll unshaken abide
I'll be true to thee as now I am
In a quiet life when thou art with God in life
The world which we shall see"

MICHAEL: A.W. 110

IT WAS some time before the stars shone down upon the utter quietness that George Kirkoswald desired. Not till Thurkeld Abbas had been pressed, and the last parting word said there, did he feel able to breathe as freely as he wanted to breathe. He walked on quite silently for awhile, Genevieve, walking by his side, was silent too.

He thanked her for her silence presently, adding, with a touch of humour, "And all the while I know you are, my young ladies sometimes say, dying of curiosity."

"No, I shall never die of curiosity," Genevieve replied. "All the same, 'I want to know.' But first I must congratulate you."

"Upon what felicity?"

"The felicity of neatness. You have managed your little surprise admirably."

"And you are satisfied?"

"I am satisfied."

"And you give me credit for obedience?"

"Implicit obedience."

"It was perhaps more implicit than you know. You remember the day on which you saw Wilfrid Stuart, and your injunctions to me?"

"Distinctly."

"If I was fortunate enough to find him, I was to take him to Usseby Hall."

"Did I say that?"

"You said much more than that. I was to do to him as I would to you."

"I remember. And by way of complying you have made him—what exactly have you made him? Music-master to Soul-grif Bight? Curator? Librarian? Professor of things in general?"

"All these."

"Then certainly you have not done to him as you would have done to me. I could never have undertaken tasks requiring such varied ability. . . . Is he equal to your desires?"

"More than equal, especially so far as his music is concerned. He is a pupil of Joachim's."

"A pupil of Joachim's! And found playing by the roadside!" exclaimed Genevieve.

"Even so. But that was the first day that he had played by the roadside, and I think it will be the last, poor fellow! . . . He owes all to you."

"Before I question that statement I must know what happened on that evening of which you have such a distinct remembrance."

"Very little happened. I went slowly over the moor by the light of the harvest moon. The wind rose a little, it came in gusts, one gust brought to me from afar the faint sound of a violin. Think of—violin music on Langbarugh Moor after dark! I have no doubt but that I should have taken it to be the death song of the Kirkoswalds, if you had not described the playing of your prince."

"And after?"

"After I had to take some slight trouble to discover the exact spot from whence the sound came. It was a greater distance than I could have believed. When I did reach it I found it to be a kind of hollow under the edge of a heathery crag. Your wild-eyed youth was sitting on a grey boulder, playing to himself in the moonlight. There was a touch of romance about the situation."

"And Mrs Gordon was not there? She is his mother?"

"She is his mother, and she was in London, poor woman, trying to hide herself, in order to escape from the wretched treatment of her second husband. It is a most heartrending story. The boy told me a little that night after we got home; the mother told me a little more when she came, and I have guessed the rest. It seems that originally she was a kind of upper-servant in an old Scotch family, and she married a son of the house against the wish of his people. They had only this one boy, Wilfrid, and his father designed him for the Church, but unfortunately Mr Stuart did not live past the child's tenth year. They seem to have been a very happy little family, with sufficient means, and the widow was not left in poverty. But she must needs marry again, and marry a scoundrel, who has robbed her and her child of every penny they had, and the boy, in obedience to his mother's wish, was making his way into Scotland, to see if he could obtain any assistance for her from his father's relations. His money failed him at York, and he was intending to attempt the rest of the journey on foot. Think of it, with his lameness!"

"Was he always lame?"

"No, his step-father, in a fit of drunkenness, threw him and his violin from the window of the house they lived in into the street, some passers-by picked him up senseless. The whole story is, unhappily, commonplace enough in its outlines, but I fancy there has been capacity for an uncommon amount of suffering under it. It is no wonder that the lad seems as if he could never be reconciled with the world again."

"Does he care for his mother?" Genevieve asked.

"He seems to care passionately."

"Then he will soon be reconciled."

There was a pause. Keturah passed in the clear blue darkness with a seafaring cousin. "I wonder if she is happy—quite happy?" Genevieve was thinking to herself. She could not help thinking also of her own poor, crushed, and broken love—broken in seeming if not in truth.

She was as far as ever from understanding the turnings and driftings of her fate. She only knew that when she was strongest, lightest-hearted, there was always most hurt and pain underneath.

Her one care was to hide the pain, so that George Kirkoswald may be forgiven if some times he doubted whether any deep pain existed. This was only sometimes, at other times he hoped that there was no under current, that Genevieve's faith was as strong as she had declared it to be—strong enough, at least, for peace. His full conviction was that she would not have to bear the test much longer.

So far she had borne it splendidly, thus he would always remember. He had expected it of her, but, nevertheless, he had seen his expectations fulfilled always with a new admiration, a new reverence for a nature so wide, so clear-sighted, so utterly unselfish.

No look of fretfulness, of doubt, had ever met him, never by a glance had any egotistic claim been betrayed. The expression of her face, the tones of her voice, said always, "I love you, I have faith in you, and, though I do not understand you, I am trying to wait patiently until you can make yourself understood."

This had been her attitude. It was her attitude still, and by its very unegotism it added intensity to the things he was already enduring. A little it baffled him, a little it drew him to look into its nature, as if he would seek some more certain satisfaction for the yearning tenderness that beat him, that was always in him, though he set it in such harsh keeping.

Even yet he would not ask her to continue her faith in him, he told himself that he could not while that dead promise was held by another woman to have his in it. To do this would be to add dishonour to dishonour.

He could never forget—not for an hour—that an engagement was held to exist, that he was one of the two parties to it, and that the other counted every written word to mean the same thing to-day that it had meant years before. To him that old false bond was as the bond of an old false marriage, hateful, not binding, yet full of potency for pain and ill. He knew perfectly well that Diana Richmond did not expect him to fulfil that engagement now. But for some reason of her own, which he could but darkly divine, it suited her purpose to hold him back by threats from a marriage with Genevieve Bartholomew. That she had a purpose, that she chose to hide it in mystery, he was fully convinced. He was convinced also that the mystery would be made plain if he would but wait.

He was sick to the heart of waiting now. Surely he might say so, surely he might cover his face with his hands and cry aloud—

"I am weary of this! I am very weary! Genevieve, my child, you will believe that I am weary?"

She drew a little closer to him under the shadow of the starlight. She laid one hand gently upon his arm, and let it rest there.

There was something that was almost a sob in her voice as she spoke, it sounded full of tears.

"If you are weary, then I am not," she said. "If you are troubled, if this silence, this coldness between us troubles you, then I have no trouble. I can bear it all. Oh, ten times more than all, since I know certainly that you are bearing it too!"

"Did you think, then, that I was not?" George asked in pained surprise. "What have you thought of me? Tell me how I seem to you. Tell me the worst."

"There is no worst now. The worst is the sorrow that you have. I may not ask about it? You would tell me if you could tell me?"

"I ought to have told you all long ago," George said passionately. "I ought to have told you of all my life. It would have been so easy once. Then it was made impossible, or I thought it was. Some day—I pray it may be soon—it will be possible again, and then there shall not be a passage in my life that I will not lay bare before you. You shall know everything I have had a lesson."

They had reached the cottage now. The barley was standing dark and still on either hand. A bird flew out from the ivy that was round the porch.

"Wait a moment," said George, taking the hand that Genevieve had laid upon the little railing. "Only a moment. It is so hard to go when one is happy!"

"You are happier to night?" Genevieve said softly. In her heart there was a little wonder, a strong wish. Why could he not always be happy? Why should he entertain those moods, those silences and darkneses that came upon him, and remained so persistently? It was not difficult to take things, even bitter things, with a certain "sweet reasonableness" of outer expression that always helped the inner life of the soul.

"Yes, I am happier," George was saying. "I should always be happy if I were near you. ■ is another atmosphere, and I am another man. You draw me upward. I believe only in good when I am with you."

"Then you believe in good always . . . I am always with you," said the girl, with a deeper and more passionate meaning in her tone and in her accent than the words might seem to hold. She would have said more, but it seemed as if her voice failed in the effort. Her emotion was stronger and deeper than she could bear. But surely that impulse toward further unfoldings was not difficult of comprehension!

CHAPTER XLII—BEHIND THE SCENES.

"I speak out as of fact. Our nimble souls
Can open an immaterial universe
Cutting our mood and call it possible
Sooner than set one grain with eye exact,
And give strict record of it. Yet by chance
Our fancies may be truth, and make us wiser
In a case seeming wild, so harvest fall Even guessing ignorance may pluck out its fruit."

—LIONEL LINCOLN, The Spanish Gift

"Life is a series of surprises," said one, adding, "and would not be worth taking or keeping if it were not."

The peaceful soul, however, is not in love with surprises. It likes to foretell the day and the event. One postal delivery on each of the six work days is enough, and more than enough, and life has been found to be possible without the daily newspaper.

Still, let a man guard his life as he may, the unexpected will happen, especially, some will say, if ■ be also the undesired, and no calculation can prepare you in any effective way for what the coming day may bring forth.

If Noel Bartholomew, sitting on that grey October day in his studio at Netherbank, could have heard, by telephone, for instance, all that was passing in the morning room at Yarrell Croft, it is easily conceivable that his surprise might in itself have overcome his despondency, apart from the circumstantial value of the thing he heard.

It was a pretty room in the south west corner of the house. It had windows looking either way. There were flower beds in front, chrysanthemums stood in the dewy mist, a few geraniums lingered, a little rug nonette scented the place, a Gloire de Dijon rose or two hung sadly against the window pane.

There was no sadness inside the room. A large fire was blazing in the handsome modern grate, thick rugs were on the floor, thick rich curtains hung over the windows and doorways. Everything was ablaze with lightness, and brightness, and warmth of colour. You could not turn your head without finding that your eye was arrested by some picture, some group of fine ornaments, some display of rich and rare lace, or china, or embroidery. It might be that the only harmony was the harmony of universal magnificence, but that is by no means to be despised if it be free from any too obvious discord.

There was no discord there. Miss Richmond herself, though ■ was but mid day, was dressed with an extreme elegance. She had on a cashmere morning robe with a Persian pattern on it; fine muslin ruffles were round her throat and wrists, her small slippers were embroidered. On her head there was a cur-ously-shaped black velvet cap, which she was trying on for the first time. It was the production of her new French maid, Félicie, who stood beside her mistress looking into the glass that reflected the beautiful face with its dark overshadowing of purple-black hair and its deep-set, lustrous eyes. Few women so far past their first youth could have borne the morning light as Miss Richmond bore it, a fact of which she was very well aware.

"And you think it suits me, Félicie? It is not too large?" Diana was saying.

"Non, madame. Le chapeau n'est pas trop grand. Il sied parfaitement à madame."

"And you think it looks better as it is? We thought of having the band embroidered, you know."

"Mais il va mieux comme ça. De la broderie? non. Quand il sera brodé, il perdra son cachet. ■ est superbe comme il est, poste par madame, et—"

But Félicie did not finish her sentence. The door of the room was thrown wide open with a bang, and Cecil Richmond rushed in with a burning spot on each of his pale cheeks and an open letter in his hand. Seeing that Félicie was there, he made a sudden effort to control himself.

"Leave the room," he said to the girl, speaking as quietly as he could. "I wish to see Miss Richmond alone." The latter sentence was addressed to his sister rather than to her maid.

Diana seated herself in the low easy chair she had been sitting in before Félicie disturbed her. She was careful about arranging the lace at the back of it; she considered that lace was always becoming. She looked up at Cecil, who was standing on the rug before her, too breathless, and apparently too much stunned, ■ know exactly how to begin the thing he wanted to say.

"You like my Leonardo da Vinci cap, Cecil?" she said almost as soon ■ the wondering Félicie had closed the door. She had not taken the cap off. It was new and becoming, therefore ■ might have its value in an argument.

Cecil took no notice of the question, he was trying ■ master himself. He remembered other occasions when he had not mastered himself, and after which ■ had had to endure much remorse.

He held out the letter that was in his hand. "Look at that," he said to his sister, speaking in hoarse peremptory tones. "Read it."

Miss Richmond had seen that it was from Bartholomew; but she took it quite coolly, and glanced over it.

It was the third letter. Like the others, it was brief and courteous, but, meaning it to be final, Bartholomew had expressed himself a little more urgently. He had added an expression of surprise that his two previous letters should have been disregarded.

Diana, having read the note, put it on a table beside her, then she folded her beautiful hands complacently upon her knee, looking up at her brother from under her half-closed eyes, as if the epistle had contained an invitation to dinner, which she was doubtful about accepting.

"What is the meaning of it?" the young man asked briefly.

"Of this note? It seems to concern a picture."

"One of the two I told you of when you came back from London. I told you that I had given Bartholomew an order to paint me two."

"Mere sketches, I understood."

"It doesn't matter what you understood. There are things I wish to understand now. . . You have opened two letters addressed to me?"

"I have, dear."

"When was it?"

"Oh, some time ago! I think you were out shooting when they came."

"Where are they, may I ask?"

"I put them into the fire."

The sudden flush of crimson seemed to spread from the burning spots on the young man's cheek over his entire face and throat and head. He stood silently. He appeared to have a dread of himself—of some wild, unmeasured strength within himself.

"What was your motive?" he asked, still speaking with as little agitation as he could use.

Miss Richmond smiled slowly, incomprehensibly, unattractively.

"My dear boy, you have never yet understood any motive of mine," she said. "You certainly could not understand this. Give it up."

"If I give it up either you or I must leave Yarrell Croft."

"You have said so before."

"I have, more than once."

"And more than once you have come to see that ■ would not be convenient ■ either of us to leave."

"One has to consider more than one's convenience. ■ convenient to me to have my letters opened, and read, and burnt without my knowledge? You have said and done many intolerable things. I think you have touched the limit at last . . . What can I say to this man? What excuse can I make?"

"Why not tell him the truth?"

"I don't believe you would care if I did."

"Of course I should not care. I should rather enjoy it."

Again Cecil stood silent, baffled, discomfited.

"Do you know the sort of reputation you are making for yourself in the neighbourhood?" he asked at last, looking down into the face before him with less of passion and more of pain than had been there before.

"No," answered Miss Richmond, with animation, "no, I do not. It is always interesting to hear what people are saying about one, and it is an interest of which I have never had my due share. If you know anything, Cecil dear, do tell me."

"It would have no effect."

"Pardon me, I have just said that it would have the effect of interesting me."

"It would interest you to know that you are considered to be developing an eccentricity that shows you to be already on the calumne verge of sanity?"

'The extreme verge of sanity' That is a nice, neat phrase. Is it your own?"

Cecil buried his face in his hands for a moment. What could he say, what could he do in the teeth of such studied and cruel cleverness?

"Is it my own?" he said bitterly. "It seems that nothing is my own—not even my letters. It is maddening, maddening, to be treated like this, I be treated like a child—nay, worse than any child would be treated by any honourable woman."

"You are growing eloquent, and you are speaking better grammar than you usually do speak," said Miss Richmond, leaning her head back against the white face. Then she took off her velvet cap, it interfered with the ease of her attitude.

Again Cecil stood silent for a little while.

"And this is all I am to expect from you? You will give me no explanation, make no apology—you will not even give me the satisfaction of knowing your reasons for acting as you have done?"

"I have told you that my reasons are beyond your comprehension," said Miss Richmond, speaking with the same cool deliberateness that she had used from the beginning.

"You admit, at least, that you had reasons?"

"Certainly I had."

"They must have been tolerably strong ones?"

"They were very strong."

"And you are satisfied with the result?"

"The result has not been reached yet. I will tell you if it satisfies me when I arrive at it."

What could there be behind all this? Cecil Richmond knew but very little of his sister, of the real life she had lived underneath the seeming life. Of her hopes, her fears, her designs, her disappointments, he knew nothing. He had been at school during the time of her engagement to George Kirk Oswald, he had known of it, but he had not been interested in it, and he had no definite idea of the manner in which it had come to be broken off. He had a vague impression that his sister had never cared much for Kirk Oswald—that she had never cared much for any one. Affection was not in her way. She seemed, more than any woman he knew, to be capable of living her own life without support from any other life. There was nothing of feminine softness or subjection about her, nothing that seemed like need of protection, of any guiding or guarding influence. In all things she was self-sufficient, and equal to the emergency of the hour.

He was utterly at a loss now, and it could hardly be expected of him that he should take an annoyance like this quite meekly and quietly, and without making any further effort to arrive at the mystery involved in it. The more he considered his perplexity the harder it was to bear. He hazarded another question after a time.

"At least answer me this," he said, "Was it your intention simply to annoy me? or have you some spite against Bartholomew?"

"I had no special wish to annoy you," replied Diana considerably. "And I have no spite, as you term it, against your artist. He is probably a fool, but if one felt spite fully toward all the fools one meets, one would have no room for any other feeling."

Cecil turned away, pained, indignant, still baffled.

"May I ask, then, what you are going to do?" Miss Richmond said, as he opened the door of the room.

"I cannot tell you what I am going to do," was the reply. "I shall have to consider."

"Do consider—consider well!" said Diana, turning to her feet, and facing her brother with new meaning in her expression. "I am speaking for your good now. Be cautious, especially, I would say, be cautious if you are likely to require any further favours at my hands."

Cecil remained standing there, changing found to his intense disappointment that it would take some years of careful management and retrenchment to make him the rich man it had been popularly supposed that he would be. Lately some considerable losses in the shape of unpaid rents had followed upon the bad harvests, some of the sums were now unknown and Mr Damer might have made some rather surprising disclosures if he had been so minded.

Colour quickly as he stood. He understood the threat. Young, as he was he had long ago placed himself in his sister's power. He was aware that she had but lately discovered some debts of his that he had not confided to her when he had professed to make a full confession concerning the state of his affairs. That was when he came of age, and touched the limit at last. . . . What can I say to this man? What excuse can I make?"

"Why not tell him the truth?"

"I don't believe you would care if I did."

"Of course I should not care. I should rather enjoy it."

Again Cecil stood silent, baffled, discomfited.

"Do you know the sort of reputation you are making for yourself in the neighbourhood?" he asked at last, looking down into the face before him with less of passion and more of pain than had been there before.

"No," answered Miss Richmond, with animation, "no, I do not. It is always interesting to hear what people are saying about one, and it is an interest of which I have never had my due share. ■ you know anything, Cecil dear, do tell me!"

"It would have no effect."

"Pardon me, I have just said that it would have the effect of interesting me."

"It would interest you to know that you are considered to be developing an eccentricity that shows you to be already on the extreme verge of sanity?"

"The extreme verge of sanity! That is a nice, neat phrase. Is it your own?"

Cecil buried his face in his hands for a moment. What could he say, what could he do in the teeth of such studied and cruel cleverness?

"Is it my own?" he said bitterly. "It seems that nothing is my own—not even my letters. It is maddening, maddening, to be treated like this, ■ be treated like a child—nay, worse than any child would be treated by any honourable woman."

"You are growing eloquent, and you are speaking better grammar than you usually do speak," said Miss Richmond, leaning her head back against the white lace. Then she took off her velvet cap, ■ interfered with the ease of her attitude.

Again Cecil stood silent for a little while.

"And this is all I am to expect from you? You will give me no explanation, make no apology, you will not even give me the satisfaction of knowing your reasons for acting as you have done?"

"I have told you that my reasons are beyond your comprehension," said Miss Richmond, speaking with the same cool deliberateness that she had used from the beginning.

"You admit, at least, that you had reasons?"

"Certainly I had."

"They must have been tolerably strong ones?"

"They were very strong."

"And you are satisfied with the result?"

"The result has not been reached yet. I will tell you if ■ satisfies me when I arrive at it."

What could there be behind all this? Cecil Richmond knew but very little of his sister, of the real life she had lived underneath the seeming life. Of her hopes, her fears, her designs, her disappointments, he knew nothing. He had been at school during the time of her engagement to George Kukoswald; he had known of it, but he had not been interested in it, and he had no definite idea of the manner in which it had come ■ be broken off. He had a vague impression that his sister had never cared much for Kukoswald—that she had never cared much for any one. Affection was not in her way. She seemed, more than any woman he knew, to be capable of living her own life without support from any other life. There was no thing of feminine softness or subjection about her, nothing that seemed like need of protection, of any guiding or guarding influence. In all things she was self-sufficient, and equal to the emergency of the hour.

He was utterly at a loss now, and it could hardly be expected of him that he should take an annoyance like this quite meekly and quietly, and without making any further effort to arrive at the mystery involved in it. The more he considered his perplexity the harder it was to bear. He harrowed another question after a time.

"At least answer me this," he said. "Was it your intention simply to annoy me? or have you some spite against Bartholomew?"

"I had no special wish to annoy you," replied Diana considerably. "And I have no spite, as you term it, against your artist. He is probably a fool, but if one felt spite fully toward all the fools one meets, one would have no room for any other feeling."

Cecil turned away, pained, indignant, still baffled.

"May I ask, then, what you are going to do?" Miss Richmond said, as he opened the door of the room.

"I cannot tell you what I am going to do," was the reply. "I shall have ■ consider."

"Do consider—consider well!" said Diana, rising to her feet, and facing her brother with new meaning in her expression. "I am speaking for your good now. Be cautious, especially, I would say, be cautious if you are likely to require any further favours at my hands."

All this Cecil knew, and more than once the fact that he had given a commission for two expensive pictures had caused him some slight uneasiness, more especially as he did not know how expensive they might be

Still it was of course very unkind to suppose that he would be unable to pay for them ■ There would be a scene or two between him and Diana, that he had been prepared for from the first. But he was not unaccustomed to scenes, and he had ceased to be much impressed by them.

The discovery he had made this morning of his sister's inexplicable conduct with regard to Bartholomew's letters had complicated the affair in his mind considerably.

It would have been a relief to him if he could have taken Diana at her word—if he could have gone down ■ the studio at Netherbank, and told the simple truth. If he could have done that he might have met Bartholomew without confusion of face, and there would have been no need for him to condescend to subterfuge.

He went into the greenhouse on the upper terrace, and sat there some time with a cigar between his lips, considering what he had really better do now. It seemed to him that ■ would be exceedingly difficult to do the thing he felt he ought to do, to go down to Netherbank and say that, owing to a mischance for which he was in nowise responsible, the letters had never reached him. Suspicion would certainly arise out of this, besides, it would be disagreeable.

Presently a happy thought struck him—Cecil considered it to be a happy one. There was a man—Sharpe, the plumber—at work among the water-pipes in an adjoining conservatory. Sharpe's home was at the upper end of the village of Monk-Maishus. Nothing would be easier than for him to call at Netherbank before he came to his work on the following morning. Sharpe should fetch the picture, and he should take a message—if he blundered over the message so much the better.

It would be easier to explain away anything that might be said by Sharpe, than the words of a deliberately written communication.

CHAPTER XLIII.—DEAD WOODING.

"All my life I still have seen
And I will forget it not Every sorrow with its bound
And no cross could I see so great."

From German.

GENLIEVE will always remember that October evening. She was sitting beside her father in the studio, sitting quite silently. The fire was burning low, the lamp light threw dim rays among the easels and canvases, the wind was sweeping sadly over the fields, moaning in the chimney and through the casements. Some dead creepers were tapping plaintively upon the window-pane, the sound was as if some lost creature were crying help—admittance. Bartholomew sat with his face buried in the hands that rested upon the table. For more than an hour he had not spoken.

Presently a knock at the studio-door awoke him from his reverie. ■ was certainly surprising. Few people came to the studio, none came so late.

A sudden feeling that was more like fear than anything else surged over him as he opened the door. When he saw that ■ was Ambrose Sharpe his fear changed ■ a new despondency.

"Come in," he said to the man, who was murmuring something unintelligibly out there in the darkness. "Come in. . . . There is only my daughter here. . . . You were saying something."

"It's the picture—Mr. Richmond's picture," said Ambrose, who had heard about it, and had also gathered in the village that there was something in the affair not easy of comprehension. It was quite well known that the painting had been unsold for more than two months, and that Mr. Bartholomew had been daily expecting its removal. Ambrose was a little pleased with his errand.

"It's the picture," he said. "Mr. Richmond told me to take it over w' me to-morrow mornin'. He's been over thrang to get down, he said. An' he was sure to like it, sure 't wad be all right."

Bartholomew was pale, and Genevieve felt that her lip was quivering to the sudden strange agitation that had come down upon her father. Pictures that had been sold from his easel for large sums of money, and had won wide reputation before leaving the studio, had been sent away with less emotion than this.

"I am afraid you will not be able to take it to Yarrell Croft without assistance, Bartholomew said to the man. "This is the picture. It is a considerable size, you see."

"It is, but my word it's a bonny one! Why that's Craig's old house, up again Baldersby Mere, an' there's t' old oak-tree an' all. It's a destrict bonny pictur'! But as you say it is sizable, it'll be a matter o' four feet wide w' the frame. Still, Ah sall allus manage as far as our house. An' Ah can get somebody to help ma to Yarrell w' t' t' mornin'. Ah sall be startin' hours afore you get up, that's why Ah com ■ night. . . . An' Ah sall take care on't—you may trust ma for that."

"Certainly, I can trust you," said Bartholomew, helping the man to put a wrapper round the picture. Then he assisted him with it to the gate at the lower end of the field. Genevieve stood alone in the studio, wondering, listening to the wind that came moaning over the marsh; to the beckoning fingers that tapped with melancholy sound upon the window-pane.

■ was some time before her father came back. He was quite pale and calm. Genevieve could see in his face the look of prayer, of thanksgiving, sent up while he was out under the stars. But she saw with surprise, with concern, that there was no sense of relief visible in him as yet. Had the tension been too great to be taken off all at once? Had his whole being been so set to the minor airs of pain that even deliverance from pain could not change the key?

"You are relieved, father?" she said, as they were preparing to leave the studio. "It ■ some satisfaction to you that the picture has been sent for."

"Yes, I am relieved, child," the artist replied. "But I am oppressed now by the knowledge that I have borne the strain so ill. . . . And I think there is some other oppression, something that I do not penetrate, or understand. I cannot feel as if it were all over."

They went out into the silent night. The wind swept in gusts from the moor, the clouds were passing swiftly across the stars, the dead leaves rustled by in the breeze. Mingled with these sounds Genevieve seemed all night to hear the forlorn tapping of the dead, melancholy woodbine upon the studio window-pane.

A RISING TIDE.

THE west wind clears the morning,
The sea shines silver-grey;
The night was long, but fresh and strong
Awakes the breezy day;
Like smoke that flies across the list,
The clouds are faint and thin;
And near and far, along the bar,
The tide comes creeping in.

The dreams of midnight showed me
A life of loneliness,
A stony shore, that knew no more
The bright wave's soft caress;

The morning broke, the visions fled,—
With dawn new hopes begin;
The light is sweet, and at my feet
The tide comes rolling in.

Over the bare, black boulders
The ocean sweeps and swells;
Oft, waters wide, ye come to hide
Dull stones and empty shells!
I hear the floods lift up their voice
With loud, triumphant din;
Sad dreams depart,—rest, doubting heart,
The tide comes foaming in!

SARAH DOUDNEY.

THE CHRISTIAN RULE OF JUSTICE.

By R. W. DALE, LL.D. (BIRMINGHAM).

BY some ancient moralists justice was made to include all human virtues; the just man was he who discharged all moral obligations. Even piety was made a part of justice, and the impious man was said to be unjust to the gods. A similar use of the word is to be found in the Hebrew Scriptures. The just man of the Psalmists and Prophets is the man who keeps all divine laws; justice is another name for righteousness, and includes all kinds of moral and religious excellence. But it is both common and convenient to give the word a narrower application. When a man demands justice he demands his "rights;" and ■ we give him his rights the claims of justice are exhausted.

In some cases the obligations of justice are perfectly plain and definite. A man has a "right," for instance, to require that we should pay him in full all the money we owe him; we are, therefore, bound, not merely to pay him when we are able, but to take care that we are able to pay him. To indulge in a style of living which touches the very margin of our income is not only a violation ■ the obligations of prudence and self-interest, it is a violation of the obligations of justice, even though through a happy chance no unforeseen and inevitable expenditure lands us in difficulties which prevent us from paying our debts. We ought to leave a margin for misfortunes. To put another man's money into a risky speculation is itself an act of dishonesty, even though the venture may accidentally turn out well and we may be able to pay ■ all that we owe ■ To be honest though a fortunate accident is not to be honest at all.

A man has a right ■ insist that we should fulfil the terms of a contract in the sense in which we know that he understood them, the sense in which we intended or permitted him to understand them. This holds true whether the contract is for goods or for services. It affects master and workman, manufacturer and merchant, tradesman and customer. It is not enough that we fulfil the mere letter of the engagement. We are bound to supply the goods or to render the services, or to pay the money, which we know the other party to the contract expected when the contract was entered into. To pretend that we have done everything that the law requires is nothing to the purpose. The man who is honest only in so far as the law compels him to be honest is not an honest man.

These are simple cases. The "rights" on one side are exactly defined by law or by contract, and the obligations of justice on the other side are, therefore, equally definite. But there are many provinces of life in which the rights are incapable of precise definition, and in which, therefore, the obligations of justice are less certain. To tell us to "be just" is very often to afford very little practical guidance. We meet the precept with the reply—Yes, I wish to be just, but what does justice require? It may be true, as moralists teach us, that the rules of justice can be laid down with a degree of accuracy of which moral precepts do not, in any other instance, admit; but in practical life the instances are innumerable in which it is almost impossible to define the claims of justice, as it is to define the claims of charity.

The most important relations of life involve obligations and "rights" which cannot be determined either by public legislation or by mutual agreement. What, for example, are the "rights" of a wife? What freedom can she claim on the grounds of mere justice, in the choice of her friends, in the employment of her time, in the expenditure of money? What is the extent, what are the limits, of the demands she can make on the time of her husband, on the sacrifice of his personal tastes, of his friendships, of his amusements? Until the "rights" on the side of the wife are determined, the obligations of justice on the side of the husband are unknown. They cannot be determined by law, all the claims which can be enforced by law may be satisfied and the wife may still suffer flagrant injustice. Nor can the "rights" and "obligations" of husband and wife be determined by mutual agreement. Marriage is no doubt founded on voluntary contract, but the conditions of the contract cannot be varied or relaxed at the pleasure of the contracting parties. As soon as a man and woman are married, the duties and obligations arise from which neither of them can be released in virtue of a private and preliminary agreement between them. To use a convenient legal term, the relations between husband and wife are not relations of contract but of status, and any contract which purports to exempt either of them from the obligations created by the status would be immoral and void. Husband and wife have "rights" which they cannot surrender; they are under obligations which no contract can cancel.

It may be said that the relations between husband and wife involve mutual duties which cannot be defined in terms of justice, and that when either of them begins to insist on "rights" the moral beauty of the relation ship is lost. In a perfect marriage there is a frank and unreserved surrender of the life of each to the other. Love gives everything and claims nothing, and if anything were demanded and conceded as a matter of justice, the charm of the concession would be gone. All this is true. But love is sometimes blind in other senses than that in which the poets have said it. Genuine affection may, through ignorance, be guilty of grave injustice. There may be an inordinate and unconscious egotism and an iniquitous invasion of the "rights" of another even where there is passionate devotion. In a perfect marriage the wife will never think of her own claims, but the husband will never forget them; the husband will never assert his own "rights," but the wife will never encroach on them. Love will always be eager to give very much more than can be demanded by justice, but only an intelligent and ethically cultivated love will prevent either husband or wife from sometimes giving less. But to define the "rights" which justice must recognize and which love will desire to transcend is not always easy.

Or, take the relations between parent and child, how are we to measure their mutual claims? What are the "rights" of the parent? What are the "rights" of the child? In this case, of course, there can be no question of contract, and when the legal obligations on both sides have been met, some of the gravest difficulties which have embittered the relations of parents and children remain untouched. Within what limits and up to what age has a parent the "right" to exert any control over the religious preferences of a child? Has a Catholic father the "right" to forbid a boy of seventeen to attend Protestant worship or read Protestant books? Has a Protestant father the "right" to forbid a girl of twenty to attend mass or to correspond with a Catholic priest? Has the clever son of a prosperous merchant a "right" to a university education? Can he complain of injustice if he is sent from school into the counting-house? Has a rich man the "right" to leave fifty thousand pounds to one son and only twenty to another, and only ten to each of his daughters? Or is he under an obligation, as a matter of justice, to give each of his children an equal share of his property?

Brothers and sisters have their rights as against each other. So have friends. So have lovers. Old servants have then "rights" which a just master will not disregard. Generous masters have their "rights" which just servants will be careful to remember and to honour. But these "rights" are in many cases extremely indefinite. It is not so easy as the moralists have taught us to lay down the rules of justice with any degree of accuracy. A man may honestly desire to be just, but if he cannot exactly measure the "rights" of others he will be unable to determine when the obligations of justice are satisfied.

Christ has given us a rule which will save us from many difficulties. "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them." This is not a scientific definition of justice, but a practical rule of conduct. It is to be taken with those obvious qualifications which are always necessary in applying rules of this kind. It is the Christian form of the ethical law—Be just.

It will secure justice, it will generally secure something more. For we are usually keen in discovering our own rights, and sufficiently generous in estimating them. Christ tells us to estimate the rights of others as we estimate our own and then to govern our conduct, not by the claims which we suppose that we have upon them, but by the claims which they have upon us. In estimating our duties to other men we are not merely to make due allowance for the "personal equation," we are to give them the benefit of it. I do not say that this rule will enable us, without a great deal of patient thought, to find a solution for all the perplexing problems of life, but in most cases it will enable us to discover our duty at once, and in the rest will put us in the way to discover it.

The rule, if we act upon it, will at least make us just. We like other men, not only to pay the money they owe us, but to pay it punctually and without being worried to pay it. If we put ourselves in the place of a retail tradesman with a large number of small outstanding accounts, we shall see at once that carelessness and irregularity in paying small debts may sometimes cause almost as much trouble and anxiety as not paying them at all. "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them." When we buy goods from other men we wish them to give us goods of the quality which they know we expect to receive, and we like good measure and full weight. When we engage their services we wish them to perform to the very best of their ability whatever services they have contracted to render. If they have charge of our property we wish them to avoid injuring it, and to take as much care of it as if it were their own. In all such matters Christ intends us to make what we know would be our own claims on others the rule of our conduct towards them.

The rule is admirably simple in relation to interests and duties of another kind. When we are ready to take up and to report a report to another man's disadvantage, we should ask whether we should like a similar report about ourselves to be believed and repeated on similar evidence. When we are on the point of condemning a man severely, and forming a hostile estimate of his general spirit and character, on the ground of words which we ourselves have heard him speak, or on the ground of some unworthy action which we know he has committed, we should ask whether we should think it just for other men to form a summary judgment of our own character for similar reasons, and without taking into account our general conduct. We should be equally prompt to challenge lighter censures. We call on a man—a friend—and he meets us coldly and without sympathy, we can see clearly enough that he is glad when we leave him. But are we to feel resentment and to say that his friendship is fickle, and that he has no real kindness for us? Does it never happen that people for whom we have a genuine affection come to us when we are so absorbed in speculations or in quarrels which detach us for the time from all the affairs and relationships of our common life, or when we are so completely mastered by anxieties about our own concerns or the concerns of persons dependent on us, that we receive them almost as if they were strangers—are unable to find our way to them, speak to them as if we had no interests in common, and dismiss them with a sense of relief? We call on a stranger, and he hurries us off with indecent haste. He is guilty of a fault, but are we to go about the world saying that he is brutally discourteous?
